Marsh seated himself in silence; for a man of the world, never had he felt so embarrassed at the sight of such hopeless misery.

"You may tell me all," resumed the speaker: "describe to me my grandson's death, I can bear it; my heart can feel no second blow. 'Tis strange," he added, with unnatural calmness, "how philosophy increases with age upon us."

"I did not witness the event you allude to," replied his visitor, deeply moved.

"I thought, that is, I understood, you accompanied him upon that fatal journey which—"

Despite his boasted fortitude, the firmness of Mr. Bently gave way, and he shed bitter tears of mingled regret and affection.

"You see what a philosopher I am," he said, mournfully. "What a wayward thing the heart is," he continued, after a pause. "Who can comprehend it? For years mine remained deaf to the pleadings of nature—the sorrows of my own child, and yet the loss of my grandson has broken it."

"It was some time," observed the lieutenant, "before I could bring myself to believe in the death of my young charge, the intelligence being anything but precise upon the subject; so many rumours were flying about—one day believed, the next contradicted. To satisfy myself I resolved to visit that part of the country where it was alleged to have taken place."

"That was kind," said the merchant, "but no more than I expected from you. You convinced yourself?"

"Nearly so."

There was something in the tone in which the words were uttered, and the look that accompanied it, which startled the old man, and the first faint gleam of hope broke upon his heart.

Slowly he repeated the words, "Nearly so." "Is it not then a reality? is there a chance—a possibility that he still lives? Marsh, do not torture me by a suspense kindly meant, but more than I have strength to bear."

"The body was never found."

Mr. Bently clasped his hands, in mute but eloquent gratitude.

"Possibly, he may be a prisoner," added his visitor, who scarcely knew what to say, so greatly did the agitation of the grandfather of our hero terrify him.

"Did you not ascertain?" exclaimed Mr. Bently.

The lieutenant hesitated to reply to him.

"But that shall be my care," continued the old man; "I would have ransomed him with a kingly ransom—with my own life, if necessary. I will trust to no other agent, but proceed myself to India."

"Consider, my dear sir, the distance—your great age."

"I feel neither," interrupted the merchant. "There is a chance of again beholding him, and I am young again—strong in affection and in hope. You will accompany me? I am sure you will."

"Willingly, most willingly," replied Marsh, who felt that, at any risk, it was best to end the agitating scene, "should the journey prove necessary."

"He lives!" exclaimed Mr. Bently, springing from his chair, and grasping the speaker by the arm with an energy that astonished him. "I feel it! I am sure of it! You would not trifle with my white hairs, and insult me by a mockery. Speak—one word, in pity!"

A light step was heard approaching the door of the library. The merchant heard it; it fell familiarly as a thing of old upon his ear, and he stood for an instant like a statue, motionless and spell-bound, but still retaining his grasp upon the arm of the lieutenant, without whose support he must have fallen. Expectation, hope, doubt, fear, all were wrought to the highest pitch, and further delay might have proved fatal, when the door opened, and the next instant Mr. Bently found himself in the arms of his grandson. Marsh quitted the room; he had performed his task, and a weight of anxiety was removed from his heart.

Several hours elapsed before he was summoned to rejoin them, when he found the merchant exceedingly pale from the recent agitation he had undergone; but still much stronger than he expected. The expression of hopeless sorrow had already given way to one of deep content, if not of joy.

"Richard has told me all," were the first words the old man uttered; "I shall soon have a grandchild more to love."

In these few graceful words did Mr. Bently convey his approbation of our hero's choice of Lillian. He also announced his intention of leaving Meldown the following day for London.

"Too soon!" he repeated, in answer to an observation of the lieutenant's, hinting that his strength had already been overtaxed; "not an hour, not a minute. Remember, there are other tears to dry; mine must not prove a selfish joy. I have no longer any excuse for remaining secluded from the world," he continued, with feverish excitement; "my heart feels strong again. I long to see him in his mother's arms; then, and then only, shall I cease to regret the past."

Impatient as Richard felt for the meeting with his parents, he entreated his grandfather to postpone his intention at least for a day or two longer, fearing the old man's health might give way under so much excitement.

"Remember," he added, "we shall still be in time for Christmas."

Something in the mention of Christmas-day appeared to please the merchant, and he at once assented.

It was not till Mr. Bently had been persuaded to retire to rest that Richard Markham and the lieutenant returned to the Home Farm to see after their friends and inquire the fate of Andrew Silex.

The steward was dead.

"I trust I shall never witness such another death-bed," observed Jack Manders, who appeared exceedingly pale. "And yet I rejoice I did so," he added, "since it may prove of service to one who is dear to you. The parchment which Mike's companion in crime carried off with him was the long-concealed codicil to the will of the former baronet of Meldown, bequeathing the estates equally between the issue of the two brothers Norman and Allan, in the event of the former dying without male heirs."

"This is most important," observed the lieutenant, and supplies a key to the motives of Lady Boothroyd. "The deed must be recovered at any sacrifice."

"As for the wealth of my late unworthy relative," added the nephew, "he has done something to atone by bequeathing it to Lillian."

"That was your suggestion, I feel convinced," exclaimed our hero, struck by his disinterestedness.

"What better could he do with it?" replied the young man. "My mind was fully made up not to accept a shilling of it. The same objection," he added, "cannot apply to Miss Boothroyd, whom he has so deeply wronged."

Forty-eight hours after the events we have described, there were two persons in London exceedingly puzzled by letters from Meldown Park. The first was the reader's old acquaintance, Peter Mangles. Never in the course of his life had the worthy clerk felt so completely at a loss to comprehend his employer. He perused the missive twice, folded it carefully, placed it in his desk, then drew it forth again to be perused a third, and even a fourth time.

"Dear me, dear me!" he muttered to himself, "what can Richard mean by writing in such an incomprehensible way. I am to order the servants to get his town house ready to receive him in two days; that's plain enough. I can understand his being tired of the country, but what can he mean by this?"

"I intend to give a large party on Christmas-day, and have dispatched the invitations from here. I must trust to you to see that arrangements are made on a scale commensurate with the importance of the affair."

"What affair?" demanded Peter, to himself, at the same time throwing the letter upon the desk; "how can any man in his senses write in such an unbusiness-like style?"

Again he took up the offending sheet of paper, and finished reading the contents.

"Congratulate me, my valued friend. I am no longer a lonely being. It is true, happiness comes late; but it has dawned at last."

"What am I to congratulate him about?" exclaimed the old man, pettishly. "He was rich enough before, and no accession of wealth—even if he has come into any—can bring happiness. He must be mad! But it all comes of living in the country. Men never get such flighty ideas who live in the city."

By slow degrees a dreadful suspicion began to insinuate itself into the brain of Peter Mangles: it was neither more nor less than that his employer had got married. So strong did the conviction grow upon him, that several, certainly not very complimentary nor congratulatory, observations, in which the words "Old donkey," or ones which sounded very like them, escaped his lips.

"Married! he must be married!" he repeated; "nothing but marriage or bankruptcy can explain Richard's writing such an unbusiness-like letter. The old sin, pride, has been at work again. I knew he regretted that Mary was not a boy—as if she could help it. Married! doubtless under the ridiculous notion of having an heir to bear his name. Well, well, well, some artful creature has entangled him in her meshes—a widow, most likely a widow."

So engrossed and upset was the old clerk by this idea, that he absolutely made a wrong entry in the ledger, a thing which had only occurred once before during the many years he had kept the books. His indignation, however, did not prevent his attending to the directions of his employer.

Rachel, too, had received a letter, in which her father invited her, together with her husband and Mary, to dine with him at his residence in London on Christmas-day.

"Let me see you wear your long-forgotten smiles," added the writer, in the concluding paragraph. "I have a present both for you and my granddaughter."

"A present!" sighed the mother of our hero. "gold—gifts—alas! what sorrow at one time might they not have spared me!"

THE DOVE.

SWEET dove, that homeward winging
O'er endless waves thy lonely way,
Now hither bend'st thee, bringing
The long-sought olive spray:
It tells that love still reigns above,
That God doth not his own forget,
That mercy's beam upspringing
Shall light the lost world yet.

And see in heaven ascending,
Yon radiant bow of peace unfurl'd,
Like love's bright arms extending
To clasp a weeping world.
Hail, union bright of mist and light,
True type of sinners' hopes and tears:
When light celestial blending
Draws glory out of tears.

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

TO YOUNG MEN: STARTING IN LIFE.

The first great lesson a young man should learn is that he knows nothing. The earlier and the more thoroughly this lesson is learnt the better. A home-bred youth, growing up in the light of parental admiration, with everything to foster his vanity and self-esteem, is surprised to find, and often unwilling to acknowledge, the superiority of other people. But he is compelled to learn his own insignificance; his airs are ridiculed, his blunders exposed, his wishes disregarded, and he is made to cut a very sorry figure, until his self-conceit is abased, and he feels that he knows nothing.

When a young man has thoroughly comprehended the fact that he knows nothing, and that intrinsically he is but of little value, the next lesson is that the world cares nothing about him. He is the subject of no man's overwhelming admiration; neither petted by the one sex, nor envied by the other, he has to take care of himself. He will not be noticed till he becomes noticeable; he will not become noticeable until he does something to prove that he is of some use to society. No recommendations or introduction will give him this, or ought to give him this; he must do something to be recognised as somebody.

There is plenty of room for men in the world, but there is no room for idlers. Society is not very particular what a man does, so long as he does something useful to prove himself, to be a man; but it will not take the matter on trust.

There is no surer sign of an unmanly and cowardly spirit than a vague desire for help—a wish to depend, to lean on somebody, and enjoy the fruits of other people's industry. There are multitudes of young men who indulge in dreams of help from some quarter coming in at a convenient moment to enable them to secure the success in life which they covet. The vision haunts them of some benevolent old gentleman with a pocket full of money, a box full of scrip, a trunk full of mortgages, and a mind remarkably appreciative of merit and genius, who will, perhaps, give or lend them from one thousand to ten thousand pounds, with which they may commence business and go on swimmingly. Perhaps he will take a different turn and send them to college, from which they will emerge into ecclesiastical popularity, and rise up to a fat bishopric or deanery, at least.

One of the most painful sights in the world is that of a young man with a strong constitution and a presentable figure, standing with his hands in his pockets longing for help. There are positions in which the most independent spirit may gracefully and gratefully accept assistance; may, in fact, as a choice of evils, desire it; but for a man who is able to help himself, to seek help from others, is positive proof that he has been unfortunately trained, and that an indolent bias exists in his character. Let us not be misunderstood; we would not inculcate the pride of personal independence, which in its sensitiveness repels the good offices of friends—what we condemn in a young man, is the habit of dependence which makes him anxious to accept as a favour those things which he might readily acquire by his own industrial exertions. A man who willingly receives assistance, especially if he has applied for it, invariably sells himself to his benefactor, unless his patron happens to be a man of sense, who is giving absolutely necessary assistance to one whom he knows to be both sensitive and honourable.

When a young man has ascertained the fact that he knows nothing, and that the world cares nothing about him; that his success in life must depend on his own exertions; and that he must look to himself, and not to others, for assistance, he is in a fair position for beginning life.

The next lesson is that of patience. A man must learn to wait as well as to work; and to be content with those means of advancement in life which he may use with integrity and honour. Patience is one of the most difficult lessons to learn. It is natural for the mind to look for immediate results.

Let this, then, be understood at starting: that the patient conquest of difficulties which rise in the regular and legitimate channels of business and enterprise is not only essential in securing the success which a young man seeks in life, but essential also to that preparation of the mind requisite for the enjoyment of success, and for retaining them when gained. It is the general rule, in all the world, and in all time, that unearned success is a curse.

It is the rule also that the process of earning success shall be the preparation for its conservation and enjoyment. So, day by day, and week by week; so, month after month, and year after year, WORK ON;

and in that process gain strength and symmetry, nerve and knowledge, that when success, bravely and patiently acquired, shall be yours, it shall find you prepared to receive and to keep it. The development of all your mental and moral qualities in the brave battle of life will amply reward you for the struggle. It will help to make a MAN of you; and give you not only self-respect but the respect of your fellows and the public.

FRENCH LESSONS;

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH.

CHAPTER XXIV

"You have a very pleasing subject for your vocabulary to-day, Robert," said George, at the beginning of the French lesson. "I am going to tell you the names of fruit and trees. Now, I hope you remember a rule I gave you some time ago, that all trees are masculine; but this is by no means the case with all fruits."

"Now sit down and begin to write. I shall direct you to place the fruit immediately under the tree that produces it; but some trees have no fruit worth mentioning, for instance, the acacia, the witch elm, and the cedar. Nevertheless, you should be acquainted with their names. Let us begin with the elm."

TREES AND FRUIT.

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.
An elm	Un orme
A poplar	Un peuplier
An oak	Un chêne
An acorn	Un gland
An apricot-tree	Un abricotier
An apricot	Un abricot
An almond-tree	Un amandier
An almond	Une amande
A pineapple	Un ananas
An alder	Un aune
A birch	Un bouleau
A cedar	Un cèdre
A cherry-tree	Un cerisier
A cherry	Une cerise
A bigaroon	Un bigarreau
A gingee	Une gingee
A witch elm	Un charme
A chestnut-tree	Un châtaignier
A chestnut	Une châtaigne
A lemon-tree	Un citron
A lemon	Un dattier
A palm-tree	Une datte
A date	Un érable
A maple	Un figuier
A fig-tree	Une figue
A fig	Un fige
An ash	Une fraise
A strawberry	Une framboise
A raspberry	Un hêtre
A beech	Une faine
A beech-nut	Un marronnier
A sweet chestnut-tree	Un marronnier d'Inde
A horse chestnut-tree	Un marron
A sweet chestnut	Un mûrier
A mulberry-tree	Une mûre
A mulberry	Une mure de ronce
A blackberry	Un nœlle
A medlar-tree
A medlar

"Stop here, Robert," said the preceptor, "you know I do not like to overburden your memory, and in order to furnish you with a good stock of words, I wish you always to learn the daily portion of the vocabulary by heart. At your next lesson you can finish writing out the names of trees and fruits, and then I shall have to impart to you a few French idioms relating to the subject of fruit. It is now high time we should think of the exercise. You are still writing about the adjectives, and I will now give you some rules relating to the degrees of signification or comparison."

"Adjectives have three degrees of comparison—the positive, the comparative, and the superlative."

"The positive is the state of the adjective when it expresses the quality of the noun without increasing or diminishing it. The comparative (which derives its name from the fact of its expressing a comparison between nouns) may be considered under three different heads. First, the comparison of equality; then, the comparison of superiority, and thirdly, the comparison of inferiority."

"The comparison of equality may be formed by adding 'as,' aussi, to the positive, 'Il est aussi bon que vous,' 'He is as good as you.'

"We English people often form the comparison of superiority or inferiority by the addition of er to the positive. This manner of forming either of these comparatives is never adopted by the French. For these comparatives they use a mode of expression familiar to ourselves, for they form their comparative 'more,' by plus, and 'less,' by moins. We say 'Augustus is richer than Alfred,' in French this is, 'Auguste est plus riche qu'Alfred.' 'Copper is less precious than silver,' is translated, 'Le cuivre est moins précieux que l'argent.'

"Should you wish to use more or less as an adverb of quality, in the sense of more than, less than, you must translate than by de. Example: 'This desk cost me more than two pounds;' 'Ce pupitre me coûta plus de deux livres.'

"Good," "bad," and "little," adjectives which form their comparatives irregularly in English, also depart from the general rule in French, thus, 'good, better,' become 'bon, meilleur.' 'Bad, worse,' are in French 'mauvais, pire,' and 'little, less,' are rendered by 'petit, moindre.'

"The superlative expresses the quality of the noun in the highest degree. There are two superlatives, the absolute and the relative. By placing before the positive 'très, fort, or bien' (in English very), you may form the absolute superlative thus, 'London is a very fine city,' 'Londres est une très belle ville.'

"We generally form the superlative relative by adding 'st' or 'est,' but this would have a very absurd effect in French, in which language the superlative relative is formed by the use of adverbs in the superlative degree, preceded by an article. I will give you an illustration of this rule. 'Rome was the most powerful of cities,' 'Rome était la plus puissante des villes.' 'You are the least of the three,' 'Vous êtes le moins grand des trois.' 'He is the worst of the class,' 'Il est le pire de la classe.'

"If you remember these rules, Robert, you will not find much difficulty in the following exercise."

EXERCISE.

DEGREES OF SIGNIFICATION IN ADJECTIVES.

1. Ignorant men are more conceited than others. 2. The Rhone is much more rapid than the Seine. 3. You are younger than your brother. 4. The simplicity of nature is more pleasing than all the embellishments of art. 5. The rose is not less beautiful than the tulip, but the tulip is more gaudy. 6. I am less subject to the tooth-ache than brilliant. 7. Mistress C is more than sixty. I did not think she was more than thirty. 8. The consumption of bread in Paris is not more than three hundred and twenty-eight millions and five hundred thousand pounds a year. 9. America has more than one hundred men-of-war. 10. France has not less than sixty thousand sailors. 11. I (should think there were not) less than six hundred people at the concert last night. 12. I think that Miss C is as pretty as her sister. 13. I am not so young as I look. 14. Lisbon is not so large nor so populous as Paris. 15. Your son will never be so tall as you.

LE CORRIGE.

1. Les hommes ignorants sont plus vains que les autres.
2. Le Rhône est beaucoup plus rapide que la Seine.
3. Vous êtes plus jeune que votre frère.
4. La simplicité de la nature est plus agréable que tous les embellissements de l'art.
5. La rose n'est pas moins belle que la tulipe, mais la tulipe est plus brillante.
6. Je suis moins sujet au mal-de-dents que je l'étais.
7. Madame C a plus de soixante ans.
8. La consommation de pain dans Paris n'est pas de plus de trois cent vingt-huit millions cinq cent mille livres par an.
9. L'Amérique a plus de cent vaisseaux de guerre.
10. La France n'a pas moins de soixante mille marins.
11. Je crois qu'il n'y avait pas moins de six cent personnes hier soir au concert.
12. Je pense que Mademoiselle C est aussi jolie que sa sœur.
13. Je ne suis pas aussi (or si) jeune que je le parais.
14. Lisbon n'est pas aussi (or si) grand ni si populeux que Paris.
15. Votre fils ne sera jamais aussi (or si) grand que vous.

"Now, Robert, let us look after our travellers. We find them preparing for breakfast."

CONTINUATION OF
LE VOYAGE À PARIS.

- | ENGLISH. | FRENCH. |
|--|--|
| Now let us breakfast. | A présent déjeunons. |
| What will you take? Will you breakfast in the French style, and eat fish, fowl, fruit, and cheese, and drink "Chablis" wine? | Que voulez-vous prendre. Est-ce que vous voulez déjeuner à la Française, et manger du poisson, de la volaille, du fruit, du fromage, et boire du vin de Chablis? |

* Est-ce que, "is it," is used in asking a question; but it serves less to interrogate than to give expression; for the sentence would be complete without it.

No, I thank you; I shall take none of all that this morning.

As you please. Let us have a plain English breakfast.

We will have some coffee, some rolls, some eggs, and some cutlets.

Let me have the pleasure of sending you another cup of coffee.

It is Mocha. I know you will like it.

The eggs are new laid. I have made an excellent breakfast.

I hope you have not finished. I am much obliged to you. I have finished.

I want to see this fine city. I shall be delighted to accompany you.

Really you are very kind. I will show you the wonders of Paris.

We have a great deal to see. Let us arrange the order of our walks.

Shall we begin our excursions to-day? Willingly. I will come and fetch you at noon.

Non, je vous remercie bien; je ne prendrai rien de tout cela ce matin.

Comme vous voulez. Déjeunons tout simplement à l'Anglaise.

Nous aurons du café, des petits pains, des œufs, et des côtelettes.

Que j'ai le plaisir de vous envoyer encore une tasse de café.

C'est du Moka. Je sais que vous le trouverez bon.

Les œufs sont frais. J'ai fait un excellent déjeuner.

Je me flatte que vous n'avez pas fini. Je vous suis bien obligé. J'ai fini.

Je voudrais voir cette grande ville. Je serai charmé de vous accompagner.

Vraiment vous êtes fort aimable. Je vous ferais voir ce que Paris contient de remarquable.

Nous avons beaucoup à voir. Régions l'ordre de nos promenades.

Commencerons nous nos courses aujourd'hui? Volontiers. J'irai vous prendre à midi.

RULES FOR PRONUNCIATION.

OF THE SOUND y. (See the sound i.)

The two vowels e, u, combined together, form a sound nearly similar to that of the English u in fur, &c.

This sound exists in the words heure, hour, bonheur, happiness, Europe, Europe, &c.

The same sound is also produced by the following combinations of letters: œu, in œuf; egg; œi, in œillet, carnation; uei, in œueil, &c.

The combination eu, followed by the letter r, produces a sound exactly similar to that of u in the English word fur, and will be found marked (13).

Thus the sound eu is represented by œu, œu, œi, uei.

OF THE SOUND œ.

The sound œ is somewhat similar to the preceding, only a little deeper, and is produced by closing the lips a little more than for the preceding. It is found in the following French word: jeûne, fasting; and has no corresponding sound in English.

This sound is also produced by the following combinations: œud, in œud, knot; œufs, in œufs, eggs; œue, in œue; œux, in œux, eyes; œut, in œut, he wishes.

The assistance of a teacher is necessary in order to the right apprehension of the several variations of this sound, as well as that marked (13).

Thus the sound œ is represented as follows: œu, œud, œufs, œue, œux, œut.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON XXIII.

582. Is the same eye-glass used in the examination of all objects?—It is not; telescopes are furnished with several eye-glasses, to be used in looking at different bodies and in different states of the atmosphere.

583. Does a common SPY-GLASS differ in any respect from a telescope for viewing the stars?—It has additional glasses inside of the tube to make objects, seen through it, appear erect.

584. How does a REFLECTING TELESCOPE differ from that which has just been described?—A large con-

* J'irai vous prendre, "I will come for you," is a French idiom deserving attention. In English we use the verb come with reference to the person to whom we speak; thus, speaking to a person we meet, we say, "I will come and see you to-morrow," meaning at the person's house. The French, on the contrary, speak with reference to the place and not to the person, and say J'irai vous voir demain. After signifying (in this view of the case) to move from a place in which they are to one in which they are not.

cave mirror takes the place of the object-glass; this mirror is at the bottom of a long hollow tube which rests on the ground.

585. Where does the observer stand?—He stands with his back towards the object, at the elevated mouth of the tube; and looks through the eye-glass at the image thrown just before it by the concave mirror.

586. The largest reflecting telescope that has ever been made was constructed by Lord Rosse, an Irish nobleman, and is of enormous size—give its dimensions.—The mirror is 6 feet across; the tube is 7 feet in diameter, and 52 feet long. The highest magnifying power of this monster telescope is about 9,000.

Fig. 43.

587. The essential parts of the eye are represented in Fig. 43—describe it.—The eye is a hollow ball composed of several membranes, and filled with a transparent liquid; within this is suspended a semi-liquid mass, of the shape of a lens, and called the Crystalline Lens. This is seen at g.

588. What is the action of the eye on a pencil of rays proceeding to it from any point of a luminous object?—The rays are all made to converge to a point on the back part of the eye.

589. What is formed on the back part of the eye?—An inverted image or picture of the object.

590. What is spread over the back part of the eye to receive it?—The Retina. This is a fine network of fibres proceeding from the optic nerve that communicates with the brain.

591. What lies immediately in front of the crystalline lens?—An opaque screen with a hole in its centre, through which the light passes.

592. What is the screen called?—The Iris; the round opening at its centre is called the Pupil of the eye. The pupil is the aperture or window of the eye.

593. Is the pupil always of the same size?—It contracts when the light becomes strong, and dilates when it grows feeble; so as always to allow the proper quantity of light to pass into the eye.

594. What produces this change?—The stimulus of the light upon the nerves of the iris either directly or by transmission from the retina.

595. Why do we see more distinctly in the evening, after we have been out in the dark a little while, than we did at first?—Because the pupil dilates gradually. On the other hand, if we come from the dark into the presence of a strong light we are dazzled at first by it, because the pupil does not contract instantly.

THE CABIN-BOY: A SHIP-MASTER'S STORY.

On my way across the Sound I fell in with two old sea-captains—John Streeter and Asa Morton—with whom I had some slight acquaintance. Streeter was about three-score, and had followed the sea during most of his life. Morton was considerably younger, but still a seaman of much experience. The subject of the abolition of flogging in our navy came up in course of conversation, and Captain Morton expressed himself very decidedly in favour of keeping up that time-honoured institution the cat-o'-nine-tails.

"I am not prepared to say," remarked Captain Streeter, in reply, "that the condition of our men-of-warships will be in every case benefited by the abolition of flogging, though I am sure that it might be so. I mean that the officers have it within their power to do away with nearly all kinds of punishment—I mean, of course, for such offences as are usually punished on shipboard."

"For my part," returned Morton, "I should not care to take command of a ship if the power to punish refractory seamen as I thought proper were taken from me."

"Well," resumed Captain Streeter, "I used to think just so. In fact there were few masters more passionate or severe than I was. Men used to run away from me, and, on more than one occasion, my very life has been in danger from the vengeance of men whom I had abused. I used the cat and the rope's end almost as freely as I used my tongue; and I used to wonder how it happened that I always had the luck to get such bad men.

"When I was about forty years of age I took command of the ship Petersham. She was an old craft, and had seen full as much service as she was capable of seeing with safety; but her owners were willing to trust a valuable cargo in her, so I would not refuse to trust myself. We were bound to Liverpool, and nothing unusual happened until about the eighth day out, when we ran foul of a small iceberg. It was early in the morning, before sunrise, and not above six or eight feet of the ice was out of the water, it having been nearly all melted away in the warmer water of the Gulf-stream. I did not think that we had sustained any injury, for the shock was very slight; but I was very angry, and gave the look-out a severe punishment, without stopping to inquire whether he could have seen the berg in season to escape it.

"My cabin-boy was named Jack Withers. He was fourteen years of age, and this was his first voyage. I had taken him from a widowed mother, and had promised her that I would see him well treated—that was, if he behaved himself. He was a bright, quick, intelligent lad; but I soon made myself believe that he had an awful disposition. I fancied that he was the most stubborn piece of youthful humanity that I had ever come across. I made up my mind that he had never been properly governed, and I forthwith resolved to break him in. I told him I'd curb his temper for him before I had done with him. In reply he told me that I might kill him if I liked; and I flogged him with the end of the mizzen-topgallant halliards till he could hardly stand. I asked him if he had got enough, and he told me that I might flog more if I wished it. I felt a strong temptation to throw the boy overboard, but at that moment he staggered back against the mizzen-mast from absolute weakness, and I left him to himself. When I reasoned calmly about that boy's disposition I was forced to acknowledge that he was one of the smartest and most faithful lads I had ever seen. When I asked him to do anything he would start off like a rocket; but when I roughly ordered him to do it, then came the disposition with which I found fault.

"One day, when it was very near noon, I spoke to him, and told him to go below and bring up my quadrant. He was looking over the quarter-rail, and I knew he did not hear me, and the next time I spoke I ripped out an oath, and intimated that if he didn't move I'd help him.

"I didn't hear ye," he said, with rather an independent tone.

"No words," said I.

"I s'pose I can speak," he retorted, moving slowly towards the companion-way.

"His look, and his words, and the slow, careless manner in which he moved, fired me in a moment, and I grasped him by the collar.

"Speak to me again like that," said I, "and I'll flog you within an inch of your life!"

"You can flog away," he replied, as firm and undaunted as a rock.

"And I did flog him. I caught up the end of the first rope that came handy, and beat him till my arm fairly ached. But he never even winced.

"How's that?" said I.

"There's a little more life in me yet than you'd better flog out," was his reply.

"And I beat him again. I beat him till he sank from my hand against the rail; and then I sent one of the men after my quadrant. When it came, and I had adjusted it for my observation, I found that the sun was already past the meridian, and that I was too late. This added fuel to the fire of my madness, and quickly seizing the lad by the collar, I led him to the main hatchway, and had the hatch taken off. I then thrust him down and swore that I would keep him there until his stubbornness was broken. The hatch was then put on, and I went into the cabin. I suffered a good deal that afternoon—not with any compunctions for what I had done, but with my own temper and bitterness. It made me mad to think that I could not conquer that boy—that I could not break down his cool, stern opposition. 'But I will do it,' I said to myself. 'By the heavens above me, I'll starve him into it, or he shall die under the operation!'

"After supper I went to the hatchway, and called out to him, but he returned me no answer. So I closed the hatch, and went away. At ten o'clock I called again, and again I got no answer. I might have thought the flogging had taken away his senses, had not some of the men assured me that they had heard him, not an hour before, talking to himself. I did not trouble him again until the next morning; but I went to the hatchway after breakfast, and called out to him once more. I heard nothing from him, nor could I see him—I had not seen him since I put him down there. I called out several times, but he would make me no answer; and yet the same men told me that they had heard him talk that very morning. He seem to be calling for them to help him. He would ask them for help, but he would not ask me. I meant to break him into it. 'He'll beg before he'll starve,' I thought; and so I determined that he should stay there. I supposed he had crawled forward to the fore-castle bulkhead in order to make the sailors hear him. Some of the men asked to be permitted to go down and look after him, but I refused. I threatened to punish the first man who dared to go down.

"At noon I went again, and as he did not answer me this time, I resolved that he should come to the hatchway and ask for me ere I went any more. The day passed away, and when evening came again I began to be startled. I thought of how many good qualities the boy had; and I thought of his widowed mother. He had been thirty-six hours in the hold, and all of forty hours without food or drink. He must be too weak to cry out now. It was hard for me to give up, but if the boy died there from absolute starvation, it might go harder with me still. So at length I made up my mind to go and see him. It was not quite sundown when I had the hatch taken off, and I jumped down upon the boxes alone. A little way forward I saw a space where Jack might have gone down, and to that point I crawled on my hands and knees. I called out here, but could hear no answer. A short distance further was a wider space, which I had entirely forgotten, but which I now remembered had been left open on account of a break in the flooring of the hold, which would have let anything that might have been stowed there rest directly upon the outer planking of the ship.

"To this place I made my way, and looked down. I heard the splashing of water and thought I could detect a sound like the incoming of a tiny jet or stream. At first I could see nothing, but as soon as I became used to the dim light I could distinguish the faint outlines of the boy at some distance below me. He seemed to be sitting upon the broken floor, with his feet stretched out against a cask. I called out to him, and I thought he looked up.

"Jack," I said, "are you there?"

"And he answered me, in a faint, weary tone—

"Yes; help me! For Heaven's sake, help me! Bring men, and bring a lantern; the ship has sprung a leak!"

"I hesitated, and he added, in a more eager tone—

"Make haste; I can hold it till you come back."

"I waited to hear no more, but hurried on deck as soon as possible, and returned with a lantern and three men. I leaped down beside the boy, and when I saw it all I could hardly believe the evidence of my own senses. Three of the timbers were completely worm-eaten to the very heart, and one of the outer planks had been broken, and would burst in at any moment the boy might leave it. He sat there, with his back upon it, and his feet braced against the cask before him. Half-a-dozen little jets of water were streaming in about him, and he was wet to the skin. I saw that the plank must burst in the moment the strain was removed from it, so I had my men brace themselves against it before I lifted him up. Other men were called down with planks, and spikes, and adzes, and, with much care and much trouble, we finally succeeded in stopping the leak, and averting the danger. The plank which had been stove in was six feet long by eight inches wide, and would have let in a stream of water of that capacity. It would have been beyond our reach long ere we could have discovered it, and would have sunk us in a very short time. I knew it must be where the iceberg had hit us.

"Jack Withers was taken to the cabin, and there he managed to tell me his story. Shortly after I put him in the hold he crawled forward, and when his eyes became used to the dim glimmer that came through the dead-lights, he looked about for a snug place in which to lie, for his limbs were stiff and sore. He went to sleep, and when he awoke he heard a faint sound, like water streaming through a small hole. He went to the open space in the cargo, and looked down, and he was sure that he saw a small jet of water spurting up from the ship's bottom. He leaped down, and in a few moments found that the timbers had given wholly away, and that the stream was increasing in size. He placed his hand upon the plank, and found it broken, and also discovered that the pressure of the water without was forcing it inward. He had sense enough to see that if it gained an inch more it must all go, and the ship must be lost, and perhaps all hands perish! And he saw, too, that if he could keep the broken plank in its place he might stop the incoming flood. So he sat himself upon it, and braced his feet against the cask; and then he called for help. But he was so far away—so low down—with such a dense mass of cargo about him—that his voice scarcely reached other ears than his own. Some of the men heard him, but they thought he was talking with himself!

"And there he had sat, with his feet thus braced, for four-and-twenty long, dreary hours, with the water spurting in tiny streams all over him, drenching him to the skin. He had thought several times of going to the hatchway and calling for help; but he knew that the broken plank would be forced in if he left it, for he could feel it heave beneath him. His strength was failing him—his limbs were racked with pain, but he would not give up. I asked him if he should not have given up if I had not come as I did. He answered me that he could not have done it while he had life in him. He said he thought not of himself—he was ready to die—but he would save the rest if he could; and he had saved us—surely saved us from a watery grave.

"That boy lay sick in the cabin for many days—sick almost unto death; but I nursed him with my own hands—nursed him all through his delirium; and when his reason returned, and he could sit up and talk, I bowed myself before him, and humbly asked his pardon for all the wrong I had done him. He threw his arms about my neck, and told me if I would be good to him he would never give me cause for offence: and he added, as he sat up again, 'I am not a coward—I could not be a dog!'

"From that hour I never forgot those words. And from that hour I have never struck a blow on board my ship. I make my men feel that they are men—that I so regard them, and that I wish to make them as comfortable and happy as possible; and I have not failed to gain their respect and confidence. I give no undue licence, but make my crew feel that they have a friend and a superior in the same person. For nine years I sailed in three different ships, and had the very same crew all the while. A man could not be hired to leave me save for an officer's berth.

"And Jack Withers remained with me thirteen years. He was my cabin-boy; one of my foremast hands; my second mate; and the last time he sailed with me he refused the command of a new barque because he would not be separated from me. But he is a captain now, and one of the best this country ever afforded. Such, gentlemen, is my experience in government and discipline on shipboard."

LORD CRANWORTH.

ONE of the most ancient offices still existing is that of Lord High Chancellor of England. Arthur, who is almost fabulous himself, is said to have had a chancellor. Such an office is known to have existed in the time of the Anglo-Saxon kings. Lord Campbell, in his valuable work, commemorates a hundred and sixty-seven chancellors. Memorials of the Anglo-Saxon chancellors are scanty; but, from the date of the Conquest to the present time, we have nearly an unbroken series—that is, from Lord Chancellor Maurice, who held the great seal in 1067, to Lord Chancellor Chelmsford, the present occupier of the woolsack. The office was formerly held by an ecclesiastic. The first lay chancellor in England was Fitz-Gilbert, in the days of Queen Matilda; the next was Sir Robert de Bouchier, in the time of Edward III. Bishop Williams, in the reign of James I., is the only Protestant divine who has ever held the great seal.

The Lord Chancellor is by prescription the Speaker of the House of Peers. This privilege has been attached to the office for many centuries. Anciently the chancellor addressed the two houses on the meeting of parliament; but this practice has been long discontinued; the office has undergone very considerable change, and, from being the stepping-stone to a bishopric, has become the crowning-point in the career of a successful barrister.

The first lay-lord ever created was Lord Scrope, in the reign of Richard II. Since that time their number has considerably increased. Much of the best blood in the peerage has a legal origin. There are now sitting in the House of Lords several descended from chancellors in the direct line. There are, Earl Fortescue from Sir John Fortescue (1789); the Marquis of Winchester from Sir William Paulet (1551); the Earl of Bradford from Sir Orlando Bridgman (1815); the Earl of Shaftesbury from Lord Shaftesbury (1672); the Earl of Winchelsea from Lord Nottingham (1628); the Earl of Guildford from Lord Guildford (1752); Earl Cowper from Lord Cowper (1718); the Earl of Macclesfield from Lord Macclesfield (1721); Marquis Camden from Lord Camden (1812); the Earl of Lovelace from Lord King (1838); the Earl of Hardwicke from Lord Hardwicke (1754); Earl Talbot from Lord Talbot (1784); Earl Bathurst from Lord Bathurst (1772); the Earl of Eldon from Lord Eldon (1821); and Lord Erskine from the illustrious peer of that name (1806).

There are, besides, several ex-lord chancellors. In this respect, Lord Brougham occupies the first place. Who can forget the Herculean labour which he accomplished while presiding over that tribunal whose currents had stagnated in consequence of the "everlasting doubts" of Lord Eldon? who can forget the excellent service which he rendered to suitors and to the country at large, by clearing out the channel and setting the stream flowing? who can forget the rapidity with which he set about the work he had undertaken—being sworn in as chancellor at twelve o'clock, and at six of the same day laying on the table a bill for the reform of abuses in the Court of Chancery?

As an ex-lord chancellor, we notice also in the peers that sound, constitutional lawyer, Lord Cranworth. Without any of the brilliant genius and remarkable capacity which distinguished Lord Brougham, Cranworth, by his thorough knowledge of the law, his upright character, his consistent public and private life, was well fitted for the honourable position which he occupied during the late administration.

Lord Cranworth is the son of the late Rev. Edmund Rolfe of Cranworth, and is related to the illustrious Lord Nelson. He was born in 1790, commenced his education at Bury St. Edmund's, and continued it at Winchester, and Trinity College, Cambridge. He was elected a fellow of Downing College in 1812; in the same year he took the degree of B.A., and became M.A. three years later. In 1816 he was called to the bar. There his professional ability soon obtained for him an extensive practice. His clear intellect, profound legal knowledge, and sound judgment won the respect of the bar and the favour of the attorneys. He was a rising man, a man who would "achieve greatness"—not by some sudden and extraordinary effort, but by laborious exertion and steady perseverance. In 1832 he became Queen's Counsel; in 1834 was appointed Solicitor-General. A change of ministry occurred shortly afterwards, but Cranworth was re-appointed, and held office till 1839, when he became one of the Barons of the Exchequer. On the resignation of Lord Cottenham, Cranworth was appointed one of the commissioners for holding the great seal; and, in 1850, succeeded Sir Launcelot Shadwell as Vice Chancellor of England. Towards the close of the same year he was raised to the peerage by the title of Baron Cranworth. In 1851 he was nominated one of the Lord Justices of the Court of Appeal, and in the following year gained the highest attainable position of the aspiring lawyer, being appointed Lord High Chancellor of England. This office he continued to hold until the resignation of the Palmerston ministry.

Lord Cranworth is an earnest liberal, but no violent partisan, and has throughout his very prosperous career gained the respect and friendship of men of all shades of political opinion.

PICTURES FROM HISTORY.

CHARLES MARTEL.

In the early days of France, the oldest and most confidential officers of the sovereign were called the Mayors of the Palace. They superintended all the other servants; summoned the king's vassals to the assembly or the field; and were the leaders of the state in civil and military affairs. But they were dependent on the king, and while his majesty's finger beckoned, and his majesty's foot expelled, they were exceedingly useful in the maintenance of the royal prerogative. Clothaire, however, was induced to make their office permanent; and a mayor was intrusted for life with the seals of power. The privilege of election was wrested from the king and vested in the people. Their power and influence was thus greatly increased; from disregarding the royal authority, they came to despise it; the magnificence which they assumed, eclipsed the splendour of royalty; and instead of being the creatures of the monarch, they ruled him with an iron hand. Thus a rival power grew up by the side of the crown—a dynasty of mayors.

The most illustrious of these officials was Charles, surnamed Martel (from Marteau, a hammer), so called because he fell like a hammer on his enemies, and smote them into ten thousand fragments.

The battle of Tours (732) was the most celebrated of his exploits.

The Mohammedans, or, as they were called, Arabs or Saracens, had inundated Europe. They had conquered with immense rapidity a great part of Asia, Africa, and Spain. They had entered France, pillaging and destroying in the name of the prophet, asserting the supremacy of the crescent over the cross.

Under the command of Abderaman these barbarians crossed the Pyrenees, and precipitated themselves, like a mountain torrent, upon the fair land of the Franks. Their numbers were estimated at four hundred thousand; and their harsh war-cry—"Allah!—Allah! the spoils of the Franks are ours! their children are our slaves! the widows shall mourn, and the maidens lament, for the vultures shall feed upon their heroes! Allah! Allah!"—made the cheek pale, and the heart tremble.

The population of the south of France, under the command of the Duke Eudes, hastily assumed a position of defence; but nothing could withstand the overwhelming deluge of barbarians.

They fell upon Bordeaux, took the city by force, committed it to the flames, and put its defenders to the edge of the sword.

In vain Eudes and his army strove to defend the passage of the Garonne, and afterwards that of the Dordogne; the Saracens crossed both rivers, red with the blood of the Franks, and marched for the banks of the Loire. Their ravages were unexampled; they sacked the towns, destroyed the churches and monasteries, and massacred the people without respect of age or sex.

And their battle-cry was this:—"On, on! We will water our horses in the Loire, and level the city of Paris!"

But their horses were never watered in the Loire, neither did their riders set fire to Paris.

A hammer was lifted up—a "Thor's thunder hammer"—to crush them. Charles Martel rode forth at the head of a numerous army, and gave back taunt for taunt, and blow for blow.

Charles was inspired with courage and devotion; he and his followers had sworn to deliver their land from these foes to France and Christianity; piety and patriotism equally influenced their hearts—the cross, the symbol of their faith, was emblazoned on every banner.

By this invincible host the progress of Abderaman was arrested.

For seven days the two armies encamped within sight of each other, watching as wild beasts may watch each other before they make the final spring.

The Franks were surprised by the appearance of their opponents; by their swarthy faces, oriental costume, and sabres, and by the magnificent apparel of their leaders, dressed in silken robes, and jewelled turbans, and mounted on horses that seemed to move with the speed of lightning.

The Saracens regarded the Franks with admiration; their martial bearing, simple equipment, and excellent discipline gratified the barbarians. They were a foe worthy to be conquered by the sons of Mahomet.

At last the hour of battle arrived. Abderaman advanced. The engagement began.

Said Charles Martel to his soldiers: "I have but one word to say to you: you are fighting for God, for France, for your wives and your children!"

Abderaman and the Saracens came onward like the waves of the sea, sweeping over the plains, and breaking, as the waves break upon the rocks, on the iron front offered by the Franks.

Immovable and steadfast stood those men of iron, like a rock in the sea, passively hurling back the advancing billows.

Three times Abderaman charged the Franks, and three times he and his cavalry retreated before the iron front opposed to them.

The Saracens then changed their tactics. They attacked the Franks in different places at one time, striving to shake them by the rapidity and variety of their assaults, and they so far succeeded that the mass of iron was moved.

A shout of triumph was raised—"Allah Akbar! God is great!"

But the triumph of the Saracens was short-lived. The iron mass had moved, only that it might be lifted up—a terrible hammer, with death in every blow—to descend with frightful violence on the infidels.

The tide of battle was changed. The Saracens were no longer as the ocean beating on the rock; they were as the sand over which the Frankish waves were rising. The Franks rose up in their power, and their vengeance and the slaughter was terrible.

The overwhelming number of the Saracens might probably have achieved a victory after all, but for an ingenious stratagem of Charles Martel.

Charles sent a messenger to Duke Eudes, and bade him surround and set fire to the infidel camp. His order was immediately obeyed.

In the heat of the battle a cry was raised: "The camp is in flames!" and the Saracens fled. They fled in haste and disorder. Their pursuers were close upon them, and the carnage was frightful. The Franks fought like the children of Pharamond. They sang, and shouted, and uttered screams of joy, as they saw the green banner red with blood; as they saw on every side acres of slain spread out as a goodly feast for the wild birds. Abderaman was struck down and slain.

Thus the Saracens were defeated and driven out, and Christianity and liberty were preserved to France.

Paris, the goodly city which the Saracens had sworn to destroy, celebrated the victory with grand rejoicing, and welcomed the conqueror with every manifestation of gratitude. His march to Paris was an ovation; his entry into that city a triumph worthy of Caesar.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,

SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER CII.

And ye sall walk in silk attire,
And braid wi' gems yer hair,
Gin ye'll consent to be my bride,
Nor think on Donald maif.

I wud na' walk in silk attire,
Nor braid wi' gems my hair;
Gin he whose faith was pledged wi' mine,
Went wrangled and grieving sair.

OLD SCOTCH SONG.

We must leave sweet Hope for a short time to the persevering assiduities of the marquis and the captain, neither of whom was at all ashamed of his devotion, nor at all disposed to take, as Tarlatan would have said, "No" for an answer.

Added to the influence of every delicate attention, and every flattering proof of preference (open and implied) from those who had never before found it hard to please the most fastidious, was the influence of Lady Glenlonely. With regard to Captain Greville, as she looked upon him as only the second hero of the romance, she was desirous he should pair off with the inferior heroine, and she was extremely anxious that Hope should not throw away, what she called, the most brilliant chance, and most glorious destiny ever offered to an obscure, dependent, and penniless girl, by a noble and true lover.

It seemed to her such a pity. "So exalted, so generous, so loveable a man as Lord Doun," she would say, and "so deeply, so truly, so passionately in love."

She would draw first a vivid description of Hope's life as the Marchioness of Doun, and then as the wife of Larky Grigg. But Hope only smiled, and said she preferred poverty with her first and only love (the early and yet deliberate choice of her heart), to regal splendour with any other man.

She amazed and shocked Lady Glenlonely, by assuring her that she preferred the poor cottage which her ladyship, in her graphic description, delighted to strip of every comfort, to all the grandeur of that life of which she felt even afraid. "Those halls, where comfort dies in vastness" had no charms for her.

Nessy Fitz-Darrell could not bear to go away, though to stay at Burnside had no charm for Hope.

She was madly jealous, and yet she thought, by remaining, to win back (what she called, and imagined to be) the fickle heart of Rashleigh Greville.

As if a woman, under the influence of a passion so disfiguring (mentally and physically), ever could conquer, or re-conquer a heart!

Lady Glenlonely pitied Nessy, and was all kindness and sympathy.

She knew it was no fault of Hope's, but yet she thought it very hard upon Nessy.

Her romance would not wind up well, if both the blonde Hope and the Brunette Nessy were not married happily at last.

Pitied and encouraged by Lady Glenlonely, Nessy resolved to stay at Burnside. In her intense and passionate sufferings there was a sort of fascination to herself, and yet she was miserable. Nessy was always an ingenious self-tormenter; she was more so than ever now.

It was martyrdom to her to sit in the room where reluctant Hope was compelled, by Lady Glenlonely, to remain at her embroidery, while Captain Greville was reading aloud, or sitting watching her, furtively sketching her sweet, fair face, sighing, gazing at her.

He was again a guest at Burnside, and a highly favoured one, for Lady Glenlonely liked him, felt for him, and hoped he would yet, if Nessy were but in the way at the right time, transfer his affections to her.

It amused her, too, to see him in the presence of the marquis, who was a great deal too much in love to attempt to disguise his feelings, hopes, wishes, and fears, and who found in Lady Glenlonely, that necessary character in all romances, a confidante.

Lord Glenlonely looked on, interested and amused, at the passionate drama enacted before him.

He listened to all that Lady Glenlonely told him.

He pitied Nessy, he admired Doun's noble love and brave independence; but yet he delighted in Hope's constancy to her dear Larky Grigg, and amazed Lady Glenlonely by saying that he believed Hope would be happier as the wife of Larky Grigg than as the Marchioness of Doun; that, as Larky's wife, she would be looked up to—as Lady Doun (however it might be disguised) she would be looked down upon.

Still, though he expressed these opinions to her ladyship, he never interfered in the least. He invited both the rivals to make Burnside their home, and neither required much pressing.

The Marquis of Doun could not believe it possible that Hope would continue firm in her refusal.

With regard to a prior attachment, Lady Glenlonely laughed at that as a romantic chimera, and he was only too ready to be persuaded to join in that laugh. Then he had a notion (acquired in the great—or, rather, little—world of fashion) that title, precedence, pomp, power, wealth, were irresistible in the eyes of woman. Perhaps they are so as a general rule, and in what is called society; but Hope was a bright exception. She thought for herself, acted for herself; her clear young head, and her warm, true heart never followed the ignis fatuus light of fashion. The day-spring from on high illumined her soul and her path.

All honour to thee, fair Hope; brave of spirit, kind, loving, true, and grateful of heart; scarce seventeen, yet capable of so sublime a constancy; proof against Lady Glenlonely's ridicule and the Marquis of Doun's flattery, conveyed both by words and deeds; and yet she was so patient, so gentle, so endearing in her refusal, that Lord Doun thought rejection from her more captivating than consent from any other.

CHAPTER CIII.

'Tis midnight; on the mountains brown
The cold, round moon shines deeply down,
Encircled by those isles of light,
So mildly, spiritually bright.
Whoever gazed upon them stuning,
And turned to earth without repining?
Nor wished for wings to flee away,
And mix with their eternal ray?

SIRGE OF CORINTH.

It was the eve of Hope's birthday. A few hours more, and she would be seventeen.

A few hours, and it would be the anniversary of that sunless morning when, at four o'clock, Hope's blue eyes opened on the carpetless floors, the narrow bed, with its coloured quilt, the clean, bare room, the kind faces (weary and pale with watching), of one of the married women's wards in Queen Charlotte's Lying-in Hospital; and about the same time her poor mother closed hers on a world in which she had wept so bitterly.

Yes, it was the eve of Hope's seventeenth birthday.

She had left the drawing-room where Lady Glenlonely and Nessy were awaiting the arrival of the gentlemen from the dinner-table (Lord Glenlonely, the marquis, and Captain Greville).

Lady Glenlonely had fallen asleep by a fire of Scotch pine logs, generally very acceptable on an autumnal evening in the Highlands.

Nessy, who now seldom said one unnecessary word to Hope, was trying the power of music to hasten the approach of the gentlemen. She was playing a brilliant fantasia on the air of "Herz-mein-herz."

The execution was much better than the expression, as it always is, with musicians of acquired talent, not natural genius. But it was a very superior and showy performance.

The brilliant runs and shakes, the rich chords and delicate chromatic scales reached Hope's ear, as she leant her fair young brow (on which a cloud of sorrow hung) against the stone mullion of the little casement of her own room.

The autumn moon was at the full, and the little old-fashioned parterre on which Hope's window looked, was bathed in such a flood of light, that she could distinguish the round faces of the dahlias, gaudy and scentless, like beauties without modesty or intellectual charms.

There were statues of white stone in this old-fashioned little garden; they were common enough by day, very rude and shapeless sculpture indeed (Flora had lost a nose, Ceres a finger, and Pomona a toe), but distance and moonlight clothed them with a spiritual beauty and a silver sheen.

Beyond the gate of this flower-garden were the wild purple heath and the distant hills.

Hope's window opened on a little terrace, which communicated by a flight of stone steps (somewhat broken and moss-grown) with the parterre. The whole thing had been planned in the long ago by the somewhat romantic and whimsical mother of that Earl of Glenlonely who had been drowned in the Gulf of Genoa, and to whose death, with that of his son and daughter, our friend the present earl (then Sir Augustus Pemberton) owed the title and estates.

This lady was the daughter of a Scotch laird; she was very young and very beautiful, when her father compelled her to break her troth-plight to a young lover of her own choosing, and wed the Earl of Glenlonely of that day.

Born on All Hallows-eve, she was supposed to possess many supernatural gifts—among others, second sight. She wrote poetry, loved the moon, and had this apartment, parterre, and terrace constructed for herself. Here she would seclude herself, month after month, from her husband, from society, and even from her children. She would roam by moonlight, not only in the parterre, but passing through the door in the garden-wall, she would fit like a shadow across the heath, and soon be "over the hills and far away." She prophesied the mode and hour of her own death—caused by the rupture of a blood-vessel—and, strange to say, she foretold that which many years later befel her son and his children. By her own entreaty, conveyed in a letter to her lord (which letter was found in her desk after her death), she was buried in a sort of avenue of yew trees, adjoining the parterre, a concession which involved the late earl in a protracted law suit, as such interment was considered illegal.

Of course, the general impression among the uneducated, and even among those who should have known better, was that both the apartments, the parterre, and the yew tree grove were haunted by the "dark lady," as she was called, on account of her always wearing black, and being of a very dark complexion, with jet black hair and eyes. The only dependent in the family who did not dread the "dark lady's" favourite haunts was our Hope Evermore. She delighted in the quaint apartments, with their moss-grown, dilapidated terrace, the parterre, the grove, the heath, and they were all gladly resigned to her.

Before Captain Greville had declared himself Hope's admirer, Nessy Fitz-Darrell used to take great pleasure in sitting by the hour with Hope in this boudoir. Sometimes, when it was chilly, they would draw their low stools to the bright crackling pinewood fire; at others, when it was sultry (and it was often winter one day and summer another), they would pace the walks of the parterre, sit in the arbour, walk arm-in-arm in the cool dark shade of the yew tree avenue, and sometimes, with the wild love of freedom common to the young, they would unlock the gate in the garden wall, and trip like fairies over the purple heath.

But since Captain Greville had proposed to Hope, Nessy had never once visited what was called the "Dark Lady's Bower."

No servant would have approached it, on any account, after dusk, and many prophesied that no good would come of Hope's intruding on the spot where the dark lady had never admitted any person, but one old Highland crone (who had the reputation of being, if not a witch, at least "na canny") to do the necessary household work.

Hope, however, in whose sweet bosom beat "the princely heart of innocence," had no such fear; she had always been a thinking, meditative child, her upturned eyes had always seemed to look beyond the skies, she had always been one of those who are "never less alone than when alone," and so she loved to watch the twilight melt beneath the moon away, from that very latticed window from which, seventy years before, the dark lady had watched it: and she felt no coward fear when the moonbeams streamed in on the very bed on which the dark lady had slept in life and in death.

We have said that Hope Evermore, having read Lady Glenlonely to sleep with a favourite old romance, called "Santo Sebastiano" (once the rage), and having seen Nussy betake herself to the piano, and her thick, red morocco music-books, stole quietly, and without a light (though it was very dark in the house), to her own and the "Dark Lady's Bower."

Burnside was a very quaint old abode, the façade and one wing being lofty and modern, but all the other parts low, dark, rambling; room within room, and closet within closet—a house full of unexpected passages, sudden steps up and down, grim old pictures frowning from the walls—a house full of family legends, and even some historical traditions.

It required some time to know the geography of the "auld hoose;" and the most difficult place to find was the "Dark Lady's Bower." Hope, however, who delighted in its quaint and romantic seclusion, and in the power of getting into the garden and on to the heath unseen by any one, soon found her way without any help, even in the dark, to her beloved retreat; and on the evening in question she suddenly left the drawing-room—its light, its music, its flowers, its bright carpets, its plate-glass windows, rich rose velvet and white lace hangings, pier-glasses, lustres, couches, bergères, ottomans, and countless beautiful nicknacks—and found herself, she scarce knew how (and it seemed to her as if an age elapsed in the meantime), gazing on the moon from her own latticed window.

Hope was dressed in white. It was a whim of Lady Glenlonely's that she should always dress for dinner in clear white muslin (French or Indian), and enlivened with blue or pink, lilac or pale green ribbons.

It was, then, in white, relieved by a few blue knots, and her very round, slender waist defined by a broad fringed sash of the same hue, that Hope met the calm gaze of the "lady-moon." Her long, abundant hair of richest gold hung in ringlets beside her sweet face; the "back hair," as Charles Dickens calls it, being knotted up behind with blue ribbon.

She was very pale, very lovely; and the tears that glittered in her large upturned eyes added to the exquisite charm of her expressive, delicate beauty.

Hope was thinking of her mother, of that very evening, seventeen years ago, of all that she—delicate, noble-hearted, virtuous lady as Hope felt she was—must have endured before she was brought to think it a mercy to be allowed admittance, in woman's hour of greatest need, and dread, and peril, to the ward of a lying-in hospital.

The most unimaginative person in the world cannot gaze long on the clear, dark azure of a moonlit sky, without feeling the sense of his soul's immortality strong within him. The bereaved look up through their tears and yearn for those whom something within, undefined and undefinable, tells them are looking down with answering love and longing.

Hope believed that she was gazing on her mother's home, and that that young mother—a sorrower on earth here, but, perhaps, a seraph in heaven now (for she was a penitent and a believer)—was watching over her child.

From the thought of that fair, hapless mother, Hope's mind wandered to her young lover, his tenderness, his truth, his untiring devotion, his brave energy, his dauntless spirit, his ambition, so touching to her, since he only aspired for her sake.

"Oh, Larky Grigg," she said, the words bursting involuntarily, unconsciously from her fond heart and parted lips, "even my dear, lost mother foresaw that we should love each other—I have heard thine say so again and again. My mother knew what men of pleasure and of fashion were. She was the victim of some gentleman's short-lived passion; he loved her well enough to wed her, and yet left her to die in a hospital. She dreaded such a fate for her unborn child, and she, in her own heart, affianced me to my Larky Grigg. Oh, Larky Grigg, my own, my brave, my fond, my beautiful, my only love,—Larky Grigg, where art thou, love?"

"I am here, Hope, angel of life and love," answered a whisper, soft as the sighing of the evening breeze.

Even in the moonlight the sweet blush of quick surprise, and the crimson glow of passionate delight suffused Hope's face and neck, and then, as no form appeared, and no step was heard, she grew white, and cold, and rigid as marble, as the thought (excusable under the circumstances) froze her blood, and translated itself into the words that "It was a spirit—his spirit, perhaps—and that he was dead. O Larky Grigg! tell me, where art thou? No, thou couldst not leave me alone—alone in this cold, cold world! oh, no, thou couldst not die, and Hope so far away! Larky Grigg, dear, dear love, speak, I implore thee, Larky!"

Hope opened the casement and stepped out on the terrace. A tall form leant in the shadow of the turret against the wall. Strong arms outspread encircle her form, and draw her gently, and fold her tenderly, to a young, warm, manly breast, and Hope knew no fear, no distrust, for she felt it was her affianced lover's embrace. Yes, Hope was weeping on the breast of Larky Grigg.

CHAPTER CIV.

Oh, love, in such a wilderness as this,
Where transport and security entwine,
Here is the empire of thy perfect bliss,
And here thou art indeed a God divine.

CAMPBELL.

Meet me by moonlight alone,
And then I will tell you a tale,
Must be told by the moonlight alone,
In the grove at the end of the vale.

OLD SONG.

They were alone, but not alone as they
Who, shut in chambers, think it loneliness.

BYRON.

A FEW moments, nay, to be candid, a few minutes elapsed, and the lovers felt nothing but that they were reunited; heard nothing but the beating of each other's hearts; were conscious of nothing but the soft, timid kiss of true, pure, first love.

Hope was the first to wake from this delicious trance, and extricating herself from her lover's arms, she said, "In the wild delight and sweet surprise of seeing you so unexpectedly, my Larky Grigg, I have forgotten to wonder or to ask what brings you here, at this hour, alone, unexpected, unannounced. Say, is anything amiss, are all the dear ones at home well?"

"At home—bless you for that word, darling. No, all are well, and yet my all depends on an interview with you. What I have to say, must be said to you alone. I have dared much, risked much, and suffered much to manage this; and other obstacles overcome, you will not refuse me what I have come on foot from London to obtain, will you, dearest? No, you will hear me; but first answer me, my angel Hope," said bold yet timid Larky, again drawing her to his breast, "can our humble roof still seem home to you, sweet love?"

"Yes, Larky," said Hope, blushing, and struggling to get free; "and it ever will be my dear, beloved, and regretted home, till you take me to another, one all our own—our very own—Larky, all, and only ours. But first tell me what brings you here, and then go round to the front entrance, and ring at the gates, and come boldly in, like the brave, frank lad you ever were, and—"

"No, no, my darling," said Larky, "that cannot be; my visit is to you alone; but I will not endanger your fair fame, sweet one, by entering your chamber, or even talking with you on this terrace, or in this garden. It seems to me a sort of liberty to take with my lord and my lady, and yet I must have a long talk with you, my sweet one. What I have to say must be said, and can be said only to you alone."

"Why cannot you go round to the front entrance," said Hope, "and ring the bell, and ask to see Hope Evermore? Even to them I am your foster-sister, and my lady, at least, knows (and blushing she hid her sweet face in his bosom) that you are my future husband."

"And hates the knowledge, Hope," said Larky, bitterly; "and detests and despises me, and thinks, oh, Hope, as I do, as all who know us must, how very unworthy am I, a rough, low-born, working man, of that everything that poet could dream of, or painter draw of, lovely and adorable, that rare union of the saint, the muse, the grace, the angel, and the woman, whose name is Hope—"

What words are these? What correct language, what eloquence, what poetry! The dear, broad, old Lancashire dialect is gone now, in pronunciation and in grammar. Larky Grigg, love-taught, self-taught Larky is far, very far beyond Captain Greville, with his modish lisp, and the marquis, with his conventional drawl.

Hope missed the old, familiar household words of the dear ragged school days, she missed above all that tender, fond, coaxing "thee" and "thou," so dear, so captivating, and so winning to woman's ear; but, as she listened with almost reverential love to the glowing language of the self-educated man, the thought crossed her mind of how Larky Grigg must have toiled, and studied, and denied himself rest and time for necessary food to have accomplished all this in so short a time.

And it was all for her! At the thought her tears gushed forth. Do not check them, sweet Hope; they become thee well.

Yield, fair girl, to the warm and womanly impulse that makes thee seize that frank, manly hand—that honest, hard-working hand, and raise it to thy warm young lips. Fear not, dear child, to link thine arm in his, to lead him, as he asked thee to do, through the garden-door out on to the moonlit heath, and there, seating him on a little sheltered mound of emerald grass (thy own favourite resting-place), think it no shame to kneel, if thy heart's gratitude and reverence prompt thee so to do—yes, to kneel, delicate and lovely lady though thou art, by all admired, by some adored—wooded by a marquis, and idolised by Captain Greville—still, being all thou art, in grace, and beauty, and virtue unparalleled, the idol of men, and fair even in woman's eyes—think it no shame to kneel before the choice of thy young heart. For worlds we would not see thee kneeling thus to king or kaiser; but Larky Grigg, the working-man, is greater than either, for he is a Christian hero. Yes, for, though he is a working-man, every vice and evil habit that besets the working-man brave Larky has uprooted and trampled upon. His presence in the workshop checks the profane word, the indecent jest, the coarse allusion. Neat, clean, and polite, he sets to his fellows a noble pattern of neatness, cleanliness, and politeness. They cannot despise him, nor call him "spoon," or "muff," or "molly," or "miss," for not one can do a hard day's work with him, or at any exercise of ingenuity or strength. Nay, more: in little difficulties that will arise connected with machinery—engines, tools, &c. &c. &c., Larky, by the application of mind to matter, and science to substance, has been often a great saving of time, money, and credit to master and man.

But Larky does not presume on the great superiority natural genius gives him over his mates; always kind, simple, ready, obliging, his clever head and helping hand are at every one's service. He is pious, without being in the least a fanatic; and though he reads his Bible, says grace before and after meat, never misses his private prayers or his church, refuses drink, balls, gaffs, public gardens, and all such evil places, and keeps himself unspotted from the world, no one calls him "saint" or "Methody." He is always sober, and yet never dull; nay, his mirth, wit, and humour had even made him the life and delight of Nailor's workshop, and the joy of his home.

But it was not this alone, though Hope knew all this well, and had often, in happy hours gone by, talked it over with his and her mother, Apple Blossom,—it was not this that made Hope feel in her woman heart that reverence for her young lover, which induced her, in the enthusiasm of her fervent nature, to sink on her knees before him, while her tears fell like rain.

It was only for one moment, though, that she knelt there, for Larky, who idolised Hope, and longed to kneel to her, could not endure the touching humility and self-abnegation of this attitude in his heart's idol, and, catching her to his bosom, kissed away her tears.

What brought Hope to her knees was the thought of what a conqueror, what a hero that man was, who, for her sake, had resisted all the pleasures that allure others, all the passions that are so many syrens in the way of a working-man's advancement; how he must have triumphed over fatigue, weariness, dejection, despair, difficulties of all kinds, and all the disheartening influences that beset the up-hill path of that noble being, THE SELF-EDUCATED MAN, before he could have eradicated every fault of expression, of grammar, and pronunciation, and been enabled to clothe the thoughts of his bright mind, and the feelings of his warm heart, in language worthy of the great master he had studied night and day (as Dr. Johnson advises all to do who wish to speak and write English to perfection), namely, Addison.

Hope thought of the nights of mental labour, following the long day of hard manual toil, and she blest Larky, and she loved, and she revered him.

She would not sit on Larky Grigg's knee, though, with gentle force, he tried to hold her there.

"Not yet, Larky," she said; "some day, some happy day to come, when I can sit there without a blush," and she took her place by his side.

"It is not late, darling," said Larky, "although the moon has risen. Can you spare me half an hour? Be sure, if what I have to say were not to me more than a matter of life and death, I would not steal on your solitude like a ghost, nor come to you like a thief in the night, but I have so much to say, I cannot tell all in less than half an hour. If you grant me that, think you, love, will you be wanted, missed, and sought for?"

"Oh, no," said Hope, "it is not eight; and I do not make tea for my lady till nine. But tell me, Larky," she said, yielding her hand to his grasp, and looking into the noble, loving face, on which the moon shone so brightly, "are you not weary, faint, hungry? I know not whether it is the pale light of the moon, or whether you do really look very white and wan. Where did you dine?"

"I have not dined at all."

"Where did you breakfast?"

"Nowhere; I have been lurking all day about the premises of Burnside, in the hope of seeing you, and I learnt from a little shepherd lad—who knows you, Hope, and has worked in your garden, and whom I led (unsuspected by himself) to talk of you—which was your room, and all the story of the 'dark lady.' I slept last night in this very heather. I came from London on foot, except an occasional lift, and have been more than a fortnight coming."

Hope rose.

"Where are you going?" asked Larky.

"Stay where you are," she said, with a pretty assumption of authority; "don't stir from this spot, Larky, good lad, as I used to say. In three minutes I will return."

She was gone, and Larky, in spite of love and the moon, was so overcome with fatigue and fasting that he sank on the heather, and fell asleep. He fell asleep with that moon smiling on a face and form which she, mistaking for those of Endymion of old (the moon's boy), might have stooped to kiss. As for Larky, a wild, sweet dream of a village bridal—himself the bridegroom, and sweet Hope the bride—was followed by a vision of a cottage home, with Hope as its mistress; and for some time after her return she stood bending over him, her soft breath on his cheek, her sweet voice in his ear, saying—

"Larky, dear Larky, look up, awake; you are so pale and cold, and wan, you frighten me. Get up, Larky, good lad," only seemed to him to be part of his dream. But Hope took him by the hand, shook him gently, and woke him at last, and then he saw that she had brought him a basket containing bread, wine, a cold chicken, a tongue, a cake, and some fruit; and, nothing loth, he obeyed her orders, to "sit up and eat and drink."

THE GOOD KNIGHT.

"SANS PEUR ET SANS REPROCHE."

NEARLY four centuries ago the fine Château de Bayard, in Dauphiny, was the noble and beautiful residence of one who was allied by birth to the best families in that province. Of his ancestors, the fields of Poitiers and Agincourt, where they "made their mark" in blood-red letters, attested to their valour; and the father of the present occupant of the château fell with six mortal wounds. Such an ancestry could not give birth to cowards; and well had Aymon Terrail proved that he was worthy of his "forbears." Connected as he was with the noblest and best blood—with those who styled themselves the "scarlet nobility"—and with a reputation for courage and bravery that none disputed, it was matter of sincere grief and sorrow when Aymon Terrail returned from the First Battle of Spurs (that of Guinegaste) with such fearful wounds as to confine him for life to the château.

Already more than fifty years old, Aymon Terrail could not but regret that in his early years he had not allied himself to some one who could now have cheered the evident desolation to which he was doomed. But the grand old château was not to remain dull or gloomy because its brave master was disabled; and as soon as he recovered from the fever of his wounds his halls were thronged with the choicest of the nobility, who brought their sons and daughters with them to greet the old soldier in his home.

Among these last was a meek-eyed, gentle girl, who had almost passed the period of young maidenhood. In her youth, it was said, she had refused several splendid offers for the sake of nursing her father, who had long been a prey to disease, from a violent fall which had partially obscured a naturally fine and cheerful mind. She was still in mourning for him, he having died some months before, and her friends earnestly desired her to go into society to dissipate the effects of her loss.

What Aymon Terrail naturally supposed would make him repulsive, only served to awaken the deep pity and sympathy of Jeanne d'Argentin; and it needed but a word to make her forego all the new charms of society which, after giving them up until she was past thirty, she could easily resign again. Jeanne became the faithful wife and the tender nurse of a man whom she honoured and loved through years that brought happy and pleasant memories after the scarred form was laid in the earth; and surely man never felt such deep love and gratitude to woman for lightening and cheering an existence otherwise hard to be borne.

Four sons, bright and beautiful, were born to them; and in their youth and happiness, Aymon Terrail lived his own life over again as a happy and careless boy. Kind and indulgent, yet ever setting before them the path of right, he made their childhood happy; while they in turn shed beauty and radiance over his declining days. He knew that, in the course of nature, he would not see them grow up to manhood; so that all he could do for his children, all of anxiety he could save for his Jeanne, he must do quickly.

Aymon Terrail was entering his eightieth year, and felt the near approach of that power which had spared him thus long. The wife he had so loved, the children so dear to his aged heart, must be left, and with a manly courage, such as in his youth he had faced death with upon the battle-field, he met him now. Only a few days before the last scene, he called his sons around him, in presence of their gentle mother, and desired them to choose their future life, as far as mortals could choose what may never be granted them. One chose to occupy the château, another to live like his uncle who presided over the Abbey d'Esney, and a third to be like his uncle the Bishop of Grenoble. There was another child, a boy of thirteen, with eyes that shone out of the soul and looked into the soul, and with one arm thrown around his mother's neck, and with a voice like a skylark's, who entreated his father to permit him to bear arms, like those noble ancestors of whom the tales of their deeds had ever rung like music on his ear. At the sound of the boy's speech, Aymon Terrail wept like a child, but not for grief.

"Thou shalt, my Pierre!" he answered. "God give thee grace to do so. Thou art like thy grandfather, the best and bravest knight in Christendom; and thou shalt follow his profession."

The lad joyfully withdrew, without marking the mournful smile on the lip of his mother; and with a dignity which would have become one twice his years, yet tempered with modesty, he began to talk with his brothers about the future of them all.

The next day saw a grand dinner party at the Château de Bayard, of which the sons did the honours, on account of the father's inability. The guests were noble, and included Aymon Terrail's brother-in-law, the Bishop, and several of his kindred. After dinner, at which Pierre had distinguished himself for his manly courtesy, Terrail asked their advice as to where the boy had best be placed to take the initial steps in his profession.

"Send him to the King of France," said one.

"Place him in the house of Bourbon," said another. "I will take him to our good Duke of Savoy, as his page," said the bishop, "and send for my people at Grenoble to fit him for his presentation to-morrow."

On the following morning, therefore, thanks to the persevering knights of the thimble, Pierre, dressed in a splendid suit of velvet and satin, and mounted on a little, spirited horse which the bishop had given him, rode past his father's window as brave and fearless as when in after days he curbed his fiery war-steed on the field of Taro and Brescia. It was the grand starting-point in the boy's eventful life, that morning; and long after the father's aged head was laid low, and the earth was pressing on the bosom of his gentle mother—long after one of the little band of brothers had become abbot of Josaphat in Chartres, and another bishop of Glandèves in Provence, and Pierre himself had become known as the brave Chevalier du Bayard, the knight "sans peur et sans reproche"—he looked back to that bright morning of his innocent boyhood with a sigh that the freshness and beauty of life's morning hours should be mildewed and blighted by the world.

Alas, for the knight "with the heart as pure as pearl!" Alas, that every pearl bath its flaw, more or less perceptible, or hidden away in its depths so far that only by holding it up to the light we can discover it, and then it looks all the more hideous for the surrounding beauty.

Catherine Allegrì, a noble Milanese lady, whose family were hitherto, like the chevalier, "sans reproche," met him in the height of his fame, when all France was ringing with his praises, and when his own head, perhaps, was turned with the overwhelming admiration he was receiving. The Spanish blood which she inherited from her mother flowed warm and passionate in her veins; and the first sight of the eyes that looked out of the knight's soul into hers sealed the fate of the unhappy lady. He loved her—but there was no true marriage he thought for one who lived in the battle-field, and he would bind himself to no ties. When the brief love-dream ended, there was a heart broken by shame and disgrace, a fair head bowed to the grave, and a motherless infant in the darkened house of Allegrì, while it left a stain upon that lofty character which we would fain believe faultless.

Before the storming of Brescia the chevalier visited an astrologer. This man assured him that he would not fall in the battle, which he predicted for Good Friday or Easter Sunday following, but that within twelve years from that event he would be slain by artillery. "Otherwise," he added, "you would never end your days in the field, for you are so beloved by those under your command that they would sooner die than leave you in jeopardy." Strangely enough, all things corresponded to the prediction. But we feel convinced that the prophecy was, as usual, made after the events had occurred, not before. The battle of Ravenna, the day and events, were all correct; the fate of the Duke de Nemours, and the falconet shot which laid bare the shoulder bone of the good knight.

Crossing the Alps to his uncle, the bishop of Grenoble, fatigued him so much that he believed himself dying, and as he always wished to die in battle, he lamented most piteously that he was "to die in a bed, like a girl."

At the time and in the manner foretold by the astrologer—so runs the tale—Bayard's death took place. It was while conducting the French army in their retreat before the Spaniards, and the knight, as usual on such occasions, took the post of danger. A stone from a harquebus struck him across the spine with a blow which he knew instantly to be mortal. Holding up his sword, he kissed the cross upon its handle, and pronounced these words, audibly: "Miserere mei, Deus, secundum magnam misericordiam tuam!"

His servant took him from his horse and placed him under a tree. The Spaniards, discovering who he was that was wounded, exhibited the greatest kindness towards him. A tent and camp bed were prepared for him, and every attention paid to him that a generous enemy could bestow. The Marquis of Pescara addressed him in terms of strong commendation of his knightly powers, and of commiseration for his present strait. And here, surrounded by both friends and foes, with a fervent prayer for God to forgive his offences, the "Good Knight" closed those beautiful eyes for the last time, and sunk down in the quiet slumber of the dead.

By the direction of the Spanish general, the body was placed in a church, and solemn services performed there for three days; it was then taken home. As the funeral cortege passed through Savoy, orders were given by the duke that as much respect should be paid to it as if it were that of his own brother. Bayard was buried in a convent that had been founded by the bishop of Grenoble.

The French are a demonstrative people, and delight in expressing their emotions by external forms; yet years swept by, and no visible type of their remembrance of the good knight appeared. The king whom he had died to serve, the nation of which he was the pride, reared no memorial to his virtues or his fame. It remained for a private individual, connected with him by no tie, except that of being a native of the same province, to erect his monument. Let his name be carried down to the future, long after the monumental marble has sunken into the earth, as Scipio de Poulloud, Seigneur de Saint Agnin.

I THINK OF THEE

'Tis summer now, and sweetest flowers
Are blooming round my way,
And lovely birds of fairest plume
Are singing all the day;
And as the lovely flowers I see,
My thoughts go out and dwell with thee.

And though we may not meet again,
Yet every year shall see
A lustre added to the love
That I have given thee,
It will be pleasure to have known
Thee, though I called thee not my own.

THE CHURCH OF ST. MARIA DEL PI, BARCELONA.

BARCELONA.—IV.

PROMENADING Barcelona is the best and readiest means of making the acquaintance of that city. For Barcelona is the city of promenades. In this particular respect, it is the first of European cities.

On the inimitable Rambla are to be seen pictures which, if faithfully put upon canvas, would gather a crowd about them in the Royal Academy Exhibition, and, maybe, find a purchaser. Here are day labourers more picturesque than a chorus at the opera: there is the white-washer, in his gambote, and with a long brush in his hands, tall as one of the masts in the grand square of Venice. That gambote is a marvellous garment—a coat of many colours, and turned to many purposes—a cloak by day, it is a blanket by night—wardrobe and bed furniture, mat and umbrella all in one. Proud as a peacock is the white-washer, a very coxcomb of day labourers; but he is rivalled by the Catalan peasant, who comes into town dressed all in velvet, covered from head to foot with tag and tassel. He has, indeed, been irreverently described as a walking pair of trowsers, and, truly, there is some propriety in the term. His trowsers come up to his arm-pits, and they descend to his feet; they are of such ample proportions that, were they inflated, they would bear aloft the wearer as in a double balloon. But he is not all trowsers. His breast is covered with a showy, richly-braided vest, and jauntily over his shoulder is thrown a jacket, brave in ribbons, braid, and buttons; on his head is a cap, red as his heart's blood, or purple as the Tyrian dye. But who thinks of these fellows, gallant as they are—who cares for the gambote of the hireling, or the dark velvet of the mountaineer, while there are so many bright-eyed beauties courting his admiration? Unlike the maid of softer Andalusia, the black, glossy, and abundant locks of the Catalan are undecked with flowers. She wears no veil upon her head, no mantilla upon her shoulders. Her robe is simple calico; but ear-rings of amethyst or emerald bear witness to her vanity; and in the hand so neatly gloved, and foot so exquisitely shod, there is enough of the coquette to turn your brain—till you turn the street corner.

If you grow weary of the ordinary sights of the streets go outside the walls. There are Spanish gentlemen prancing on Andalusian horses on the green sward; there are companies of soldiers, both horse and foot, exercising on the grand parade-ground; there you may listen to the music, and there, if you go too near the ramparts, you will assuredly be told to "move on" by the sentinel on duty.

But of all promenades in or about Barcelona that of the Muralla del Mar is the favourite. To see this place to perfection one must go on a holiday, when all the fashion and beauty of Barcelona turn out and ventilate their plumage in the sun.

It is a peculiarity of Barcelonese manners that the fashionable ladies never appear on their favourite promenade on any day not sacred to the memory of some canonised saint. But on all the high festivals of the church they pass from the mass to the Muralla. The Spanish ladies do not go to church to see and be seen. They go to church to pay their devotions, and to the Muralla to pay their respects to Madame Mode. They keep these things separate in Spain.

By the way, the Barcelona churches are exceedingly handsome structures. That of St. Maria del Pi is a very beautiful building. In the interior there is something very striking. Nowhere is the poet's expression of the "dim religious light" so well illustrated. Daylight is carefully excluded. A solemn twilight pervades the lofty, long, dim aisles. Burning tapers are really necessary to dissipate the gloom which shrouds the grand old pictures. The deeply stained glass of the windows admits just light enough to reveal its own gorgeousness. A stream of sunlight here and there permitted to enter the church produces a very singular effect in the general obscurity—falling on the white-clad priests, the splendid vestments of the officiating bishop, or lighting up a Murillo or Velasquez on the wall.

After worship, away goes the congregation to the Muralla. This walk extends a distance of more than a quarter of a mile in a straight line, and is built on a mural rampart which protects the town from the sea. Broad, level, and strewn with clear sand, it is a perfect pathway to the feet. Commanding a view of the harbour, open in winter to the sun, and cooled in summer by a breeze from the sea, no more luxurious lounge could be devised for leisure—no fairer scene imagined for the display of beauty by sunlight. On some state occasions, there is a morning reception at the palace of the Captain General, which is connected with the terrace; and then bands of music play in the balconies, while the crowd passes to and fro beneath. On all high festival days the throng is very great. The walk is resplendent with silks and velvets of the most brilliant colours. The dark mantilla and the white veil are mingled with the gay hats of France. Flowers vie in the hair with brilliants. The plumes of the officers blend with the feathers of the fair. The air flashes with epaulettes and jewellery; and a thousand glancing eyes add to the brilliancy of even Spanish sunshine. There, in a saloon roofed by the sky, and walled in on one side by palaces, and on the other by the sea, we pay our morning court to the stately dames and gentle daughters of Barcelona. We salute our acquaintances, make our visits—and lose our heart.

THE FAIRY.

A stream through the forest is flowing,
With banks of a beautiful green;
And the violet and wild roses growing,
Add beauty and life to the scene.
In a dell there secreted by flowers,
Is a spot so delightful and airy,
That often reclining for hours,
I watch and make love to a fairy.

I once saw her blue eyes a-peeping
From lilies and leaves floating there,
With glances so sweet and bewitching,
I'm conscious I whispered, "Ma chère!"
An echo the forest resounding,
Replied for the fairy so fair:
And back to the rocks came, rebounding,
The ominous sound of "Beware!"

I still see the fairy, but never
Of love will she speak, for her fears;
But the echo for ever and ever
Keeps ringing its voice in my ears.
There's a moral, you see, in my story—
The spirits we covet and love
Are but frail, in their beauty and glory,
To the spirits who worship above.

The Matron.

NO. XLI.

ACCORDING to a promise made in the last chapter, I offer my readers some pretty illustrations of articles of dress in the shape of two pelerines, or tippets. These pelerines are a kind of revival, and those that have again become fashionable might have been worn thirty years ago. No. 1 is made of black tulle, and the quilting of figured tulle that finishes it off, should be put on rather full. Measure the pelerine round and as much again (in length) for the quilting. Conceal the stitches where the quilting joins the pelerine with coloured satin piping. Let the colour of this piping harmonise with your dress, or with your cap ribbons. No. 2 is of figured net, trimmed with imitation lace, which need not be put on quite so full as the quilting to No. 1. But be very exact in having the fineness even, and for this purpose measure the pelerine and measure the portion of lace allotted to each part, and if you have to pin divisions and eight corresponding parts of the trimming, rather do this than spoil good materials by irregularity—a fault in needlework that is hardly ever more apparent than where one part of a frilling is very plain, and the other very crowded.

Those of my readers who have read the "Matron" attentively and regularly may have felt disappointed at not seeing the promised plan of economical living—in fact, the scale of expenditure to assist those whose means are very limited. But I must beg those readers who accuse me of delay, to observe that every subject I have treated has tended to facilitate living well on very little. The great variety of cheap receipts for nice nourishing dinners and suppers, and for good but inexpensive breakfasts and teas; the pointing out so many sources of profit, so often overlooked, and above all, the directions how to make a large young family a source of blessing and profit to their parents, rather than of distress and impoverishment; all this has been done with the view of inculcating practical economy. And now, hoping that my readers understand the subject, I proceed to give them a scale of expenditure. It may assist some young couples in regulating their expenses. As to the wages mentioned, many who contrive to live very comfortably have no more, and I am not speaking of the cheapest parts of England.

The family, for whom I have drawn out a list of expenses, is that of a labourer with four children. We suppose him to be living as most of our rural population do live, in a small cottage with a garden for potatoes, and a sty (at the end of his garden) for a pig. We must also suppose that he follows the general practice of bringing home his wages every week to his wife, and that she, under her husband's direction, thus appropriates the said wages, viz., twelve shillings:—

For rent	...	1	0
For board	...	7	0
For fuel ($\frac{1}{2}$ a cwt. of coal)	...	0	9
For shoes	...	0	6
For clothing	...	1	6
For schooling	...	0	4
For "Cassell's Family Paper"	...	0	1
For sundries, and in case of illness	...	0	10

This scale of expenditure is not drawn from imagination. I repeat it, many families have not more than 12s. a week; and those who appropriate this sum wisely may live very comfortably on it; but we must bear in mind that this comfort presupposes that the husband has his health, and finds work. It is when health or work fail, that the real time of trial comes on. It is true, forethought may have done something towards providing for the evil day; but when a working man is laid up with severe and protracted illness, then is the time for him to display his fortitude and resignation, and for his fellow Christians to rally round him and help him.

It is for those receiving the low wages I have mentioned, that all the hints contained in former chapters will be truly valuable:—the directions respecting the great variety of things that grow wild, and that active, clever children turn to profit and use;—the advice to take advantage of clothing clubs and coal clubs, and latterly, the directions for needlework, judicious mending and restoring, and the way to choose warm, economical, and lasting winter clothing.

I have spoken of children being, by their active habits, a source of profit to their parents instead of a ruinous expense to them. If they can be profitable in their childhood, how much more so when they reach the period of youth. At twelve or thirteen a boy, and girl ought—without neglecting school—to be making a little income, and at sixteen a young woman (if not in service) ought to be maintaining herself and assisting her parents. Dress-making or mantua-making are the general means adopted by young women for earning money. I am disposed to assist those of my readers who wish to improve in this art, with advice, directions, and also with illustrations of articles of dress. I am the more willing to undertake to do this because it is a subject that will interest all classes of my readers—those who wish to make dresses as a source of profit, and also those who are well off but who like to direct the making of their own things at home.

In this chapter my movements have seemed to be, like those of our present guest the comet, rather eccentric, for I began with dress, and then turned off, somewhat abruptly, to fulfil my promise of giving a scale of expenditure to those who have only very small incomes. The fact is, I have been constantly pursuing one object, the promotion of comfort and economy for the various classes of my readers. In the next chapter, in addition to the promised illustrations and directions for dress-making, I mean to draw out a scale of living for those people who, in town, have to "make a little go a great way." As house-rent is much dearer, principally on account of the rates and taxes being so high, more ample means are required in town than in the country.

A LUCKY MISTAKE: OR, SHOOTING THE WRONG MAN.

AN ANECDOTE OF THE CHINESE REBELLION

"COME, boys, now that the cloth is removed, light your cigars, and listen to Alung's promised tale of shooting the wrong man."

Such was the word at the dinner-table of a club of young men in the city of B—, where I was a guest. None of the members had ever crossed the line, and they were anxious to hear me relate some of my adventures during my fifteen years' sojourn in India and China. With a spirit of cheerful compliance I proceeded to narrate the following adventure:—

"You are probably all aware that the present emperor of China and the mandarins of the empire, are descended from the Tartars, a nation which conquered the Chinese many years ago, after a long and bloody war, and have continued masters of the country ever since. As a mark of subjugation, the conquerors obliged the people to wear their hair of extreme length, plaiting it at the back of the head, in the manner of a queue. This badge of effeminacy was at first felt to be a deep disgrace by those of any spirit; but time, the great condoler and reconciler, wore away the feeling, and in the course of a few generations the Chinese became so much attached to the fashion, that they regarded it as an essential mark of their nationality. At the present day a Chinaman would almost as soon consent to lose his head, as to have his tail cut off. So much is this peculiar ornament prized among them, that it is considered sufficient punishment for theft to sever this appendage from the culprit's head.

"The mandarins, or governors of provinces, are and ever have been cruel in the extreme to the people they have so long dominated over, and the Chinese have ever regarded their masters with secret hate. The European and American missionaries have to some extent enlightened these abject people as to their own nature and capacities; and, as a consequence, they have awakened to a sense of their many and grievous wrongs. At length, human endurance could stand no more, and the long pent-up feelings of the people burst forth in open rebellion.

"The city of Shanghai was taken, and held three years by two rebel chiefs, named Aloo and Aling. Soon after its capture, an army of twenty thousand mandarin soldiers laid siege to the city, which is protected on all sides by a wall. Many and fierce were the engagements between the opposing armies; though it seemed to be a general rule to cease firing at meal-times, in order, I suppose, not to interfere with the regularity of the belligerents' digestive organs. Aling became the sole chief in command of the city, by shooting Aloo for cowardice, and held the place for nearly three years, until his stores were becoming almost exhausted. Rice and opium were become things to dream of rather than to use; and, as no hope of relief presented itself, the commander determined at last to abandon the place. The 15th of February, 1855, was a dark, cold day, with heavy masses of lowering clouds drifting across the horizon. Peal after peal of thunder shook the welkin, while the forked lightning crackled and flashed, as if in mockery of man's puny artillery, which sputtered from the city walls in resistance of a fierce attack by the government forces. It was a fitting day to usher in a night of such fearful carnage as followed. Old men, and women bent double with age; maidens and young mothers; children and babes; all, all met the same terrible fate in that wild night of human slaughter. Never can I forget the scenes of those dark hours; they are seared upon my memory as with a brand of iron. Many a time have I witnessed death in its most horrible forms; yet the recollection of those scenes sickens upon my soul whenever I think of Shanghai. I had retired for the night, after a day of unusual toil, when I was aroused by one of my Chinese policemen, and informed that a strong light was shining over the city. I went forth into the air, and there was indeed a light so bright in the distant sky above the city, that I could easily read the fellow's name and number on his badge. I knew all in an instant. The rebels were retreating, and had set the city on fire before leaving it. The government troops had entered some time before I reached the gate, and were butchering all they found, sparing neither old nor young. The streets were heaped with slain, and the gutters literally ran with blood.

"For two whole hours did I witness this horrible massacre, without the power to check it in the least degree. My brain reeled with the delirious excitement of the scene, and I fairly gasped for utterance. Yet I restrained myself, as if by a violent effort, and preserved perfect composure amidst this saturnalia of blood. At length I returned home, sick at heart at the thoughts of what I had witnessed. Above twenty-five thousand human heads were cut off that one night, and piled up in the yard of their josh-house, or temple. In the morning, I was sent for by the consul, and upon repairing to his house, and as governor of one of her Majesty's prisons in China, I received a warrant to arrest the rebel chief, Chin Aling Poo, commonly known as Aling. It was supposed that he was on board a schooner called the Nina, and I was to stop and search her, and take him dead or alive, if found on board. If I succeeded in my enterprise, I was to receive the round sum of six thousand pounds as a compensation. I knew very well that Aling had been brought up in a European family, and, if report spoke true, that he could handle a revolver to perfection. Other rumours said that he had plenty of practice upon the prisoners he captured, or upon his unruly followers, and that he never missed his mark. With these comfortable assurances as to the nature of the duty in which I was about to engage, I thought it wise to settle my accounts before my departure; for take him I would, if I could only set eyes upon him, or die in the attempt.

"Late in the evening of the same day on which I received the warrant, I bid my brother, who held a post under me, to take charge of the prison during my absence; and if I was not at home by the next night, to send a favourite detective of mine, a Chinaman, to look for me about Woosung, as I was going about some rather critical business. After this I took my revolver and sword, and put off in my boat for the destined scene of action. At three o'clock in the morning the Nina hove in sight, as she rounded a bend in the river, and in five minutes more I stood upon her deck. I presented my authority, and searched the vessel, but to no purpose; the fugitive chief could not be found. Upon reflection I felt certain that he could not have left the shore, and I hastened to a place where I thought I should be most likely to find him. On the north bank of the river Yankain stands a large village called Woosung. This place has long been a celebrated depot for the opium trade, and, as a consequence, the worst characters in the country congregated there. It was at the house of one of these bad men that I expected to find the person I was in pursuit of.

"In the suburbs of the village, in an isolated house, lived a desperate fellow called Antonio, a Spanish Malay. He was ever ready to cut a man's throat or a crown, and would not mind much whether it was counterfeited at that. He was a sworn friend of Aling, they being bound together by some devil's bond which is known to the rascality of all the East.

"I lost no time in besetting his house, and beat in the front door in order to surprise Aling should he be here. The door had begun to yield to our repeated blows, when a voice in the rear attracted my attention. I ran around the house, just in time to discover a man jump from the window. Quick as thought I levelled my revolver and fired. He fell, and I, thinking him dead, returned my pistol to my belt. But I soon found out my mistake, for he was p and off in a moment; and before I could fire again he was beyond the range of my shot. He ran, and I followed him, across the heavy, wet rice fields, while the rest of my party followed after me. I was almost certain of taking him, for his course lay in the direction of a creek, some thirty yards wide, and I thought should be able to shoot him while he swam across. But fortune favoured him, for I slipped and fell; and before I could regain my feet and reach the bank, he had crossed, and was beyond my reach. I still pursued him, crossing a bridge a short distance down the creek, and ordered my men to spread themselves so that he could not double on us. For three miles further on we kept, and at length I got sight of him gain. I took a wider range than the rest of my party, knowing the country well, and that another and wider creek was just ahead, which his direction could make it necessary for him to cross. I was ght in my calculation. He did not care to take to the water this time, and so coursed the bank down to bridge which I had reached before by a shorter cut, and where I lay in ambush behind the battlements. He did not discover me until within thirty yards, when I sprang out and ordered him to stand, or I could fire.

"He heeded not what I said, but plunged into the stream. Before he had reached the opposite bank I was at a ball through his back. He sank, then rose again, struggled up the bank, and fell. I ran across the bridge and stood over him. He appeared to be dead, but as I laid my hand upon his shoulder to turn him over, quick as lightning he sprang to his feet, and drew a long, bright dagger, which flashed like a meteor over my head. Now began what I knew full well would be a struggle for life and death. I had rarely time, by catching his descending arm, to save myself from the blow aimed at my heart. As it was, I received a deep wound in the fleshy part of my breast, the point of the dagger glancing off upon my ribs. We clenched in a death-gripe, and fell together. For ten minutes we fought and rolled over and over, he using his teeth wherever he could get hold with them, while I clutched the hand in which he held the dagger. The time seemed an age!—would my people never come up? He was a strong man with the strength of desperation. He plied his disengaged hand to some purpose, for I was bruised fearfully, as well as bitten. I was growing weaker and weaker every moment, and a feeling of despair came over my heart. It now took both my hands to hold that in which he held the dagger, and even this was becoming impossible. A fortunate idea suddenly suggested itself to me, which, I think, saved my life.

"We were down upon the ground, and I only acting in self-defence. In a moment, with a superhuman effort I sprang to my feet, and with a bound planted them both upon his chest as he lay prostrate. This stunned him, and with another and another jump he lay senseless at my feet. My revolver had been lost during the struggle, but I wrenched the dagger from his hand, and had just raised it to plunge it in his heart, when for the first time I saw his face sufficiently to recognise he was not the man I was after. I did not strike, but lowered my hand. My party soon came up, when we ironed him and took him to Shanghai, and delivered him to the Chinese authorities. It turned out that, though I had failed to arrest the rebel chief, I had captured one of the most formidable and desperate villains in the country; one who had committed several murders, but had until now successfully defied or eluded justice. A few weeks after, having recovered from my wounds, I witnessed his execution; and so ends my story of shooting the wrong man."

Small Change.

MARRIAGE.—A good woman is not thoroughly known before marriage. Of how many sweet domestic virtues may not she be possessed, of which even he who values her most highly is unaware until he has placed her in his own mansion to be the guardian angel of his household happiness!

"Mr. SMITH, don't you think Mr. Skeesicks is a young man of parts?" "Decidedly so, Miss Brown; he is part numskull, and part knave, and part fool!"

"I CAN'T understand why people send children to school so long nowadays," said a thief, as he sat upon the counter of a bar-room, smoking a pipe; "I ain't been into a school-house since I was twelve years old, and I ain't larn'd anything from books since, and I know more now than any college-bred man I ever saw."

"WELL, Bob, how are you?" said a dashing blade to a poverty-stricken poetaster. "Why, I've been troubled a great deal with the rheumatics lately." "And how is your wife?" "She's very rheumatic, too." "And how is little Dicky?" "I think he has got a touch of the family complaint; I think he is a little rheumatic too." "Dear me; well, I will call upon you in a day or two, and see how you are; where do you lodge?" "I am almost ashamed to ask you to our lodgings, for that is room-attic too!"

"Give me a copy of those lines," Sues the fair Celia to her poet lover; Delighted, he, the sheet resigns— His cup of bliss, quite full, is running over. Forthwith she hides the paper prize Safe in her bosom's labyrinth of laces; He marks the imprisonment, and cries, "My lines, in truth, have fallen in pleasant places."

A CHILD is eager to have any toy he sees, but throws it away at the sight of another, and is equally eager to have that. We are most of us, children through life, and only change one toy for another from the cradle to the grave.

A GENTLEMAN in conversation with Dr. Johnson having, to some of the usual arguments for drinking, added this:—"You know, sir, drinking drives away care, and makes us forget whatever is disagreeable; would not you allow a man to drink for that reason?" Johnson replied, "Yes, sir, if he sat next you."

"I NEVER complained of my condition," says the Persian poet Sadi, "but once, when my feet were bare, and I had no money to buy shoes; but I met a man without feet, and became contented with my lot."

WHICH five names in early Scripture indicate the commencement of corporeal punishment?—Adam, Seth, Eve, Cain, Abel!

White to move, and checkmate in three moves.

Problem No. 77. For the Juveniles. By DOMINO.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to move, and checkmate in three moves.

R. YATES.—You have not correctly described the position, which is as follows:—

White.—K on Q R sq, R on Q 6, B on Q 4, Kt on K Kt 6, and Pawn on K 2.

Black.—K on K 4.

White mates in three, not two, moves.

E. D. C. (Islington).—Many thanks for your friendly letter. If you will return the Problem to which you refer, we will endeavour to remedy the defect which we pointed out upon a previous occasion.

J. N.—Black, in reply to your first move, in Problem No. 65, could play Q to K R 3, threatening check; and in reply to White's second move, P to Q K 5, defending the Rook.

R. NEWMAN.—Your solutions of Problems Nos. 63 and 61 are correct, but you fail in Problems Nos. 60 and 62.

LILE DELL.—Your Problem No. 2, which we have hitherto overlooked, has a second solution commencing with Kt to K 2.

A. J.—Y.—Your Problem is defective. Black can play R to K B 4 for his second move, and delay the mate several moves.

ROBERT B.—You should always receive such odds from a superior player as will make the game interesting to him.

ZIMONE.—As a juvenile, we submit the following Enigma to your notice:—

White.—K at K R sq, Q at Q Kt 4, Kts at Q 4 and K B 4, and P at Q 2.

Black.—K at K 5, Ps at K 4.

White to play, and mate in two moves.

CASSELL'S
ILLUSTRATED ALMANACK
For 1859

Shortly will be published, price 6d.

ONE OF THE MOST BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED
ALMANACKS OF THE SEASON.

It will contain upwards of Thirty Engravings, the subjects as follows:—Twelve engravings representing the modes of Repast in various Nations and Periods;—Twelve engravings representing important events of the year 1858, including the Capture of Delhi—Storming of Lucknow—Bombardment of Canton—Earthquake in Naples—Burial of the Queen of Oude—the Leviathan off Deptford—Inauguration of the Boulevard de Sebastopol—Arrival of the Queen at Cherbourg—Launch of the Ville de Nantes—Fort Napoleon in Kabylia—Her Majesty's arrival at the Town Hall, Leeds—Removal of the decorations, fountain, &c., in the Place de Châtelet. Four emblematical designs of the Seasons;—Astronomical illustrations, &c., &c. The Literary matter, in addition to explanations of the above Engravings, consist of the Calendar, richly stored with historical remembrances; Chronology; Obituary; Abstracts of Acts of Parliament; Important Statistics; Postal Regulations; Stamps and Taxes; Gardening Calendar; the Government; Royal Family; Houses of Lords and Commons, and other matters, interesting to all branches of the community.

P. FAIRMAN.—You wish to know if people think as much of Newton abroad as we do in England. If you had read the accounts of recent events you would have answered this question satisfactorily. In the magnificent speech lately delivered by Lord Brougham, on the occasion of the inauguration of the statue of Sir Isaac Newton at Grantham, Lincolnshire, the learned speaker informs us that the feelings of admiration excited by contemplating the works of Sir Isaac Newton, are by no means confined to the country which glories in having given him birth. Other nations even exceed us in sounding the praises of this great philosopher. Leibnitz, when asked at the royal table in Berlin his opinion of Newton, said, that "Taking mathematics from the beginning of the world to the time when Newton lived, what he had done was much the better half;" and in the opinion of that great French philosopher, La Place, Newton's work, "The Principia," "will ever remain a monument of the profound genius which revealed to us the greatest law of the universe. That work," continues he, "stands pre-eminent above all other productions of the human mind." Fontenelle, another great French genius, says, "In first giving to the world Newton's method of fluxions, Leibnitz did like Prometheus; he stole fire from heaven to bestow it upon men." The great and learned L'Hôpital asked, "Does Newton sleep and wake like other men? I figure him to myself as a celestial genius, entirely disengaged from matter." All this gives you some idea of the estimation in which Sir Isaac Newton is held on the Continent. Lord Brougham aptly referred his hearers to the universe as the monument of that great philosopher, whose book was the immensity of space; but the manner in which his lordship concluded a speech on a subject so dear to English ears, will long be remembered with interest. Still speaking of Newton, he says, "In raising the statue which preserves his likeness, near the place of his birth, and on the spot where his prodigious faculties were unfolded and trained, we at once gratify our honest pride as citizens of the same state, and humbly testify our grateful sense of the divine goodness which deigned to bestow upon our race one so marvellously gifted, to comprehend the works of Infinite Wisdom, and to make all his study of them the source of religious contemplation, both philosophical and sublime."

LYDIA HORTON.—"Lydia Horton" has spent three months in the country, and was never so happy in all her life. She has been at a sheep-shearing, a harvest-home, and at the gathering of the apples. Recently she has been interested in the digging up of the potatoes. When she thinks of the immense quantity of food that the potato provides for us, she cannot imagine how we got on before its introduction by Sir Walter Raleigh, a very favourite hero of hers, and one about whom she wants to know more. She asks us to tell her where he was born, and what became of him; from what part of America he brought the potato, and where he first planted it. Sir Walter Raleigh was born in Devonshire, in 1552. He was educated at Oxford, and was a member of Oriel College. It seems he was at one time intended for the law, for in early life he took up his residence in the Temple. Subsequently he served in the English army in Ireland. He afterwards, in 1584, founded, in America, the colony of Virginia, calling it after the maiden Queen Elizabeth. It was on his return that he brought back potatoes, introducing them for the first time into Europe; on his estates near Cork he first planted them. He was employed in many public services; but, not being favoured by Elizabeth's successor, James I., he was charged with being privy to a conspiracy for placing Arabella Stuart on the throne. The indictment was for misprision of treason, but a base jury found him guilty of treason. In consequence, Sir Walter was imprisoned for twelve years in the Tower, during which time he wrote his "History of the World." At length, however, he obtained his liberty, and also the command of an expedition to Guiana, in South America. On his return, in 1618, he was arrested at the instigation of the Spanish ambassador, for attacking a Spanish settlement, and ordered to be executed under the former verdict for treason, obtained sixteen years before! This legal murder of the greatest man of his age took place October 29th, 1618.

ANXIOUS.—From the report recently received of the Atlantic Telegraph, we see no reason to despair. According to Mr. C. F. Varley, the electrician of the Electric and International Telegraph Company, the interruption of the communication and the injury to the cable have been caused by the electric current being too powerful. Mr. C. F. Varley considers that had more moderate power been used, the cable would still have been capable of transmitting messages. He has had recourse to experiments, which proved that where the "insulating covering" is not very perfect, there is great danger arising from using intense currents. If Mr. Varley is right in his conjectures, we trust that the error detected will soon be remedied.

AMY.—It was on Tuesday the 7th ultimo that the inauguration of the successful laying down of the Channel Islands submarine telegraphic cable was celebrated. The message first conveyed by the wires was one from the directors to her Majesty, who promptly replied to it from Holyrood, in a manner that caused the greatest enthusiasm in the Islands. The royal message expresses the Queen's satisfaction at the connection established with a portion of her dominions hitherto locally separated, but always united to the crown by a spirit of unswerving loyalty, unsurpassed in any part of the British dominions. The cable starts from Church Bay, Portland, and rests in depths of water varying from 35 to 40 fathoms, as far as the island of Alderney, which has been fixed upon for the first station. At this point the French coast is only nine miles distant, and Cherbourg is plainly visible. From Alderney the cable stretches to a point on the north-west coast of Germany, and crosses that island to St. Peter's Port, where there is a station in the guard-house. It then runs to Cape Grosnez. Between eight and nine miles of underground work brings the line to St. Heliers.

A. B. C.—The Prince of Orange is heir to the throne of the Netherlands. He is eighteen years of age, and consequently out of his minority. He has now a state household, a privy councillorship, and the military grade of major-general. His royal highness is intelligent, affable, immensely popular, and very learned. He has just taken his doctor's degree at the University of Leyden. He speaks English with fluency and correctness, and he is familiar with our literature. Our readers may remember that this prince has been spoken of as an appropriate suitor for the Princess Alice, the Queen's second daughter.

A HUSBAND.—If you cannot induce your wife to relinquish the dangerous crinoline, hoop, or cage (there are so many names for it, we know not which to fix upon) how can you expect we shall prevail? To tell you the truth, we have no hope of success, therefore we can only offer a preventive measure in case of accidental combustion, to which the immense dimensions of the fair sex now render them peculiarly liable, by adding to the starch used for stiffening dresses a table-spoonful of common alum in a powdered state. The starch makes the dress far stiffer, and prevents its bursting into flame when placed in contact with any burning substance.

QUESTER.—The advantages offered by the recent treaty with China are as great as we could reasonably expect. Christianity is to be tolerated throughout the empire; diplomatic agents may reside permanently at Peking; and British subjects may travel for pleasure or trade to all parts of the empire, when provided with passports from British authorities.

PUGH.—You wish us to tell you the situation of Frederic's Town, near which gold has recently been found. Frederic's Town is the capital of New Brunswick, one of the British possessions in North America. New Brunswick was formed into a government separate from Nova Scotia in 1784. It is rapidly advancing in population and fertility. It has several towns, among which we may mention Parr Town, Digby, and New Edinburgh. The establishment of the Atlantic Telegraph gives great additional importance to New Brunswick.

JULIA B.—So many marriages take place after thirty that we consider you have no reason to despond, or to suppose that the gentlemen will overlook you. With regard to your anxiety about your hair growing so low on your forehead, the best thing you can do to check it is to wear it constantly "à l'impératrice," that is, brushed back from the temples. Depilatories are not only dangerous but useless. To efface the mark left by the blister, bathe the part repeatedly in milk, and anoint it with cold cream on going to bed.

PSISISTRATUS THE THIRD.—Your duties appear to clash, but they do not do so in reality. If the young lady is worthy of your regard, she is not in love with your position but with you, and she will not respect you the less for the shade which the guilt of others has thrown over your position. With a true woman-heart she will value you the more, and endeavour to atone to you for a misfortune occasioned by no fault of yours. We pity your mother; but you must not be guilty of deception in order to shelter her.

ADA M.—For what you term the face-burning we advise you to take a tea-spoonful of magnesia in milk. This will correct the acidity on the stomach that generally occasions face-burning.

MINNIE GRAY.—We cannot advise you, until you tell us in what capacity you wish to bring out your daughter.

BEATRICE D.—Try to regain the affection of your friend by uncomplaining gentleness and constancy. "Emilia's" violent passions seldom last long, so it is to be hoped you will soon conquer yours. Your immediate union with the young lady would be as ruinous to her as to yourself.—A TRUE LOVER may be mistaken in the nature of his own feelings. We advise him to take no immediate step. Let him wait a little while, and if his love stands the test of time, and he is a sufficiently "True Lover" to wish to become a suitor, let him write to the young lady's parents, begging leave to pay his addresses to her.

S. A. T. S.—The style of the engaged ring is optional; but care should be taken that it exactly fits the finger. The name sweetbriar is evidently suggested by the properties of the shrub.

IGNORAMUS.—"Ignoramus" must be guided by the lady's convenience. His great object must be to give her the best part of the road to walk on. In conversing with her, let him select the topics of the day; and above all, avoid being tedious. In conversation "tous les genres sont bons, hors le genre ennuyeux." I hope by this time "Ignoramus" is too good a French scholar to require the translation of the above quotation.

ADELGISA D.—It is by the sentiments, and not by the writing of the letters, that we judge of the character of our correspondents. We have no faith in writing as indicative of disposition.—HEDA KINGMAN.—You may show your sympathy by the gentleness of your look, the tone of your voice, and those little attentions so welcome to invalids. You are quite right in your remark that the constant question, "Do you feel better?" is very wearisome to those who are ill.—A. J. D.—You give a very contradictory account of your symptoms, for you complain of feeling neither pleasure nor pain, and a little further on you say you feel horribly miserable. We suspect the last-mentioned is the real state of your feelings; and we suspect that you are labouring under that lowness of spirits that results from biliousness. We advise you to consult a respectable medical man.

KITTY ROBSON.—We do not undertake to recommend books on etiquette; but we are willing to give our readers any instructions they require. It is not necessary to thank a gentleman for escorting you from the drawing-room to the dining-room. Finger-glasses are removed with the dinner-cloth, before the dessert is put on the table. Coffee is served up to the ladies as soon as they return to the drawing-room.

A DUBLIN GIRL.—Write to us again in a few months, and if by that time we find you have mastered orthography, we will take into consideration the offer you make us of contributing to our paper.

FRITZ.—Full information respecting Biarritz was given in the last number of this paper.

A YOUNG INQUIRER.—"The Educational Course" is a distinct publication. You should insist on the publisher fulfilling your order.

B. TOWNSHEND.—By all means endeavour to turn your gifts, natural and acquired, to some account. Many young men of your age are already earning sufficient to support themselves and assist their parents. The slight impediment in your speech need be no bar to your advancement. Demosthenes, who was in youth afflicted in the same way, became the greatest orator his country ever produced.

A PHILOSOPHER seems to forget that the God of nature acts through natural causes. If He has ordained that reproduction shall be the order of the whole universe, there is nothing more wonderful in a sphere producing a sphere than in an oak-tree producing an acorn.

THE SISTER TO THE BRIDE ELECT.—You are in danger. Be guided entirely by your prudent mother.

R. R.—When next you are stung by a wasp, spread over the part a plaster of common salt and salad oil. In case of the dangerous accident of swallowing a wasp, put a tea-spoonful of common salt in your mouth. It kills the wasp and heals the sting.

AUNT PHILLIPSON.—If "Aunt Phillipson" is afflicted with corpulence, she should not allow herself more than six hours' sleep in the twenty-four. She should take exercise and avoid cream, malt liquor, and soup, until she has reduced her bulk. We cannot tell her how to gain the favour of the gentleman until she sends us further particulars.

CASSY R.—You must write more legibly if you wish us to answer your questions.

T. F. S.—Provided you give the lady the best part of the road, you may place her to the right or the left.

A YOUNG LADY.—On entering a room full of company, the first thing you have to do is to pay your respects to the lady of the house.

KATE TONSON.—Regular exercise, and a cold bath taken with due precaution, greatly improves the figure. In your case, friction with a flesh brush, applied to both shoulders for half an hour before going to bed, is likely to prove efficacious in diminishing your cause of alarm.

PALE ALE.—As indigestible food destroyed your bloom, in all probability attention to diet will restore it. Instead of ridiculing you, your brother should endeavour to procure for you amusement and change of scene, which are both conducive to health and to a clear complexion.

VITA.—There is hair so incorrigibly lank, that tongs alone are efficacious in curling it. Probably "Vita's" hair is of this kind. As to his other question, we consider it is his levity, not his writing, that will exclude him from a good appointment.

AMATOR.—Do not write to the lady again. We suspect she makes too sure of you. When you are less devoted, she will, probably, become more kind.

M. A. R.—According to your request, we furnish you with a receipt for preserving seaweed. Wash the seaweed in fresh water, then take a plate or dish (the larger the better); cut your paper to the size required, place it on the plate with fresh water, and spread out the plant with a good-sized camel-hair brush, in a natural form. Picking it out with a pin gives an unnatural appearance to the seaweed, and destroys the characteristic fall of the branches.

A GALLANT.—You wish us to tell you at what age it is prudent to carry on a correspondence with young ladies. Do you mean to correspond with two or three at once? For such Mormonite proceedings we have no advice to offer.

SONS OF OLD ENGLAND.—John Adams, one of the principal promoters of American independence, was born at Braintree, in Massachusetts, October 19, 1735. He was a descendant from one of the families which founded that colony. Samuel Adams, for some time governor of Massachusetts, was of the same family.

C. ALTHANS.—Thanks for your scraps; we shall use them as opportunity serves.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER XCIX.

Grief fills the room up of my absent child,
Lies in his bed, walks up and down with me,
Puts on his pretty looks, repeats his words,
Remembers me of all his gracious parts,
Stuffs out his vacant garments with his form;
Then have I reason to be fond of grief.

SHAKESPEARE.

How chilling is the aspect of December, with its gloomy skies and piercing cold; its withered leaves, rustling in time's path, like memories over a graveyard, to remind us that another year is about to pass away—a drop in the vast ocean of eternity.

Apart from the religious influences of the season, even old Christmas would be dreary but for those social feelings, ties, and sympathies which encircle the domestic hearth with happy kindred faces, warm the heart by recollections of the past, or smiling anticipations—hope's sunbeams—of the future, awakening, as it were, an earlier spring, rich in affection's flowers amid the snows of winter.

Unfortunately, there are but too many of the human family to whom such consolations are denied—beings whom death has isolated, left like some blighted tree in the world's wilderness alone—sad monuments of sorrow.

Although Rachel could scarcely be classed with these utterly desolate ones, having still the love of her husband and Mary to sustain her, she was almost as much to be pitied; for the worm was at the root of life, poisoning its enjoyments with bitter regrets, the pangs of hope deferred, and the tortures of uncertainty. If her worn features sometimes wore a smile, the expression proved but momentary; the shadow quickly returned; its darkness was in her heart, where, in secret, she continued to mourn the loss of her eldest born, as a mother's heart alone can mourn.

It was Christmas-eve, and the Markhams were seated in their elegantly furnished drawing-room. As a matter of course, Peter Mangles was with them; where else could the old man spend his evenings! he had given up his cottage on Blackheath on purpose to be near them. George had become to him as a son, and Mary—it would be difficult to describe the love of the eccentric clerk for the fair and gentle girl, who, as a child, had awakened so deep an interest in his heart.

The impression that his employer either had contracted, or was about to contract some absurdly provoking marriage, haunted him; he could not dismiss it from his mind; never in the course of his long existence had he felt so impatient for the arrival of the morrow, which was to confirm or dissipate his doubts.

Rachel and her husband merely smiled when he expressed them. Apart from the happiness of Mr. Bently, it was a matter of indifference whether they proved well-grounded or not; for could wealth have brought happiness, they had more than enough already. As for Mary, she felt delighted with the idea of having a grandmamma.

Peter looked at his watch. It was past eight o'clock.

"Not yet arrived," he muttered; "most unbusiness-like habit; but, there, Richard never was punctual—that is to say, of late years. Thinks to surprise us, no doubt; but he won't surprise me," added the old man, with a slight—a very slight—touch of bitterness in his tone. "Well, I have carried out his instructions to the very letter; he will find nothing to reproach me with on that score: all is ready for the reception of the bride.

"Bride!" he repeated, with a grimace: "that he should think of such a thing at his years! Why, he is only nineteen months and eleven days my junior. Perhaps it is catching," he added, with a desperate attempt to appear facetious; "if so, I shall be taking a wife next."

"Oh, do—pray do!" exclaimed Mary, throwing her arms playfully round his neck; "I should so like to be a bridesmaid!"

"I'll think of it, my love," answered Peter, drily.

Then overcome by what struck him as a ridiculous idea at his time of life, he broke into a good-humoured laugh.

"No, no," he added, parting the clustering curls from the brow of the fair girl, and imprinting a kiss upon her forehead, "I must dance at your wedding first."

The happy smile vanished from the countenance of his young favourite, and a pensive expression supplied its place. Rachel was the only one who remarked the change; few things escape a mother's eye.

A carriage was now heard to draw up at the door of the house, and Mr. Mangles began to feel nervously impatient.

"That is Richard," he said.

"It is grandfather's carriage!" cried Mary, who, on hearing the vehicle, had run to one of the windows, and partially drawn aside the curtain to peep into the street.

"With four horses, no doubt," muttered the clerk, commencing a string of commentaries, audible only to himself. "Postilion, with white favours! a giggling maid and impudent valet in the dickey, mocking the youthful bridegroom, pitying the bride. What will they say in the City?"

Mr. Bently now made his appearance in the drawing-room.

Although neither George Markham nor his wife had paid much attention to the prediction of Peter, they were both struck by the change which had taken place in the appearance and general bearing of the merchant. He had quitted them a broken-spirited man, bowed down with regrets and sorrows. His figure was now erect, and his countenance wore an expression of unclouded joy.

There was something more than usually affectionate in the feeling with which he embraced his daughter, and gazed upon her careworn features.

"You received my letter?" he said, after kissing his grandchild, and shaking hands with her father and the clerk.

"Three days since," answered Rachel, with a faint smile.

"Mine duly came to hand at the same time," observed Peter, drily. "I trust you found everything arranged to your satisfaction?"

"I have not been home yet," replied Mr. Bently. "This is my first visit."

"Good gracious!" mentally ejaculated Mangles; "he has never brought her here!"

"I am tired of the country, Rachel," said her father, "especially at this season of the year, when the heart requires something more than the silent companionship of books and solitary thoughts."

"I never find time for solitary thoughts," observed the old clerk, in a tone which somewhat startled his employer; "and as for books, how any man can complain of them, provided they are properly kept and regularly balanced, is more than I can comprehend."

His hearers smiled: they perfectly understood the books the speaker alluded to; in fact, the only ones that had ever greatly interested him.

Mr. Bently walked towards the fireplace, and leant his head upon his hand for several instants with an air of meditation; evidently there was something upon his mind which he hesitated to disclose. Peter, fully believing in the truth of his supposition, enjoyed his embarrassment exceedingly.

"Now it is coming," he thought.

"You are not very curious, Rachel," observed her father.

His daughter regarded him with a look of surprise. "Have you forgotten the present I promised you in my letter?"

"Pretty present!—a mother-in-law," mumbled the clerk. "Half Mary's fortune gone, at the very least. Well!"

"Have my gifts become valueless?" added the merchant.

"Valueless!" repeated Rachel; "oh, no. You know how fondly I prize the slightest mark of your affection; blessed with that, I have nothing more to desire."

"You must be happy—much happier than falls to the lot of most of us," observed Mr. Bently, with a sigh; "few in this world can pronounce that heaven has not another blessing to bestow. What, not one desire? not one?"

"Father," exclaimed the agitated woman, her eyes instantly filling with tears, "you do not, I am sure you do not, mean these words unkindly; but they wring my heart. Could you read its sufferings—its sleepless regrets—its agonies, you would judge me differently—very differently. If my lips sometimes wear a smile, it is that I may not cloud the joy of others. For years," she added, "my life has been one of sorrow; respect and pity it."

Mary ran to the side of her mother, and, throwing her arm round her, vainly endeavoured to kiss away her tears, which continued to fall fast. The seal upon the fountain had been broken.

As for Peter Mangles, he turned very red in the face; used his handkerchief several times, and regarded the merchant almost ferociously.

"He has the heart of a crocodile," he mentally ejaculated.

"Mr. Bently, is this wise? is it kind?"

"Silence, George," said Mr. Bently, interrupting his son-in-law. "We sometimes live to regret reproaches, but never our forbearance."

There was something so impressive, not in the words merely, but the tone and dignified manner of the speaker, that his request was involuntarily complied with. Not another remonstrance or observation was uttered.

"Rachel," continued her father, in a voice which he vainly attempted to render firm, "you will not accuse me of intentional unkindness. You are a mother, and can judge the depth, and sometimes the fear of a parent's love. It was far from my desire to inflict an unnecessary pang. Would I could have endured it for you."

The features of his daughter suddenly became white as the marble against which the speaker leant.

"God is very merciful, Rachel," he added. "The blessing we too frequently demand with passionate entreaties, sighs, and tears, is wisely withheld to be accorded to our resignation."

A piercing cry—it could not be called of joy, scarcely of hope—broke from the lips of the long bereaved mother, as the import of his words suddenly flashed upon her mind.

"You have heard tidings of my boy!" she exclaimed; "I feel it—read it in your eyes, which overflow with tenderness. You are too good—too human," she added, with increasing excitement, "to torture me with delusive hopes. He lives! say that he lives! a look—a word. I can bear it, father; a mother's heart is strong—oh, how strong! Speak, or suspense will kill me. Richard, my son, my son!"

On hearing his name thus passionately pronounced, prudence—the fear of presenting himself too suddenly—all gave way to the strong impulse of filial love, and our hero entered the drawing-room without waiting for the signal agreed upon between his grandfather and himself.

"Mother, dear mother!" were the only words his agitation permitted him to speak; but there was a spell in them that awoke the long silent echoes in that mother's heart. In an instant her arms were around his neck; her heart beating against his; her pale lips pressed to the cheek of her lost son.

Kisses, broken murmurs of gratitude, and looks that spoke unalterable affection, were all that passed between them. In that embrace how richly did Richard Markham feel all he had endured repaid. To the long desolate mother's heart—but what pen can describe her emotions, as she gazed upon his manly form, read in his eyes a proof, more eloquent than words, how fondly her memory had been cherished?

For some time neither the father nor the sister ventured to obtrude their joy; each felt there was a right holier even than theirs—the claim of maternal love.

Rachel did not forget them.

"George," she sobbed, extending her hand to her husband, "our boy—our eldest-born, restored free from shame and crime! Mary, your brother!"

The arm of Richard encircled the form of the weeping girl, whose head reclined upon his shoulder.

"Thanks, Lord!" added the grateful woman, sinking upon her knees; "the children that Thou gavest have not been turned from Thee!"

"My son," exclaimed his deeply agitated father, as he grasped his hand, "I can meet your gaze without a blush: sorrow and an angel's goodness have redeemed me from the drunkard's sin."

"I know all," replied the young man: "your struggles, triumphs. Know how proud I ought to feel to call you father!"

"Come with me to the library, George," said Mr. Bently, "there is still much to be explained. Richard will undertake the task to his mother. Bring Mary with you."

Leading his daughter by the arm, George Markham quitted the room, accompanied by Peter Mangles, who kept blubbering like a child. The merchant followed last; as he closed the door of the drawing-room after him, he felt, for the first time for years, reconciled with himself.

"And I," said the old clerk, when his employer had concluded the narrative of his first meeting with his grandson and all that had resulted from it—"I to have accused you of want of feeling!"

"Hush!" interrupted Mr. Bently, "no reproaches. The best I can say of my conduct is that Providence has been wiser than my resentment."

"But I will reproach myself," exclaimed Peter. "I have a right to do so; you have no idea what a ridiculous old fool I have been. Would you believe it, Richard, when I received your letter in which you spoke of being no longer alone in the world, I took it into my stupid head that you were married! As if any man in his senses," he added, "would do such an unbusiness-like thing at our time of life."

"I was greatly excited when I wrote it," observed the merchant, "for my grandson had only just been restored to me; it might have been worded more cautiously."

"But that is not all," resumed Mr. Mangles, who appeared resolved to make a clean breast of it. "Just now, not an hour since, I compared you to a crocodile—to be sure it was to myself—a crocodile!" he added, with solemnity, "not that I ever saw one."

Here the speaker looked as if he considered that not very important fact only increased the atrocity of his conduct.

"I know you will forgive me," he continued, "and that is where I feel it; if I thought you would not, I should not be half so miserable."

"I have nothing to forgive, old friend," replied Mr. Bently, with a smile; "we have jogged on through life too long together, not to bear with each other's failings."

"There is some truth in that, Richard," observed Peter, with what, to those who did not know the simplicity of his character, might have appeared a sly touch of humour. "Well! we must all of us take the good with the evil, and strike a balance, I suppose."

The merchant and his son-in-law both agreed that there was more wisdom in his words than the speaker dreamt of; they felt that all things had worked together for the best.

On returning to the drawing-room, they found Rachel and her son more composed, the violence of their first emotions had subsided, and a placid, deep contentment, such as the heart feels when its best affections are gratified, supplied their place.

As for Mr. Bently, he felt both touched and gratified by the affectionate manner in which his daughter met him—there was an eloquence in her deep, thoughtful eyes far more expressive than her words, as she thanked and blessed him for the care he had taken of his grandson.

As for Peter Mangles, he could not take his eyes from our hero, but sat devouring him with his looks. To such a state of excitement had the kind old man worked himself, that several times he felt obliged to have recourse to his handkerchief to hide the emotion which oppressed him.

"You must love our kind old friend," whispered Mary to her brother; "you know not half the debt of gratitude we owe him."

"You are wrong there," replied Richard; "I have heard it all."

"From grandfather?" inquired the artless girl.

"Partly from him, and partly from another."

"Another!" repeated his sister, with surprise; "who could it be?"

The reply, which, like the observation that first led to it, was given in an under tone, brought the rich blush to the cheek of Mary; and yet it consisted but of a single word, which sounded very like "Harry."

Time flies swiftly when happiness forgets to count its moments; and the Christmas morn—the day when angel lips first proclaimed peace on earth and good will to man—had dawned before Mr. Bently quitted the house of his son-in-law.

"This is your home now, Richard," he observed, when he bade his grandson good night. "Not a step," he added, as the youth was about to proffer to see him at least to his carriage. "My home will not appear cheerless now; the happy faces I leave behind me will people it with joyous recollections."

"To-morrow, then," said our hero, with a smile. "We shall meet again with calmer feelings," replied the merchant. "Rachel," he added, as his daughter advanced to receive his fond good-night, "you will not fail me—I am sure you will not, for I have not forgotten your words—'A mother's heart is strong.' You will encounter strange faces, but kind hearts—those who have loved your son."

Perhaps there were few happier persons that night than Mr. Mangles. There was no fear now that the firm would become extinct. George Markham and his son would bring fresh energy and youth to it. Everything had turned out as he could have wished; and he foresaw the time when he and his employer might leave the direction of affairs in younger hands. They had toiled long enough.

"I hope they have attended to the boy's book-keeping," he muttered to himself. "Surely, Richard has never neglected that."

"Even if he has," he thought, "a year or two under my care, and—yes, yes—that may be made all smooth."

In fact, the old clerk rather wished that his grandfather might have neglected our hero's education on that important point, so delightful did he feel would be the task of instructing him.

It was not extraordinary that, after the violent emotions she had endured, the sleep of Rachel Markham proved a restless one; that more than once she started from her pillow and asked herself if the happiness she felt was real, or whether imagination had not once more cheated her by one of those intensely vivid dreams which mock the sleep of sorrow.

So painful did this uncertainty at last become that she crept stealthily from her couch, and, hastily drawing a wrapper round her, proceeded to the room where Richard slept, in order to confirm or dissipate the doubt suggested by maternal love.

As her hand rested on the door of the chamber, she heard the object of her solicitude murmur her name in his slumber.

It was sufficient: her heart recognised his voice, and she knelt for an instant to pray and bless him.

In this position her husband, who had missed her from his side, discovered her, and would have tenderly reproached her for thus risking her health, had she not checked the words by placing her finger upon her lips.

"There!" she whispered, pointing to the room, "there! sleeping beneath our roof, all that a parent's love could wish him—noble, truthful, brave, and honest, George, restored to us at last! Have we not cause to be grateful?"

"We have, indeed," replied the father of our hero; "to our son I owe the re-establishing of my fair name; a better heritage than the fortune my industry may secure him; but this is not the hour, Rachel."

"I know it, George," interrupted his wife; "do not blame me, or deem me childish in my joy; I feared that my happiness was too great to be real. I doubted it. You are not angry with me?" she added, looking in his face with a smile.

"Angry!" repeated her husband, with emotion; "as readily might the wrecked mariner feel anger at the plank which bore him through the foaming surge to land; the bewildered traveller at the star, his guide amid the pathless desert's sands, as I with thee."

Our hero and his sister were the first to meet in the breakfast-room on the following morning.

"Richard, dear Richard!" exclaimed the gentle girl, as the arm of her brother enfolded her. "I cannot tell you how happy you have made us, how constantly you have been remembered and prayed for. It was not home without you," she added; "but I never despaired of your return."

"You believed in the promise of my friend Harry, then?" replied her brother, archly. "Poor fellow! the intelligence of my death placed him in a cruel position. I had bound him by a promise."

"Which he kept, I can assure you."

"To the risk of his happiness," observed our hero.

"How can you suppose such a thing," said Mary, blushing at the same time deeply; "why I don't even know his name!"

"Is not Harry a very pretty name?"

"I suppose it is not the only one."

"Morton, the son of an honourable man, one of our grandfather's oldest friends. He was my school-fellow, companion, friend. You must love him," he added, "for my sake."

His sister looked as if the task would not be a very difficult one, especially after listening to his exculpation.

"You must tell me about Lillian," she said, anxious to change the subject. "Grandpapa named her last night, and I feel so anxious to see her. I am certain that I shall love her dearly. She must be good as well as beautiful to have won your affection."

"Why so?" demanded Richard, with a smile.

"Because you are good and—but I must not say that, I might make you vain," answered Mary. "I have nothing left to wish for, now that you are restored to us," she continued, gazing fondly in his face. "I feel so proud of you. I used to envy my young companions who had brothers to love, to confide in, to look up to, to protect them, and felt so desolate. But that is past," she added, smiling through the tears the recollection caused her. "I shall never envy any one again."

"I have a vast debt of love to pay you," observed her brother, deeply moved by her artless words.

From that hour there were no secrets between them; each poured into the other's heart the confidence which becomes doubly sweet by being shared.

It was a gratifying sight to Rachel and her husband, on entering the breakfast-room, to find their children thus united.

During the morning Jack Manders made his appearance at the house, and was kindly, one might say affectionately, received by the parents of his benefactor and friend, who had informed them of his conduct to Lillian, his grateful fidelity to himself, and the noble constancy with which he had persevered in the path of integrity and truth.

At first the poor fellow felt embarrassed; he had not seen Mrs. Markham since the night he so generously defended her from the brutal violence of Carus Kearn upon the bridge. He recollected her only as one poor and humble as himself, and would never have recognised her surrounded by the elegancies and comforts that wealth bestows.

But Rachel had not forgotten him; pride had no place in her grateful heart, and she thanked him warmly for the past.

"This is some debt I am not aware of," observed her son. "Ah, Jack, you have secrets, I find, from me."

"Pray do not allude to it, sir," replied the young man, more abashed at being praised than ever he had been by reproaches.

"Sir!" repeated our hero; "I call you Jack."

"Mr. Richard—Richard, then," said his too humble friend, deeply gratified. "I knew that you were happy—happy as you deserve to be; but I wanted to witness it with my own eyes, and, as the lieutenant, Lady Bell, and Miss Lillian told me I might venture, I thought—"

"You would renew your acquaintance with old friends," observed Mary, advancing to him, and adding considerably to his embarrassment by placing both of her hands in his. "What! have you forgotten me?"

"Little—that is—I mean Miss Markham."

"Call me Mary," said the fair girl, with unaffected simplicity; "I like that name the best."

One hour—just one short hour—before the visit to his grandfather, Richard contrived to pass at Mivart's with Lillian; there appeared something wanting to complete his happiness till she shared it with him.

For once, the heart's anticipations were more than realised, and Christmas did, indeed, prove a happy day to the party assembled at the hospitable mansion of Mr. Bently. Sir Charles and Lady Bell met the parents of Richard more like relatives from whom they had long been separated, than strangers; and, after warmly congratulating them, presented their adopted child.

"I must claim a mother's share in your love," said Rachel, as she folded the blushing Lillian in her arms.

"You make me very happy," murmured our heroine.

Mary stole to her side and kissed her, by way of introducing herself to one whom henceforth she was to regard as a sister.

At table, Richard and his friend Harry Morton placed themselves by the side of the fair girls. Every one present seemed to understand the arrangement except Peter Mangles, whom it puzzled exceedingly. He could not comprehend why he had been deprived of his accustomed seat by Mary; and, during the evening, he took an opportunity of drawing her aside to satisfy his curiosity.

"Who is that young man," he inquired, "who appears so very attentive to you? I believe that is the word—attentive," he added, seriously.

"And a very pretty one, is it not?" demanded his favourite, archly.

"Well, yes, perhaps it is; but you have not answered my question."

"His name is Harry."

Peter mentally pronounced it anything but a business-like one—not a firm of that name in the City.

"He is a dear friend of Richard's," added Mary; "they were schoolfellows."

"What!" exclaimed the old man, "the mysterious gentleman in the square—the portrait—eh!"

The fair girl nodded in the affirmative.

"One word. Is he in the City?"

"Of course not, Peter," answered the young lady, with a playful smile; "we are none of us in the City now. Mr. Morton is, or rather will be, a barrister."

And without giving him time to ask another question, the happy creature escaped from him and joined her brother and Lillian.

Harry was standing near them.

For an instant Mr. Mangles looked very serious; something whispered to him that one of his anticipations were doomed to be disappointed. Mary would not become the wife of a man of business.

The feeling of regret was but a momentary one, and, quickly disappeared as he gazed upon her features radiant with happiness. As her glance met his, the old man gently shook his head, and sent her back smile for smile.

CHAPTER C.

Soliloquy:—Toy-hewitch'd,

Made blind by lusts, disherited of soul,

No common centre Man, no common sire

Knoweth! A sordid, solitary thing,

Mid countless brethren with a lonely heart,

Through courts and cities the smooth savage roams,

Feeling himself, his own low self the whole:

When he by sacred sympathy might make

The whole one self. Self, that no alien knows!

Self, far diffused as Fancy's wing can travel!

Self, spreading still! oblivious of its own,

Yet all of all possessing.—COLERIDGE.

INTELLIGENCE of the death of Andrew Silcox fell like a thunderbolt on Lady Boothroyd. It seemed to her like the breaking of the first thread in the web she had so skilfully woven. Marshall, the lawyer, was instantly telegraphed for; and, after a long conference, went down to St. Faith's with instructions to secure all papers, deeds, and letters the steward might have left in his hands, pertaining to the Meldown estate.

It was an anxious interval with the ambitious woman, till her agent returned. At the first glance of his features, she read that he had failed.

"Hear me," said the man of law, "before you blame me. I lost not an instant on my arrival, but proceeded at once to the Home Farm; where I found myself powerless to act—the executors had taken possession."

"Pshaw!" muttered her ladyship, angrily, "rustics. Have you lived all these years without learning the use of money? I gave you carte blanche."

"It was useless in the present instance," observed Marshall.

"How so?"

"The executors are Mr. Thornton and the tenant of Meldown. I think your ladyship must admit, with me, it would have been madness to have thought of bribing them."

Lady Boothroyd changed colour at the intelligence—the blow was as severe as unexpected. Of all men, Mr. Thornton was the one, perhaps, she dreaded most.

"Your visit, then, has utterly failed?" she observed.

"As far as actual success is concerned, it has," answered the lawyer; "but I have obtained valuable information."

"Proceed," exclaimed his hearer, impatiently.

"Andrew, you are aware, was murdered by his brother, who lately escaped from the hulks at Chatham, who—"

"Yes, yes," interrupted her ladyship, "I have heard that; the rector wrote to inform me. The wretched murderer was shot at the time, and is since dead."

"He was not alone," continued her agent; "he had a companion, of whose identity I have obtained a clue."

"What care I for the identity of the assassin!" interrupted the lady, in a tone of angry impatience.

"You have not heard all," said Mr. Marshall, with a marked emphasis upon the word "all."

In an instant his hearer became calm. "The man I allude to," continued the speaker, "escaped at the very moment the crime was detected. In his flight he took with him some deed or parchment, which the steward had been perusing when they surprised him."

"It must have been the codicil," exclaimed Lady Boothroyd, thrown off her guard by the intelligence. Scarcely had the words passed her lips than she bitterly repented the indiscretion.

"Codicil!" mentally ejaculated the lawyer; "to whose will, I wonder; Sir Norman's, or his uncle's?"

"Marshall," said the widow of his former client, "I will not attempt to deceive you. There are reasons which make the recovery of that deed of importance to me. You say you have obtained a clue to the identity of the ruffian who has possessed himself of it. Follow it with the perseverance of the blood-hound; spare not either for money or promises; bring it to me; and name your own reward."

"Liberal terms, Lady Boothroyd; certainly very liberal," replied her agent; "and I will do my best to carry out your instructions."

"To whom has Andrew Silex left his ill-gotten wealth?" demanded her ladyship.

Her visitor could scarcely repress a smile. The question confirmed the suspicions he had long entertained of some dishonest service rendered by the steward, which had been exorbitantly paid.

"To a young gentleman who proves to be a grandson of Mr. Bentley, your tenant of Meldown."

"And the motive for this unaccountable generosity?"

"I could not learn that."

"Who drew up the will?"

"Mr. Thornton."

Again the name of her upright country neighbour fell with an ominous, unpleasant sound upon the ear of the manœuvring, artful woman; who felt that a storm was gathering round her it would require all her energy to meet.

"I must urge this marriage to a conclusion," she said, as soon as she found herself once more alone. "Alice the wife of Illston, his father must support me with all the influence of his name and character. Our interests will then be the same."

Having come to this conclusion, she wrote two long and artfully concocted letters, one to her nephew—a second to the earl; in which she not only hinted, but urged her views. In the first she sought to excite the jealousy of the viscount, by informing him of the declaration she had intercepted from William Thornton to her daughter. The attempt failed, as far as the jealousy of the noble suitor was concerned, for there can be no jealousy without love; but it answered the writer's purpose quite as well.

It re-kindled the slumbering hate he had long entertained against his former defender and school-fellow.

In her epistle to the earl, she complained of his son's coldness and inattention to Alice, and plainly stated her opinion that the match ought to be at once concluded or broken off.

The effect of her scheme was not doubtful. As far as the gentlemen were concerned, it succeeded.

From the day of Sir Norman's death the promise so heartlessly extorted from his child weighed heavily upon her spirit; it seemed to envelope her like a shroud; for to a pure and generous being like Alice the grave would have been preferable to a marriage with her cousin. There was not one feeling of sympathy between them.

"Would I were poor!" she frequently murmured to herself; "Illston would not then persecute me with his odious love. Love!" she repeated, scornfully: "he knows not the meaning of the word. It is a noble passion, and seeks no happiness that is not mutual. My poor father, little did he imagine the hopeless misery to which he condemned his child. I was weak, very weak to have yielded to his entreaties."

Alice Boothroyd was indeed to be pitied; and yet the world, which judges from the tinsel of outward show, doubtless envied her. She was young, beautiful, and rich; what more, in its opinion, could any reasonable being demand to constitute happiness?

More than once the unhappy girl had thought of making an appeal to the honour and manliness of Illston, not to enforce a promise destructive to her happiness; but when an occasion arrived—which was not often, for feeling secure of his victim, the noble viscount gave himself but little trouble to conciliate her—the courage of Alice failed her.

There was a cynical glance in his cold, gray eye which seemed to mock her sorrow.

She had not even the consolation of a mother's sympathy, for, as our readers are aware, but little confidence existed between Lady Boothroyd and her daughter.

Since the death of her husband the manœuvring woman had become still more harsh and despotic in her bearing, thinking by such conduct to crush all spirit of resistance to her wishes. Little did the parent know the heart of her only child; but for the promise given to the dead, Alice would have broken her fetters and cast them to the wind.

She was seated in the drawing-room in St. James's-square, meditating on her unhappy position, when the earl and his son were both announced. The peer was not a bad-hearted man; through life everything had gone smoothly with him. The woman he had married performed the duties of her station gracefully, that is to say, she received his friends, presided at his table, and made his home agreeable by the refinement of her manners. Every one admired and spoke well of the countess. What could he desire more?

"My mother is, in her dressing-room," said his niece, after the usual compliments and inquiries had passed. "I will inform her you are here."

Like the fluttered bird, she wished to escape the presence of her persecutor; but his lordship comprehended her motive, and, with his usual tact, defeated it.

"I am quite old enough," he said, "to visit my sister-in-law in her dressing-room without scandal; do not trouble yourself, Alice."

Before she could reply to him he had quitted the room. Evidently the visit of Lord Carlington and his son, as well as the absence of her mother, had been arranged.

Without being positively rude, Alice could not quit the room; to conceal her embarrassment, she walked to the window, and gazed on the children and their nurses in the square.

"She certainly does most cordially detest me," thought Illston; "well, it will render our marriage the more piquant. Once mine, I will give her full liberty to hate me."

"You must find your home exceedingly dull," he said, speaking aloud, "especially at this season of the year. My father's visit to town is a mere flying one—a cabinet council, or some such prosy affair."

Alice glanced at the mourning dress she still wore for her father. The speaker understood the appeal.

"Ah! yes," he continued; "but that was six months ago. Consider my feelings."

The smile of scorn which curled the lips of his hearer stung the speaker to the quick, for, like most selfish men, he was as vain as heartless.

"Not that I presume to urge them," he added, in a tone of bitterness. "Too well I know how slight an interest my devoted love has awakened in your heart. But is it wise, Alice, to cherish this indifference? Our marriage is an arrangement settled beyond the power of recall. Instead of protracting the engagement to the extreme limit your promise to your father will allow you, why not at once fulfil it?"

The visible shudder which ran through the frame of his cousin proved how little chance the viscount had of inducing her to hasten the period of the sacrifice.

"The countess and your mother are of opinion," he resumed, "that you might do so without impropriety, and you know they are unexceptionable authorities in all that regards the convenance du monde."

"Act generously, Illston," exclaimed Alice Boothroyd, gathering courage from her despair, "and, instead of urging the completion of a promise wrung from my lips by a dying parent's entreaties, release me from it. It is not my fault that I cannot love," she added, "that my heart revolts at our union. In the world you may find one more sensible of the honour of bearing your name."

"But none so worthy," interrupted his lordship, with a forced attempt at gallantry.

"More fair."

"Scarcely."

"And richer."

"You insult me, Alice," replied the viscount, "by a supposition that wealth could influence me. Were you poor and dowdless, I should still demand the fulfilment of the promise made to your dead father."

The marked emphasis upon the last few words proved that the speaker indulged in no illusion respecting the nature of the chain by which he held his victim bound.

"You must have some heart," continued the poor girl. "Why condemn me to a fate others might envy? Why pass like a dark shadow between me and the sunshine of existence. Release me from my fatal, inconsiderate promise, and I will bless you."

"Never."

"Pledge myself never to be another's."

"Never," repeated his lordship, with a bitterness which denoted the depth of his resolution. "You have my answer."

"Enjoy your triumph," replied Alice, bursting into tears; "but it is a heartless and unmanly one. I have schooled my pride to beg where I despise. I have received your answer, my lord, now hear mine. Until the customary year of mourning has expired, no amount of persuasion or persecution shall induce me to bestow my hand. The pleasure may be a sad one, but I will not abridge my last hours of liberty."

"And when the year has expired?"

"Fear not, sir," she answered, turning from him with an expression of mingled aversion and disgust. "If living, the sacrifice will not be wanting."

"The promise is not a very gracious one," observed the gentleman, with an ironical bow, "but it will be remembered."

"Absurd! childish! ridiculous!" exclaimed Lady Boothroyd, entering from the inner drawing-room, where she had been a concealed listener to the latter part of the conversation we have narrated. "Alice, I blush for you."

"I am sorry if I have given you occasion, mother," answered her daughter, calmly; "but my heart does not reproach me."

"Alice, my dear child," said her uncle, who now joined them, "this is positively unkind; consider Illston's feelings."

"Hang the fellow!" he mentally added; "why does he not try to look a little more sentimental?"

"He has shown so much for mine," observed the heiress, reproachfully.

"Remember that he loves," urged the peer.

"And I do not," replied his niece.

It was in vain that Lady Boothroyd tried to shake her resolution by indulging by turns in entreaties, cajolery, and reproaches; the resolution of Alice was not to be shaken. When urged almost beyond the limits of endurance by her mother's violence, the hitherto meek and obedient girl startled even her haughty spirit by the determination she displayed.

"This is a cruelty," she exclaimed, "which nature tells me I ought to resist. Reason suggests a doubt whether I am really bound by a promise extorted from me by a parent on his death-bed. Rather than be forced to its fulfilment I will break it," she added, with nervous excitement, "and let the sin, if sin there be, fall upon those who have driven me to it."

"Alice!"

"Oh, mother! mother, is there no voice to plead within your heart for your unhappy child?"

"None for her disobedience," replied her ladyship, coldly.

"Alice," said the peer, whose pride began to be touched by her openly-expressed aversion, "if this repugnance is really insurmountable—"

"Silence, my lord," interrupted his sister-in-law; "I blush for your weakness, in listening to the ravings of a silly, romantic girl."

"I, at least, am not influenced by them," observed her nephew, coolly; "if my cousin chooses to perjure herself, rather than keep her promise to her dead father, it is an affair between her and her own conscience."

Alice clasped her hands despairingly. "I do not intend to release her from it," he continued; "there is no fear of my displaying any such weakness. At the expiration of the year I am to have my answer. I can wait."

With these words the noble viscount quitted the room; they had been artfully calculated, he knew the effect they must produce upon the mind of his victim.

We know of nothing more difficult than to keep a secret in London; by secret we mean, of course, one of those circumstances in which the curiosity or the interests of the public are concerned. By some occult means or other the affair is certain to ooze out. At first a mysterious paragraph appears, conveying obscure hints; next initials, and lastly names are given, and facts stated which the idlers of society find patience and leisure to sift, till they have separated the truth, or something approximating to it, like corn from the chaff.

A few days after the interview which, as Alice Boothroyd believed, sealed her fate, she was startled by reading the following paragraph in one of the morning papers, headed "Extraordinary Disclosure in High Life":—

"A curious case is likely to employ the eloquence of the gentlemen of the long robe. A claimant, it is confidently stated, has appeared for the estates, or, at least, a portion of them, of a certain wealthy baronet, Sir N— B—, lately deceased, in the person of the daughter of his late brother. The facts, we are told, are of a most interesting and romantic character. The young lady was stolen when a child, and sent to India. An attempt to remove her of a yet more criminal nature has been hinted at, which, seeing the position and high character of the parties implicated, it would not be prudent to do more than allude to.

"The only daughter of the deceased baronet, and his presumed heiress, is not yet of age, and has long been betrothed to the eldest son of the Earl of C—, a distinguished member of the cabinet.

"The affair has created immense sensation in certain fashionable and aristocratic circles. The abduction of the claimant is stated to have taken place at St. Faith's."

Alice read the paragraph twice, and then handed the paper to her mother, whose countenance, despite her long habit of self-command, flushed deeply as she perused it.

"Ridiculous!" she exclaimed, tossing the journal from her. "The impertinence of these newspaper creatures is really becoming intolerable."

Her daughter was not deceived by her manner and affected indifference. Suddenly she recollected the little prisoner in the pavilion at Meldown Park.

"Was my uncle Allan ever married?" she asked.

"Not that I ever heard of," answered her ladyship. "At least, they have no proof that such a circumstance ever took place."

Alice mentally repeated the word they.

"There is some truth, then," she observed, "in the report."

"An absurd attempt to foist the child of a common soldier—a fellow who would have been hanged for murdering one of your father's keepers had he lived—into the family," replied her mother. "The girl has fallen into the hands of a set of scheming adventurers, whose object is doubtless to extort money by urging the claims of an impostor."

"Is she an impostor?" demanded her daughter, at the same time fixing her eyes upon those of her parent.

"A wise question, truly," observed her mother, embarrassed by the suddenness as well as the straight-forward nature of the demand. "Of course she is. One thing at least is certain," she added, "impostor or no impostor, this pretended cousin can have no more claim to the Meldown property than the meanest beggar in the streets. The will of your great-uncle is quite clear in that respect."

Alice did not feel so convinced; her recollection once more reverted to the prisoner in the pavilion, and the first faint dawn of hope awoke in her sad heart.

"Were I poor," she thought, "Ilston would never claim me;" and in her heart she devoutly prayed that the claims of Lillian might prove well-founded.

Gladly would the persecuted girl have exchanged wealth for liberty.

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

THE BLESSINGS OF POVERTY.

If there is anything in the world which a young man should be more grateful for than another, it is the poverty which launches us in life under very great disadvantages. Poverty is one of the best tests of human quality. A triumph over it is like graduating with honours at Oxford or Cambridge. It demonstrates mental stamina. It is a certificate of worthy labour faithfully performed. A young man who cannot stand this test is not good for anything. He can never rise to affluence or station. A young man who cannot feel his determination strengthened as the yoke of poverty presses upon him, and his energy rise with every difficulty which poverty throws in his way, had better never enter the lists with the champions of self-reliance.

Poverty makes more men than it ruins. It ruins only those who are destitute of sterling energy of character; while it makes the fortunes of multitudes whom wealth would have ruined.

Now if any young man with a good fortune, and in the possession of that which is commonly called an excellent opening in life, reads this paper, let him be warned in time. His advantages may be anything but what they seem; they may turn out to be the bane of his life; the full pocket in the long run may be beaten by the empty purse, for money will never make a man, and never did in the whole course of the world's history.

No, young man, if you are poor, thank Heaven, and take courage. You have the prospect of making your own way in the world. If you had plenty of money, ten chances to one it would spoil you for all useful purposes. Do you lack education? have you enjoyed but little schooling? Remember that education does not consist in the multitude of things which a man possesses. What can you do?—that is the question which settles the matter for you. Do you know your business? Do you know men, and how to deal with them? Has your mind, by any means whatsoever, received that discipline which gives to its action power and facility? If so, then you are more of a man, and a thousand times better educated, than the youth who has graduated at a college, but who knows nothing of the practical business of life. And as to wealth, there are very few men in the world less than thirty years of age and unmarried who can afford to be rich. One of the greatest benefits to be reaped from great financial disasters is the saving of a large crop of young men. They are taught that they must help themselves: they get energy of character, and personal enterprise, and industry, in place of a foolish dependence on the wealth which their fathers or grandfathers have accumulated before them; they are made to work, and work gives to their character that nobility and manhood which are not to be obtained without it.

In regard to the choice of a profession, every young man must consult his own inclination. If you adopt a trade or profession do not be persuaded to resign it, unless you are perfectly satisfied that you are not adapted for it. Advice of all sorts you are certain to receive; but if you follow it, and it leads you into a profession which starves you, those who gave the advice never feel bound to give you any money. You have to take care of yourself in this world, and you had best choose your own way of doing it; always remembering that it is not your trade or profession which makes you respectable, but that respectability depends on the manner in which you discharge the duties devolving upon you.

Manhood, and profession or handicraft, are entirely different things. God makes men, and men make lawyers, doctors, carpenters, bricklayers, all the trades or occupations of life. The offices of men may be more or less important, and of higher or lower quality, but manhood is nobler than any, and distinct from all. A profession or trade is not the end of life; it is an instrument taken into our hands by which to gain a livelihood. Thoroughly acquired and assiduously followed, a trade is still to be held at arms' length. It should not be allowed to tyrannise over, to mould, or to crush a man. It should not occupy the whole of his attention. So far from this, it should be regarded only as a means for the development of manhood. The first object of living is the attainment of true manhood, the cultivation of every power of the soul, and of every high spiritual quality. Trade is beneath the man, and should be kept there. With this idea in your mind, look round you, and see how almost everybody has missed the true aim of life. They have not striven to be men, but to be lawyers, doctors, tradesmen, or mechanics—they have missed the chief end of life, and though they may become influential in their professions, they have failed to make the right use of their existence.

Elihu Burritt cultivated the manhood that was in him until his trade and his blacksmith's shop ceased to be useful to him, and he could get a living in a more congenial way.

It is not necessary that you should be a "learned blacksmith," but it is necessary that you be superior to your occupation, and that to attain MANHOOD be the great end of your struggle with the world.

FRENCH LESSONS;

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH.

CHAPTER XXV.

"You remember, Robert, that yesterday you did not finish the list of trees and fruits," observed George, as he took his seat beside his pupil. "Suppose you begin to-day's lesson with the vocabulary, and commence with a favourite of ours, viz., a walnut-tree."

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.
A walnut-tree	Un noyer
A walnut	Une noix
A nut-tree	Un noisetier
A nut	Une noisette
An olive-tree	Un olivier
An olive	Une olive
A fir-tree	Un pin
A fir-apple	Une pomme de pin
A plane-tree	Un platane
A pear-tree	Un poirier
A pear	Une poire
An apple-tree	Un pommier
An apple	Une pomme
Currants	Des groseilles
Gooseberries	Des gros-groseilles
The vine	La vigne
The grapes	Les raisins
A plum-tree	Un prunier
A plum	Une prune
A willow	Un saule
A weeping willow	Un saul pleureur
A lime or linden-tree	Un tilleul
An aspen	Un tremble

"I must now tell you a few idioms relating to fruit—

"You know we speak of the stones in plums, cherries, peaches, or apricots, but it would be incorrect to translate this word stone by pietre; it is, correctly speaking, noyau. Thus, 'Take the stone out of this cherry, peach, apricot, or plum,' would be, 'Otez le noyau de cette cerise, de cette pêche, de cet abricot, de cette prune.'

"What we call pips the French call pépins. Example, 'Take the pips out of these apples and these pears,' 'Otez les pépins de ces pommes, de ces poires.'

"You must also recollect that, although groseilles is the French for currants, 'groseilles noires' is not the French for black currants; this fruit is called 'le cassis.' Observe it is used in the singular, therefore you must say for 'I do not like black currants,' 'Je n'aime pas le cassis.'

"Grapes may also be spoken of in the singular number. In fact, it is more in accordance with the French idiom to say 'Voulez-vous du raisin,' for 'Will you have some grapes,' than to say 'Voulez-vous des raisins.' As to the word grappes, when you meet with it, you must not think it means grapes. It is the French for bunch, as applied to grapes. 'Des grappes de raisin,' means 'bunches of grapes.'

"By way of variety, and also as an act of justice, I am now about to praise you.

"When, at the Crystal Palace, we were accosted by a French acquaintance of mine, you made a great effort over yourself, conquered your shyness, and joined in the French conversation. I do not say you used many idioms. It was evident to me you were translating your English thoughts. What of that? You spoke with tolerable fluency. Jules de la Lance understood you, and when I told him how short a time you had been studying his language, he could hardly believe me. If you only persevere as you have hitherto done, your English French will soon become good idiomatic French, because all the rules deduced from, and illustrated by the exercises and dialogues, will impress themselves on your mind, and soon be 'ready when called for.' But if you imitated some shy, conceited people I know, and wanted to talk well, before you talked at all, the chances are, that as far as French is concerned, you would ever have remained silent."

Robert was much delighted at George's commendation, and he felt it would give him courage and hope under all the difficulties of the language he was studying.

"The exercise you have to write to-day, Robert," said the preceptor, "is still on the subject of the degrees of comparison; so you must bear in mind all the rules I gave you yesterday, and also endeavour to impress the following remarks on your memory.

"It is very important to avoid confounding comparative adjectives with comparative adverbs. Mieux, pis, and moins are comparative adverbs; and they are rendered in English by words that are both adjectives and adverbs, according to the sense in which they are used. I am speaking of 'better,' 'worse,' and 'less.' By comparing these words, I shall show you the difference of their formation.

"Meilleur, better, is an adjective, the comparative of bon, good. It is used instead of plus bon, which would be very incorrect in French. Mieux, better, is an adverb, used instead of plus bien. Pire, worse, is an adjective, and is used for plus mauvais; which latter expression may also be used. Pis, worse, is an adverb; it may be used instead of plus mal; but plus mal is not incorrect. In like manner, moindre and plus petit may be used for the adjective (in the comparative degree) less; but the adverb moins, less, is always to be used instead of plus peu, which would be decidedly wrong in French.

"The illustrations in the exercise will impress these rules on your memory."

EXERCISE.

1. This champagne is not better than mine. 2. These children are worse than you think. 3. He speaks much better than he writes. 4. Is that apple better than the other? 5. La plus ancienne et la plus générale de toutes les espèces d'idolatrie, était le culte rendu au soleil.

"Let us now return to our travellers, and see how they are getting on at Paris. You recollect that they had decided on arranging a plan for seeing the beauties of Paris."

CONTINUATION OF
LE VOYAGE À PARIS.

Here I am, at the appointed time. Me voici à l'heure indiquée. I am delighted to see you. Je suis charmé de vous voir. Where shall we go to-day? Où irons-nous aujourd'hui? Let us first go and procure some furnished apartments. Allons d'abord chercher un petit appartement garni. Oh, I am so comfortable here. Je suis si bien ici. Yes, but as we intend remaining some time in Paris, we must consult economy. Oui, mais puisque nous allons séjourner pendant quelque temps à Paris, il faut consulter l'économie. I will do anything you like. Je ferai tout ce que bon voudrez. I will give you good advice. Je vous donnerai de bons conseils. Paris is a peculiar town, where you may live at the rate of three francs, or of a hundred francs a day. Paris est une ville toute exceptionnelle, où l'on peut vivre à raison de trois francs, ou de cent francs par jour. A hundred francs a day! Cent francs par jour! That would not do. We must consult our means. Cela n'irait pas. Il faut consulter nos ressources. The price of apartments depends on the locality, and the floor on which they are. Le prix des appartements varie selon les quartiers, et les étages où ils sont situés. Where do the rich families live? Où habitent les familles riches? Often in the neighbourhood of the "Boulevards." One can have handsome furnished apartments at 1,000 or 1,200 francs per month, consisting of two bedrooms, a dining-room, a drawing-room, a dressing-room, a kitchen, and servants' rooms. Souvent dans les environs des Boulevards. On a un grand appartement meublé pour 1,000 ou 1,200 francs par mois, deux chambres à coucher, salon, salle-à-manger, cabinet de toilette, cuisine, et chambres de domestiques. But that's very dear. Mais c'est très cher. Listen to me. The same apartment in the Faubourg St. Germain, or the Faubourg St. Honoré, might be had for four or five hundred francs a month. Écoutez. Le même appartement dans le Faubourg St. Germain, ou le Faubourg St. Honoré, se louerait pour quatre ou cinq cents francs par mois. Let us take small furnished apartments in the Faubourg St. Honoré. Prenons un petit appartement garni dans le Faubourg St. Honoré.

As there are only two of us, suitable apartments will not cost us dear.

Puisque nous ne sommes qu'à deux, un appartement convenable ne nous coûtera pas cher.

OF THE SOUND ou.

The letters o, u, united together, form a simple sound, ou, similar to that of oo in too, or u in bull. This sound presents no difficulty, being the same in all cases; it results also from the following combinations: out, in tout, all; ous, in vous, you; oux, in jalous, jealous; oul, in soul, drunk; u, after the letter q in équateur. The grave accent, which is sometimes placed over the syllable ou, does not change its pronunciation. (See the letter u.)

Thus the sound ou is the result of the following combinations: ou, out, ous, oux, oul, ou, u.

OF THE SOUND ou.

This sound is similar to that of the English letters oo in the words fool, moon, &c. It differs from the preceding in being a little longer, as may be seen by the corresponding English sound; as in joûte, coûte, &c.

This sound is also produced by the following combinations: août, in août, August; oue, in joue, cheek.

Thus the sound ou is produced by the following combinations: ou, août, oue.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON XXIV.

DECOMPOSITION OF LIGHT.

596. What does a ray of white light, from the sun or other source of light, consist of?—Several rays of different colours.

597. How may this be shown?—By admitting a ray of solar light through a very small hole in a window-shutter into a dark room, and allowing it to pass through a prism.

598. What is observed on the white screen?—A beautiful display of brilliant colours, like a piece of a rainbow, called the Solar Spectrum.

599. How does the prism separate these colours and throw them on different parts of the screen?—It refracts some more than others.

600. Mention the seven colours of the spectrum, beginning with the colour that is least refracted.—Red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo, and violet.

601. By whom was the decomposition of light with a prism first accomplished?—By Sir Isaac Newton.

602. Is it now believed that white light really consists of seven pure colours?—The present belief is that it is composed of but three simple colours, red, yellow, and blue.

603. Who has established this?—Sir David Brewster, of Scotland.

604. What has he shown to be true with regard to the other colours of the spectrum, viz., orange, green, indigo, and violet?—That they are but different combinations of the three simple colours; orange, for example, is chiefly a mixture of red and yellow, and green of yellow and blue, the indigo of blue and violet.

605. How was the orange-coloured light of the spectrum separated into its elementary colours by Sir David Brewster?—By passing it through a piece of blue glass of a certain thickness. This extinguished the red light, and allowed the yellow to pass on to the eye.

606. It would seem, then, that all the red light does not go to one part of the spectrum, all the yellow to another part, and all the blue to another, as Newton supposed?—Some portion of each of these colours is found in all parts of the spectrum.

607. Why does one ray of light affect the eye with a sensation of red, another with a sensation of yellow, and a third with a sensation of blue?—The particles of ether vibrate more rapidly in a ray of yellow than in one of red light, and more rapidly in one of blue than in one of yellow light. These different rates of vibration produce different impressions on the retina.

608. To show the wonderful sensibility of the eye, mention the number of vibrations per second of each of the three simple colours.—In red light there are 458 trillions of vibrations in a second, in yellow light there are 585 trillions, and in blue light 622 trillions. The retina of the eye distinguishes between these numbers, so enormously great.

609. To what do the different-coloured rays correspond among sounds?—To musical sounds of different pitch: thus, blue may be said to be light of a higher pitch than yellow, and yellow to be light of a higher pitch than red.

610. Does the eye take the same delight in the variety and harmony of colours that the ear does in the variety and concord of musical sounds?—It does.

611. What colours of the spectrum harmonise with each other, or make an agreeable impression when seen together?—Red harmonises with bluish green, orange with blue, yellow with indigo, green with reddish violet, and violet with yellowish green.

612. What is the explanation of the flashing brilliancy of the diamond?—The diamond has a very high refracting power; as a consequence, a strong light reflected from the back part of the stone, and the light that enters one of the faces and passes out at another is widely dispersed into its elementary colours. For this purpose faces are cut on the original stone.

THE RAINBOW.

613. How is the rainbow produced?—It is formed by the reflection of sun-light from falling drops of light.

614. Trace the course of the light.—It enters a drop, is reflected from the back part of it, comes out again at the front part, and passes on to the eye.

615. What is the cause of the colours of the rainbow?—The separation of the coloured rays of which the sun's light is composed, as the light enters and leaves the drop.

MY FIRST LOVE.

THAT I was in love was a fact that did not admit of a shadow of doubt. I deported myself like a person in love; I talked like a person in love; I looked like a person in love, and felt like a person in love. The affection that had taken possession of my youthful heart was no everyday one; I was sure of that. There weren't words enough in the English language to describe the height, depth, length, and breadth of its grandeur. It was destined to be a grand accompaniment of the ages yet to be; a fixed principle throughout eternity; a planet of surpassing beauty in the broad heavens of home affections. My love was returned!—the strong yearnings of my nineteen-year-old heart went out in the direction of the most beautiful maiden in all—shire, and the most beautiful maiden in all—shire, in return, sent the yearnings of her heart out to meet mine. Twice a week, as often as the weeks came around, I went up to the old brown home of Dr. Stoddard to tell his daughter my love, and as regularly listened to a recital of its return from the red lips of my charming Janet. The good doctor made merry at our expense, and his jolly wife took a wicked pleasure in constantly reminding us of our youth. Janet was tortured by sly references to her play-house in the shed, her long-sleeved pinafores and pantalettes of six months before; while I was offered, while the doctor's wife wore a face of immovable sobriety, an old coat of the doctor's for my mother to make into a dressing-gown for me.

We were, nevertheless, determined to be married. We would steal slyly away from the house while our cruel friends reposed in the arms of Morpheus; lie us, on "the wings of love," to the nearest city; Janet would become in a moment's time, Mrs. Jason Brown, and I Mrs. Jason Brown's husband.

At once we set about making preparations for this important journey. Everything, of course, must be conducted with the greatest secrecy. At twelve o'clock I was to leave my home stealthily, get my father's gray nag noiselessly out of the barn and harness her, and then proceed to Janet. Janet was to be waiting for me at her chamber window. I was to place a ladder at that same window; she was to descend that ladder; we were to fly down to the road through the old lane, to the spot where the horse was fastened, and then the wind should not outrun us.

There was but one difficulty in the way. Janet's room was shared by her sister Fanny, a little, mischievous, wicked creature of eleven summers, who, to use Janet's words, "was awake at all hours of the night." There was but one way for us if Fanny was aroused; she must be bribed into silence. For that purpose I placed in Janet's hand a round, shining, silver dollar. But Janet needed assistance, so she concluded to make Fanny her confidante the very afternoon before we started, and in that case prevent all possibility of her raising the house by a sudden outcry.

Well, the long looked-for, hoped-for, and yet dreaded night arrived at last. How slowly its leaden feet carried away the hours, and what a strange heartful of emotions I bore up, as I sat by my chamber window looking out, as I thought, for the last time, upon the home of my father. The moon was out in all her splendour; she was kind to me, lighting up with her silver touches all the spots my eyes might wish to rest upon before I went out into the world a wanderer. The broad fields lay out smooth and shining before my gaze; the fields in which I had worked by my father's side since I was a little boy—ah! a dear, kind father he had been! (At this juncture my throat began to swell.) I turned away from the window.

"If I could but see my mother once more!" I exclaimed, rubbing my eyes with my coat-sleeve. "No one ever had a better mother than I have."

I sat down in a chair and sobbed outright. I looked around for something to take with me that my mother's hand had blessed with her touch. There was a spinning-wheel in the room where I slept; at the end of its spindle hung a woollen roll. With my knife I half cut and half tore it off, pressed it fervently to my lips, and then placed it tenderly in my vest pocket. I had not time to do more; the old clock in the kitchen warned me solemnly that my appointed time had arrived, and, with a slow, sad, at noiseless step I left the house. Once out in the open air, my wonted lightness of spirits returned. I soled myself with the thought that in a few years I should return again, a strong, healthy, wealthy, respected, and influential man, an honour to my friends, a blessing to my friends, and—the husband of Janet.

I have often wondered since, how I succeeded in getting away from home with my horse and cart without arousing any one. But as good luck would have it, I made a triumphant exit from the old place, and a few moments was jogging fearlessly along toward the home of Janet. My only dread was of the little sprite Fan; if after all she should betray us, what a dreadful, direful, desperate mischief it would be!—what a wretched predicament affairs would be! I groaned aloud at the thought; yet I put a brave face upon the matter; I said that if it was right that we should go, we should go; if it wasn't right in all probability we should stay at home; yet, right or not right, if that miserable little Fan did betray us, I'd spend all my days in avenging the wrong—that was certain. Was I in earnest?—did I mean it? But we shall see.

How earnest and anxiously I gazed towards the chamber window of Janet, as, after fastening my horse by the roadside, I walked cautiously upon the long lane that led to the doctor's house. O joy inexpressible!—the wing of a white handkerchief in the moonlight told me that everything was right, that in a few moments I should clasp Janet fondly to my breast, mine, mine forever! Ah, how happy I was!—so happy, indeed, that I stood still there in the moonlight, with my two hands pressed firmly to my left side, for fear my overladen heart would burst away from me entirely. What a figure I must have cut then! What an Apollo must have looked, with my fine proportions, wrapped up in my wedding suit! I was slender; I was tall; I was gaunt; I am sure I was ugly-looking at that moment.

What possessed me I cannot tell, but from an old chest I had taken a blue broadcloth swallow-tail coat that had belonged to my grandfather in the time of the wars, and in the pride of my youth had got into it. The tails came nearly to my heels, while the waist was nearly to my armpits. The sleeves reached down to the tips of my fingers, hiding entirely from view the luxuriant pair of white silk gloves, which I had allowed myself for the important occasion. Above this uncouth pile of blue broadcloth was perched a hat. O ye stars an moon that looked upon it, testify with me that it was a hat!—a hat and not a stove-pipe, a hat and not a boot-leg! That hat!—looking back at it through the mists of twenty-five years, it seems to have arisen to the stature of two full feet, while its brim appears but little wider than my thumb nail. My eyesight isn't quite as perfect now as it used to be, and so I may not see quite rightly. Make all due allowances, dear reader.

I say that I must have looked ugly at that moment. Be that as it may, I thought I was looking splendidly; I thought the figure I cut was an honour to the name of Brown, and I was proud of it, proud as I stalked up to Janet's window, and placed carefully there the ladder that was to bear her to my side. Everything was silent about the house. Fan was surely with us; Fanny had been bribed into service. As I stood there, I could see her light, lithe little figure fit noiselessly to and fro by the window, and how I blessed her—blessed her, from the very bottom of my heart, for her kindness!

At last Janet commenced descending the ladder, and as she did so, the moon crowded in out of sight under a huge black cloud. The very heavens favoured us; our success might be looked upon as fixed. Three steps more upon the ladder's rounds, and Janet's dainty little feet would stand upon terra firma beside my own. The steps were taken, and she held for a moment fondly by the sleeves of my blue broadcloth, before we looked up to the window, both with upraised hands to catch a small bundle of clothing that Fanny was to throw down to us, and which we had no other means of carrying with us.

"Be quiet, Fan," whispered Janet, as her sister appeared at the window and poised the bundle above our heads. "Be quiet, Fan, for Heaven's sake, and drop it quickly!"

But Fanny still stood there, swinging backward and forward, backward and forward, the huge bundle, without heeding Janet's earnest entreaty.

"Do, do throw it, Fanny dear! Do have some mercy on me! What if father should know of this? What if he should be awakened—"

"La, give it her, Fan; don't plague your sister, she's in a hurry!" called a voice at that moment from the closed blinds of the parlour windows, which belonged to none other than Dr. Stoddard. "Give her the things, and tell the boys to carry out a bag of corn, a cheese, some wheat, and some butter to the cart. Janet must have a setting out. Only be still about it, Fan."

For a moment we were petrified upon the spot; I thought I should fall to the ground. What should we do—run, faint, die, evaporate, or go mad. While we stood undecided, two huge mattresses fell at our feet from the window, followed at once by sheets, pillow-cases, quilts, table-cloths, and sundry other articles necessary to the setting up of a respectable housekeeping establishment.

"Mother, mother, don't one of these new feather-beds belong to Janet?" called Charlie Stoddard, from one part of the house.

"Yes, yes, and a bolster, and a pair of nice pillows, too. Carry 'em right out of the front door," was the answer.

"Whose horse have you, Jason?" asked the doctor, pushing open the blind. "Your father's?"

"Y-e-e-s, sir," I stammered.

"Humph, didn't you know better than that? That old gray isn't worth a button to go. Why didn't you come up to my barn and get my black mare? Sam, Sam, hurry away straight to the barn and harness black Molly for Jason. If you'll believe it, he was going to start off with his father's old horse! Be quick, Sam, work lively: they're in a hurry; it's time they were off!"

"Have you anything with you, Janet, to eat on the road?" put in Mrs. Stoddard, poking her head out of the window.

"No, ma'am," faltered Janet, moving a step or two from me.

"Well, that's good forethought! And if I live, there isn't a bit of cake cooked in the house, either! Can you make some white bread and bacon, and some brown bread and cheese do, Jason? It's all we have."

"Yes, ma'am," I said, meekly, stepping easily as I could a little further from Janet.

"Look, father and mother, quick, now the moon is out, and see Jason's new coat and hat!" called Fan, from the window, her merry voice trembling with suppressed laughter. "Isn't that coat a splendid one, father?—just look at the length of its tails!"

"Just give me my glasses, wife," said the doctor.

"Is it a new one, Jason?"

"Yes, sir, rather new," I said, giving an eager look in the direction of the lane.

"Well," drawled the doctor, eyeing me slyly, "that coat is handsome!"

"And his hat, father!" called the wicked little Fan.

"I de-clare!" exclaimed the doctor. "Wife, wife, look here, and see Jason's coat and hat!"

What should I do—stand there till morning before that incessant fire of words? should I run? should I sneak off slowly, as Janet was doing? What, oh! what should I do?

"Don't they look nice, mother?" asked the doctor, putting one broad, brown hand over his mouth, and doubling his gray head almost down to his knees.

"He-haw, he-haw, hi-he-haw! mother—he-haw!—don't they look nice?" roared the doctor.

I couldn't stand it any longer. The doctor's laughter was a signal; it was echoed from all parts of the house. Fan cackled from the chamber window; Sam shouted from the barn; Mrs. Stoddard "ho-ho-ho'd" from the kitchen, while Charlie threw himself down in the doorway and screamed like a wild Indian. I turned around; I gave a leap across the garden. Every Stoddard called after me. I am wrong; every Stoddard but Janet; she remained silent. One told me to come back for the bread and cheese; another that I had forgotten my bundle and bride; another bade me wait for black Molly and the new buggy; Fan bade me hold up my coat tails, or I should get them dragged. I didn't heed any of these requests; I went directly for home. I reached home, feeling sheepish—no, sheepish is a weak word for it—I can't express to you how I felt. I had a great idea of hanging myself; I thought I had better be dead than alive; that I had made an idiot of myself. It was all plain; Fan had betrayed us. I vowed vengeance upon her until broad daylight, then sneaked out to the barn and hid in the hay-stack. I staid there until Charlie Stoddard brought home my father's horse.

The old gentleman was frightened; wanted to know how he came by the horse. He was told to ask me; he did ask me, and I made a clean breast of it. I didn't promise him not to repeat the offence; there was no need of it; but I am sure of this, I did not look at a girl for seven years—no, not for seven years. When the eighth year came round, I remembered my old vow against Fanny Stoddard. Well, to make a long story short, I married Fanny. Janet became a parson's wife.

And here let me tell you in confidence, reader, that I really think little Fanny Stoddard had a very deep motive in her head when she betrayed Janet and me, though she was but a child. She liked me, even then, I believe. Well, at any rate she declares every time that the affair is mentioned, that I have had my revenge upon her. Bless her faithful heart, it has been indeed a sweet one!

OUR GIRLS.

Our girls they are pretty,
And gentle and witty,
As any the world ever knew—
Talk not about Spanish,
Circassian or Danish,
Or Greeks'neath their summer skies blue;
But give me our lasses,
As fresh as the grass is
When sprinkled with roses and dew.

Each lip like a blossom,
Each fair swelling bosom
As white as the high drifted snow—
With eyes softly flashing,
Like spring-bubbles dashing,
O'er hill-rocks to valleys below;
All smiling with beauty,
All doing their duty,
Where shall we for lovelier go?

O, ours are the fairest,
The sweetest, the rarest,
The purest and fondest I see—
Their hearts are the truest,
Their eyes are the bluest
Their spirit so noble and free—
O, give me no other;
True-love, sister, mother,
Our own are the chosen for me

CHARLES SHIRLEY BROOKS, ESQ.

The subject of this memoir, Charles Shirley Brooks, was born in Doughty-street, Mecklenburgh-square, in the year 1815. His father is the architect who built the London Institution, Dudley Church, Church Missionary College, &c. On his mother's side he is connected with the Ferrar family, of which a certain noble member figured painfully in our criminal history. Mr. Brooks was educated by the Rev. J. T. Bennett, now sub-dean of St. Paul's; he was subsequently articled to his relative, Mr. Charles Sabine, a solicitor, residing at Oswestry, in Shropshire. During his residence with this gentleman, Mr. Brooks not only acquired sound legal knowledge, but became an excellent sportsman, with a keen relish for country life. But after three years very agreeably spent, he returned to London, and served the remainder of his articles with another relative, Mr. Shepherd Brooks. There he worked hard, as he was fully determined to master his profession. He was amongst the earliest batch of candidates for admission, who were examined at the Law Society's Hall, and one of the four who were considered the best men of the term.

Thus fairly started in the legal profession, Mr. Brooks undertook the management of his uncle's house, especially devoting his attention to the conveyancing department. But he was not the man to be tied down with red tape to legal precedents. His ambition sought another sphere from that of the law courts. For an enlarged mind, a warm heart, a cultivated taste, literature has peculiar attractions, and to a gentleman of Mr. Brooks' temperament, it offered an inviting prospect. There was that which was more congenial to him in literary pursuits, than in the steady, methodical profession for which he had been trained. So he began to write anonymously at first; and to receive encouragement from the appearance, in print, of his effusions.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

No one but an author can tell how the heart beats, and the pulse throbs; how visions of immortality rise up before the mind when a writer first looks on his composition in print. What will the world say to that article? what will the critics write about it in the reviews? will its sentiments meet with approval? will its wit be relished? will its beauties be detected? will the whole publishing trade rise up in wonder and amazement at the prophet who is amongst them, and cry "Write for us; wealth and popularity are yours?" A young author's impressions of his first article are to be compared only to parental love for the first born. Too often, both turn out disappointments. Many a man whose hopes are unfulfilled at his first essay in literature, shrinks abashed and complains of the indifference of the world; when he ought rather to complain of his own want of energy. In all ordinary cases, success is the result of a long-continued effort—an effort carried on with determination and perseverance under all circumstances. This was the case with Mr. Brooks. When he resolved upon adopting literature as a profession, he took it for better and worse. He brought his business element to bear upon his new occupation, and supplied copy with the regularity and energy with which he had formerly conducted his clients' business. He has had a long struggle; but without being elated with apparent success, or cast down by difficulty, he has at length succeeded in achieving a well-earned reputation. He has contributed to nearly all the leading publications of the day; he has earned celebrity as a journalist; he is favourably known as a dramatist; and has had great success as a novelist.

While the Keeleys had the management of the Lyceum, Mr. Brooks produced some very successful pieces. He wrote, also, for the Haymarket and Olympic. We believe his first dramatic production was called the "Lowther Arcade;" after that, followed "Our Governess," "Honour and Tricks," the "Wigwam," and "Anything for a Change." The "Creole," a melodrama, very favourably received, first attracted attention to the admirable acting of Mr. Emery.

Mr. Brooks was for a long time associated with a morning journal. He owed his introduction to the editor to the friendship of the late Mr. Reach, and was engaged to supply literary criticisms for that journal. He subsequently undertook the important office of summary writer to the paper for the House of Commons. During his connection with our contemporary, he was intrusted with a mission to the south of Russia, Asia Minor, and Egypt. His letters attracted favourable notice, and those referring especially to Russia were afterwards republished in the "Traveller's Library." The anonymous plan adopted by writers in public prints necessarily prevents the formation of an accurate estimate of the labour of a journalist. We are interested, instructed, amused, by correspondents' letters, and leaders, and summaries, but who knows anything of the writers? Thus, the popularity of a journalist must be circumscribed, and he never obtains credit for half the wise and witty things he writes. This is the case with Mr. Brooks. His complete works would be a most miscellaneous collection, and the reader would be startled not only by their literary merit but by their number and variety.

Many of our author's sketches of life and manners are extremely humorous, and have formed some of the most popular and valuable contributions to contemporary periodicals of high literary reputation. Mr. Brooks has, indeed, a genius so prolific and versatile, that it is difficult to say in which style of writing he has earned for himself the most enduring reputation—his pathos is so touching, and his wit so sparkling, and his humor so irresistible. His merit has raised him to an eminent position in his profession. He has managed at the same time to win and retain the friendship of his brother littérateurs. He is a great favourite with all who know him, either personally or only through his books; and we may safely adopt the language of the late Douglas Jerrold respecting him, "His name will shine brightly and permanently in our national annals." He has recently undertaken the editorship of the Literary Gazette, and has, by his talents and energy, greatly advanced the reputation of that periodical.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

It is sometimes difficult to divide truth from fiction; for the theories of one age become the fictions of another, and the fictions of one age become the theories of another. Our ancestors believed in many a marvel which has turned out to be mere idle superstition. They believed in witches and all the goblins of the weird world; they imagined they could read their destiny in the stars; that they could prolong their lives to an indefinite extent by the use of an elixir vite; that they could transfer all baser metals into gold by certain chemical combinations; that they could discover treasure with a divining rod, or turn away evil by magical inscriptions, be healed of the plague with an Abracadabra, or cured of their warts with a basin of moonbeams! But they were not always and universally credulous. They would not believe Columbus that the earth was a sphere, because they thought such a theory was irrational and irreligious; they would not believe Galileo that the earth moved round the sun; much less would they have credited railway locomotion and steam navigation,—it was left to Mother Shipton to nourish such dreams as these; they would not believe that portraits should be taken by the simple action of the light—the most imaginative never thought of that; and as to putting a girdle round the earth, and conversing by the lightning's aid from one end of the earth to the other, so insane a notion could only have originated in the brain of a maniac—or a poet. But so it is, that progressing from one discovery to another, the dogmas of our ancestors turn out mere fiction, and that which they accounted fiction becomes solid fact. Perhaps many of our theories may turn out to be fictions also, and learned societies yet to be instituted may chuckle, if these grave bodies ever chuckle, over the credulity of the nineteenth century.

Different ages are distinguished by some prominent feature. There was the age of enterprise, when Columbus added a New World to the Old; there was the age of scientific discovery, when Newton revealed the governing principles of matter; our age is that of scientific investigation. We have covered the land with an iron net-work of broad and narrow gauge; we have launched armadas for ocean navigation, we have fabricated artificial lightning, extending its influence by means of wires to all parts of civilised Europe—and lastly, we have carried it through the Atlantic Ocean, and, by a cable no stouter than a boat rope, have bound the Old World to the New.

The earliest attempt to transmit an electric current under water for telegraphic purposes, is attributed to Dr. O'Shaughnessy. This gentleman started a conducting wire across the Hooghly, and transmitted messages through the water from one bank to the other. The first important submarine effort in Europe, was that which connected the coasts of England and France. Subsequently submarine telegraphs were formed between Holyhead and Howth, Dover and Ostend, Orford Ness and the Hague, across the Great Belt, Denmark, across the Mississippi, the Zuyder Zee, Newfoundland and Prince Edward's Island, Spezzia and Corsica, Corsica and Sardinia. The cable which connects the coasts of England and Belgium, measures seventy miles in one unbroken length, and was regarded as the highest triumph of human ingenuity. But the greatest triumph yet achieved is that of the Atlantic Telegraph, since the difficulties which had to be surmounted, as well as the distance which had to be traversed, were incomparably greater than in any submarine telegraph yet attempted.

When the project was first broached it was received with incredulity by all, but the most sanguine. The popular cry of "It can't be done" was instantly raised. The distance was too great; the difficulties too many; the cable would not sink below a certain depth; it would be impossible to preserve the continuity of the electrical action; last of all, but by no means the least objection, was that it would not pay.

But, notwithstanding all that could be urged against it, the practicability of the scheme was evident to all practical men. Nearly five years since, a series of regular soundings was made for the purpose of ascertaining the exact condition of the bed of the Atlantic, extending from Ireland to Newfoundland, these being the nearest points to which the cable could be attached. From these soundings, it appeared that the bottom of the ocean consisted of a plateau which seemed placed there especially for the purpose of holding the wires of a submarine telegraph, and of keeping them out of harm's way. It was found to be neither too deep nor too shallow; yet so deep that the wires, once landed, would remain for ever beyond the reach of vessels, anchors, icebergs, and drifts of any kind; and so shallow that the wires might be readily looped at the bottom. The depth of the plateau is quite regular, gradually increasing from the shores of Newfoundland to the depth of 1,500 or 2,000 fathoms, as it approaches the middle of the ocean. Still more recent investigations have fully borne out the accuracy of these statements; and some idea may be formed of the actual condition of the Atlantic bed by referring to the accompanying engravings.

The first of the two illustrations presents a view of the grand oceanic plateau or table-land along which the telegraph wires have been laid; the second is a sectional view of the bed of the Atlantic, north and south, showing the relation of the elevated ridge to the remainder of the ocean bed.

The soundings across the Atlantic between England and America, verified both by a British expedition and by the government of the United States, demonstrate satisfactorily two most important facts bearing upon the possibility of successfully laying the oceanic wire. These are, first the existence of the elevated level, of which we give a representation, and which at once took the name of "Telegraphic Plateau;" and, second, the remarkable fact that in the ocean depths there is an absolute absence of current or motion of any kind—so that the wire, however small, being once laid, there is no danger of its destruction by abrasion or chafe against the bottom surface, as in the depths of the Atlantic the water is as still as that of a mill-pond. From the series of soundings obtained by Lieutenant Berryman, stretching from the coast of Newfoundland to Valentia Bay, in Ireland, it appears that the depth of water on the plateau nowhere exceeds two miles; and that there is, from a point a little to the eastward of the middle, a gradual slope toward each terminus, with but few irregularities. Along this ridge, so providentially arranged to facilitate the greatest achievement of modern science and energy, there appears to be no rocks or jagged points to endanger the safety of a cable; nothing, in fact, but a deposit of soft mud, which, under the microscope, proves to be composed of myriads upon myriads of minute shells, each separate and entire—thus proving that there is not in those depths even sufficient current or motion to destroy, by abrasion, these fragile structures. The telegraph, once successfully laid, would remain as completely beyond the reach of accident as if it were buried in air-tight cases.

The failures which attended the first attempts to lay the telegraph, although they were calculated to dishearten those who anticipated immediate success, only served to strengthen the determination of those who, having begun this great work, were resolved to accomplish that which they had undertaken. On the morning of the 17th of July, the Valorous, Gorgon, and Niagara—that splendid American vessel—steamed away from Queenstown for the rendezvous. The Agamemnon did not weigh anchor till two o'clock the following morning. The rendezvous was reached on Thursday, the 29th of July; when, the splice of the cable having been effected, the ships parted company, and the great business of the expedition finally began. Experience had taught the engineer many valuable lessons, and the cable was paid out with complete success. On Thursday, the 4th of August, the Agamemnon arrived at Valentia, and the end of the cable was safely brought on shore by Mr. Bright and Mr. Canning, the first and second engineers, to whose indefatigable exertions the success of the undertaking is mainly attributable. Soon after the arrival at Valentia a signal was received from the engineer on board the Niagara that they also were preparing to land, having paid out 1,030 miles of cable, while the Agamemnon had accomplished her portion of the distance with an expenditure of 1,020 miles; making the total length of wire submerged 2,050 miles.

Messages of congratulation were speedily exchanged. Under the blue waves of the Atlantic, deep in the ocean's bed, flew, like a flash of lightning, the words of peace and goodwill. England's Queen and America's President, brought closely together by that magnetic coil, interchanged words of honest thankfulness for the work which the two nations had so bravely accomplished. England, after her own quiet and thoughtful fashion, rejoiced that the two countries were thus united, and saw in that coil of electric wire a guarantee for the future against all misunderstanding. America made high holiday, lighted up her streets with one great blaze of illumination, discharged her parks of artillery, and turned night into day by the brilliancy of her pyrotechnics. She talked magniloquently of the telegraph—claiming a larger share of the honour than was fairly her due—and exhausted metaphor and allegory in setting forth the glorious victory achieved over time and space.

Unfortunately, in the very midst of the rejoicing, the electric coil ceases to act. There are signals that the electric action is not altogether broken, but for all purposes of intelligence it fails. It is confidently believed that this is only a temporary failure, that no serious, no irreparable injury, has been sustained by the cable. The difficulty is to ascertain what that injury really is, and in what part of the cable it has taken place. Various opinions have been hazarded, and many experiments made, as yet without success; but of the ultimate triumph of the telegraph, no reasonable doubt can be entertained. Having accomplished so much, the completion of the work is certain. Under oceans as well as over continents, the electric fluid bears with lightning speed our messages from one extremity of the earth to the other.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,

SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER CV.

For I would rather stop the unchained dove
When swift returning to his home of love,
And round his snowy wings new fetters twine,
Than turn from virtue one pure thought of thine.

MOORE.

It was delightful to Hope to watch Larky Grigg's keen enjoyment of the refreshments she had brought him, and it was very sweet to Larky Grigg to be ministered to by Hope.

But Larky Grigg would not prolong what seemed to him the most delicious meal he had ever made; he was very tender, unselfish, considerate, as all true lovers are, or should be; and even if Hope, in her innocence, her inexperience, and her passionate devotion to her beloved one, would have run some risk for his dear sake, he, more careful of her than she of herself, would not allow her to do so.

After helping Hope to pack up the basket, and replace what little his appetite had left of the food and wine she had brought, with the knife and fork, glass and plate, which she, thoughtful little housekeeper that she was, had not forgotten—remembering even the bread and salt, so often forgotten on pic-nics by much older heads than hers, and rejoicing, sweet child, as she jingled the bright keys that hung by a chain from her little waist, in her power and privilege as temporary housekeeper.

"And now, Hope," said Larky, "now that, thanks to you, I am strengthened to unfold, what I fear will greatly agitate us both, sit by my side, as in the dear old ragged school days, let me hold that little helping hand, and if what I have to say should make you tremble, and feel that you want protection, refuge, help, come to my bosom, for it is not of those who love as we do, and have done from the cradle, my Hope, that the poet says—

"They never knew in times of fear
The safety of affection,
Nor sought, when angry fate drew near,
Love's altar for protection."

Hope's large, loving eyes, so darkly blue, and yet so full of light, and which were raised to meet his earnest gaze, filled with tears of gratitude and pride, and a roseate flush of intense emotion stole over her sweet face and white bosom. It was to hear Larky Grigg talking as Doun or Greville might have done (only a thousand times better), of what one of the most refined and elegant of our poets has said, and quoting the sweet lines in confirmation of his opinion.

Larky Grigg, love taught, self-taught Larky Grigg already talking like a gentleman, a scholar, a poet; and as she remarked how very thin was that once strong hand, how sharp his features, how hollow his eyes, and how cultivated was the expression of that dear face, she knew how hard, very hard, how dangerously hard he must have worked; and at the thought that it was all for her that he had robbed night of its rest, day of its healthful exercise and recreation, and his cheek of its bloom and roundness, she felt unworthy and humbled, and said with Prince Arthur, "I am not worth this coil that's made for me."

Of course, Larky knew how to silence such words as these, and Hope how to scold him into good behaviour.

"You forget," she said, at length, "that all this time I am in suspense. You say you have news to tell that may make me feel the want of help, shelter, protection; what is it?"

"Listen then, Hope," said Larky. "One evening that our mother was sitting at work, alone in the house (but for the babe asleep in its cradle), a gentleman, fashionably dressed and middle-aged, came into the shop, and on her coming from the parlour to wait on him, asked if she was Mrs. Blossom, commonly called 'Apple Blossom.' On her answering in the affirmative, he begged to speak to her in private and alone.

"She led him into the back parlour, when, throwing off his cloak and removing his hat, he sat down, desired her to do the same, and said—'If I mistake not, Mrs. Blossom, seventeen years ago, you, not so well-to-do in the world as you now are, were confined in Queen Charlotte's Lying-in Hospital. Your child was born dead.'

"It was so, indeed, sir," said our dear, simple mother, as she says herself, all of a 'tremble,' and wondering how so grand a gentleman could know or care about her humble history.

"It was dusk when this strange visitor arrived; and my mother says, as he sat by the fire, his sharp, pale features bright in the blaze—his dark eyes flashing through his spectacles—his white teeth glittering from ear to ear as he smiled a strange smile in her face—she felt a chill as if he were not exactly flesh and blood like herself.

"However, she felt awed, and, as it were, fascinated, by his presence; and never thought of refusing to answer any question he put to her.

"This being the case, he elicited every particular connected with her intimacy with your mother, Hope,—all she said and did (things already known to you, dearest), how she spoke of gay gentlemen, and her dread that her unborn child should ever be thrown in the way of any such; how she hoped that her girl would be brought up by her humble friend, Apple Blossom, and in time be loved and wooed by that friend's son; how she left a box, containing all her papers, and a sort of will, with many little trinkets, mementoes, rings, a watch, and other articles, to Jem Goodman, in trust for her child, who was to have them when she came of age, or before if she married.

"All this," said Larky, "the gentleman learnt from my mother, together with your history, dearest, in all its details; your ragged school days, your adoption (when a child) by Lady Arncliffe and her mother, your education as a lady, your beauty, your talents, your virtues; he even drew from her the confession that you honoured me with your love, and that we had plighted our troth. Our mother said, at this news he scowled, set his large, white, even teeth, clenched his hands, and stamped his feet. He then obtained the address of Jem Goodman, and your lord and lady, and, suddenly rising, he said—

"This boy and girl fancy, this calf love, must be put a stop to now, Mrs. Blossom, and so you had better tell your son. Hope is no longer a friendless orphan. The lady you knew in Queen Charlotte's Lying-in Hospital was my wife—Hope Evermore is my daughter. I shall reward all those who have befriended or protected her during my inevitable absence; but, as soon as I return from a visit I must pay to the Continent, I shall go myself to Burnside, provided with papers to prove my identity, and I shall, there and then, claim the sole guardianship of my daughter, Hope. You will see, Mrs. Blossom," he added, haughtily, 'how absurd, under Miss Evermore's present and altered circumstances, are the pretensions of any man who is not a gentleman of birth and fortune; those of your son (a working man, I presume) are simply too ridiculous to be ever alluded to again. I shall reward you, when I return to town, for your kindness to the late Mrs. Evermore, and to Miss Evermore; but she will, of course, be herself eager to break off any childish and degrading engagement into which she has been led; indeed, I have a husband in view for her, a gentleman desirable in every point; and, perhaps, the wisest thing I can do will be to get her married off hand. Your son and my daughter will, of course, meet no more.'

"But, what is this? what ails you, Hope, my affianced wife?" he cried, as Hope, who had listened throughout to each terrible detail of this dread visit, her sick, cramped heart denying attenance to her tongue, parched with horror, suddenly cried—

"Stop, dearest, best, kindest, noblest—stop, Larky Grigg! you will break my heart, I cannot bear it! Oh, Father of Mercies, support thy wretched child!" and, stretching out her arms wildly, unconsciously to heaven, she sank on her knees to pray, when her voice failed, consciousness forsook her, and had not Larky caught her to his breast, she would have fallen to the ground in that death-like swoon.

Luckily Larky possessed presence of mind in an eminent degree: he had read and thought much, and he was well aware, both from observation and theory, what ought to be done in such cases. He laid her gently on the heather, her feet level with her head, he loosened her blue sash, and unclasped her dress, he poured a few drops of wine from the basket (close at hand) down her throat, he chafed her hands and temples; and, at length, her beautiful eyes slowly unclosed, a cold shudder ran through her delicate frame, she gazed wildly round as Larky raised her in his arms, and as with returning life came the consciousness of all that he had revealed, a passionate burst of tears gushed to her relief, and she sobbed out, "Oh, Larky Grigg—you who have wooed and cherished me from my cradle—you, to whom I owe all that is good in me—you to whom I am plighted, solemnly plighted, and without whom there would be no comfort in the past, no joy in the present, no hope in the future—you can, you must, you shall be more to me than the father who forsook my poor mother, and left her to die in a hospital, and trusted me to the cold charity of a world which, but for you and yours, would have let me perish of want."

"Alas! dearest, a father's rights are paramount over a daughter not of age. He is your father; and you must strive to love and to obey him," said Larky.

"And break my vow to heaven and you, Larky, and give my hand to a husband of my father's choice, while my heart is, as it ever has been, and ever will be, yours alone. Oh, Larky, can you urge this?"

"No, Hope; could I even have thought it I should not be here. In all things else you must obey your father," he said, while tears, the hot tears of manhood's anguish, choked his voice and gushed from his eyes; "but you must not commit perjury and lie before God and man, as you would do, if, loving your poor Larky Grigg with all the constancy and fervour of your virgin heart, you swore at God's altar to love, honour, and obey another. Oh, that you were already mine, dear Hope! mine by the indissoluble tie—mine till death us do part. Hope," he added, gasping with emotion, "O Hope! the tempter is here; he is suggesting what bewilders, captivates, intoxicates me; but what, though passion advocate it, reason tells me is wrong: we might fly together, and get married at once at Gretna; there where no questions are asked, no unions objected to. O Hope! it is wrong in me to glance at the brief elysium that might end in so much misery. Your friends would shun, disown, perhaps persecute you; and, alas! perhaps the curse of disobedience would light upon you, and blight you, even in my arms. But yet, to call you mine—my wife, my own! O Hope! at this terrible moment you are stronger, calmer than I am. Woman's sweet affection is wiser than man's wild passion. Say, Hope; what shall we do? This may be our last meeting on earth if we part here."

"If you think so, Larky, I am yours; bid me arise and follow you, friend, lover, husband, and I obey. If I am to choose between never seeing thee more and following thee to the altar now, my choice is made; I will risk all, brave all, to be thy wife. But you have often said, Larky, that nothing is so strong as the human will. If so, and we both resolve to be true to each other, to trust in God, and to live in hope of being united, it is my belief that, on some fair future day, friends and fate will smile on such constancy, and you will wed me, not in secrecy, shame, terror, misery, and defiance of a parent's will and all the delicate proprieties that should be laws to woman, but in the face of an approving world. We may have much to bear, much to suffer, Larky, and long to wait; but such a marriage would be worth waiting for. You weep; O Larky—cruel Larky! you withdraw your hand—you turn away! Now listen: such is my love for you—such my trust, my confidence in the choice of my heart, the lover of my youth, that while I swear, if you go, I will be true to you till death, yet, if you cannot bear it, rather than break that noble heart, I give up all to you; and, if you say I must be your wife at once, I will arise and follow you to the altar."

"Say your happiness—your peace—require our union, and your will shall be my law; but think well, ponder it well, dear Larky; let not passion alone answer. Let judgment, and honour, and virtue be heard, too."

Larky Grigg was sorely tempted; she had resigned her will to his, a few hours more, and in all her beauty, innocence, and truth, she might be his for ever. All the man beat at his heart, at the thought; but in the breast of every truly good man there is an angel stronger than that man.

"Poor child," he thought, "shall I take advantage of her love, her faith, her clinging confidence to make her take a step lowering to her fame, her dignity, and delicacy as a woman, and which may entail, as a daughter, the curse of disobedience on her young life; shall I rob her, by one moment's evil counsel, and selfish influence, of all the friends her virtues have made her; entail poverty, perhaps beggary, on a creature so delicate? No." He unclasped her hands from his neck, seated her gently on the heather, and walked a few steps away from her into the shadow of a rugged, gnome-like old thorn tree, that stretched out its bare arms to the blast.

There Larky Grigg knelt in silent, fervent prayer; there the words "lead us not into temptation" burst not only from his lips but his heart; there he prayed for guidance, and there light stole into his mind, and the dove of peace, with healing on his wings, seemed to descend into that young, impassioned, and distracted breast.

After a few minutes he returned to Hope, calm, collected, gentle, and even cheerful.

"I have sought for counsel from on high, my love," he said, "and I leave you. It were cruel, selfish, sinful, in me to accept the sacrifice which your love for me would induce you to make. Passion says 'Yes,' but Principle 'No.' I go then, beloved, but not disheartened, not despairing. I feel we shall be true to each other—that, whether we meet or not, Hope will know that her Larky is making himself more worthy of her. I go! But I go strong in faith that my efforts to rise will be so blest that the time will come when I can claim you proudly in the face of day; and when even your father will not blush for his daughter's choice. Bless you for the proof of deep love and holy confidence you have given me, in leaving your destiny in my hands. What the struggle in my heart has been you will never know, but the result proves I am not quite unworthy of you."

"Oh, Larky!" sobbed Hope,—"oh, Larky! pray that we may meet, never to part again!"

"I will, my love, my bride! Adieu, dear Hope, adieu!" said Larky Grigg, as he tore himself from her embrace, and, darting across the heath, was gone from her sight.

Weeping bitterly, Hope crept back, to throw herself on her bed; and had cried herself to sleep, when Nussy, pale and horror-stricken, came rushing in with a light in her hand, exclaiming—

"Hope, come to my lady this moment! An express has arrived, announcing the death of her son, Lord Eaglescliffe, in battle in India. She has swooned away, but before she did so she said, 'Call Hope.'"

Hope sprang from her bed, and rushed to the drawing-room.

CHAPTER CVI.

And she so wildly weeping there,
A mother in her long despair.—CAMPBELL.

HOPE found Lady Glenlonely recovered from her swoon, and moaning piteously. Her hands were clasped, her eyes fixed and tearless; there was a rigidity terrible to behold in the muscles of her face and figure.

Captain Greville had ordered his horse, and was off to the nearest town for advice. The Marquis of Doun was helping Lord Glenlonely to administer remedies, postponing the indulgence of his grief as a father until his anxiety as a husband was relieved.

Lady Arnccliffe had been for some weeks abroad with Lord Arnccliffe and their boy, and no one knew exactly where to address her; while all felt that she ought, as soon as possible, to be made acquainted with her loss.

Lady Arnccliffe was not a votary of pleasure, and her husband's health, not the love of change, took her abroad at this time; but she was fond of elegant society, and intellectual amusements; and all felt how sad it would be to her to think she had been enjoying herself, while her still dear and once fondly loved brother had been slain, perhaps tortured, by a cruel and remorseless foe.

The Marquis of Doun appeared to great advantage in his new character of a nurse and a comforter. He was so gentle, so patient, and so very glad in his own inmost heart, to be thus intimately associated with Hope in ministering to the bereaved mother.

"My poor, dear lady," said Hope, gliding to the poor mourner's side, and pillowing the once proud head on her young loving bosom—"Speak to me, dear lady: it is Hope, Hope Evermore."

The poor lady, who had been moaning, and rocking herself to and fro, turned round at the sound of that soft voice. She stretched out her arms and cried—

"Oh, Hope, Hope, he is dead! I have lost my boy, my brave, my beautiful—" And a gush of tears came to the relief of her overcharged heart.

Probably those tears saved her from madness. She wept long and uncontrollably on Hope's bosom: she seemed unconscious of the presence of any other person, while she sobbed forth, "Oh, Hope, the blow I have so long dreaded is come at last. I sowed the wind, and I have reaped the whirlwind. My Walter, my Eaglescliffe, my own—my only boy! and I, it was I, who, in my short-sighted vanity and ambition, drove the darling and pride of my heart to die among those savages. Why could I not let him marry the innocent, beautiful, and loving girl he deoted on? Oh, Hope, Hope, had he married her, he would now be alive and happy in England, and his children would be playing around me."

Hope knew not what to say. She could only weep, and Lord Doun, as he watched her, as the pitying drops chased each other down her fair cheeks, thought her sorrow was lovelier than her joy. Suddenly a new image of horror presented itself to Lady Glenlonely's mind. "Hope, Hope!" she shrieked, starting wildly up; "they not only killed, they tortured him, they always do. I see it all, I see their dark and demoniacal faces, their crafty, cruel eyes; I cannot bear these visions that crowd upon me. My brain is on fire, I shall go mad," and she began, in spite of Lord Doun's gentle force, to pace the drawing-room rapidly and wildly to and fro, like a caged tigress,—now beating her breast; now tearing her hair; now calling piteously on Hope, and mistaking her for some one, long since dust, who had loved her lost darling—her Walter—her Eaglescliffe.

Poor Lord Glenlonely, who had borne up for some time, was quite overcome by the vivid pictures she drew of her son's probable fate. It had not occurred to him that the agonies of death might have been preceded by the long horrors of slow and ingenious torture. He stole away to his own room to weep and pray, and those who glory in war, and think it is a fine thing to be a warrior, or the father of a hero, should gaze with the mind's eye on the poor mother in her frenzied anguish and her long despair; the father, his gray head bowed in submission, but his hot tears gushing, and his manly frame convulsed, and then remember that there never yet was war, however glorious, without the result being widows doomed to the slow torture of a breaking heart, parents who can never really smile again; orphans thrown naked on a cold and thorny world; and while every church bell is ringing, and every window is illuminated, those who look behind the painted drop-scene will behold despair in some homes, destitution in others, tears, regret, remorse, in all, and be able to estimate more justly than before, the price of a victory.

Hope, as she ministered to her afflicted lady, thought with thankfulness of her escape from the late bewildering and intoxicating temptation she had felt to leave all and follow her beloved Larky Grigg to Gretna, not so very, very far from Burnside, there to bind herself to him till death them should part; and she blessed Larky for the generous and devoted forbearance that forbade his taking advantage of her yielding up her will to his.

"How cruel, how thankless, how base it would have seemed," she thought, "to have forsaken my poor lady in this sore and sudden trouble, and just when no one can comfort or minister to her as I can!" Oh! weak and selfish Hope! how enchanted to thee did the prospect seem of giving up all for that loved and loving one, and, nothing with thee but a basket he could carry, and a plaid thrown over thy head and form, to set out, then and there, and roam with him across the fragrant heather, and beneath the silent stars and the silver moon; his dear voice in her delighted ear and listening heart; her up-turned eyes meeting the half-veiled radiance of his love-lighted, soul-irradiated gaze.

It was a beguiling, an enchanting picture, but Hope thanked Heaven and Larky Grigg that it had not been realised, that she was not an unconscious deserter, in their anguish and bereavement, of those who had fostered, reared, and cherished her.

CHAPTER CVII.

Gleaming like moonlight o'er a lonely isle,
Lighting its ruins, and which seemed to say,
That 'neath that smile the heart's cold ruins lay.
ANON.

WE must now shift the scene to Oxford, where Ellen St. Ange had been spending a few days at the "Angel" with a dear friend, Lady Mildmay, who was travelling through the midland counties, wisely thinking that a tour in England was more interesting than one where, if nature has done more, art and humanity have done less.

Lady Mildmay had with her a sweet girl, called Perdita, whom Ellen and Mrs. Golightly had endeavoured to interest in the all-important works of their own virtuous, energetic lives—ragged schools and the temperance movement.

Ellen St. Ange is but little changed since we saw her last: pale, calm, lovely as ever.

Mrs. Golightly was far more grim, glaring, and eccentric than ever, and had of late adopted for travelling costume a sort of compromise between male and female attire, but in which she was always mistaken for a man.

But the saddest change that had taken place in poor Mrs. Golightly was a decided monomania, connected with her dread and horror of the male sex. She began to fancy every man a Lovelace, and that he had a design on her.

On this point she was quite mad, and as her great success as an authoress had made her very wealthy, perhaps she might have some charms for the fortune-hunters. At any rate, she, who in youth had been free from vanity, was now mad about her own charms, and their maddening effect on man.

"Have you a time-table, waiter?" said Ellen.

"Yes, mem! get one instantly, mem!"

"Then you are determined to go," said Lady Mildmay, "the last evening of my stay in Oxford."

"I have no choice! I must be in town to-morrow; and by the evening of the day after, I am expected in Edinburgh."

"Then I shall go too; I must be at Alnwick this week, and for the pleasure of travelling with you, can easily arrange to start when you do."

"Here's a Bradshaw, mem," said the waiter, a smiling, obliging, hoping, expecting attendant, not a miserable, sullen, frostbitten specimen of the "no gratuities to servants" system.

"I see, dear Lady Mildmay, my best plan will be to start by the 9.15 A.M. Will that be too early for you?"

"Oh, no; and in the meantime, as Perdita is gone to chapel with Miss Golightly, we will order tea. Draw up to the fire—pleasant though the trees are in full leaf—and I will tell you, as I promised, the romantic adventure which befel me as a traveller in one of the first trains, on one of the first railroads completed, fifteen years ago."

"I am all attention," said Ellen.

Lady Mildmay began—"It was a few months after I had changed the name, the heart, and the life of a happy, loved, and loving wife, for that of a sad, isolated, and almost desolate widow. 'Weeds,' in every sense, supplied the place of flowers; and black of couleur de rose, actually and figuratively. I was living in the past; the present was a blank, the future a dreary terror to me. I was the only child of an only child, and, strange to say, I had lost my only child during the fourth year of my marriage; but that grief, sharp, terrible, startling, as it was, had been so borne with, so soothed, so softened by the exquisite tenderness of the best of husbands, that I rallied in a manner astonishing even to myself. The hoards of love, of devotion, of intense pity, and angel tenderness, my grief unlocked in the heart of my husband, literally took me by surprise. I knew he loved me well, I knew it when happiness was the bond between us. How he loved me I never knew till my swollen eyes, blurred and blistered cheeks, wasted form, fretful manner, and sullen wayward temper, all common and immediate results of the anguish of bereavement in an unchanged heart, made me say to my wretched self, 'no one, even Henry, can love me now!' Well, that first grief, as I have said, was so shared, so lightened, so hallowed, so gilded by the wealth of tenderness it called forth, that a sense of shame, of wrong, of ingratitude, roused the better spirit within me. I strove, and I conquered. Two years later—during a tour undertaken in deep and anxious love and care for me—in a foreign land, and by a sudden stroke, the consoler, the husband, the lover of my youth, the idol of my heart, the guide of my life, was taken from me. None to save, none to comfort, none to weep with or for me. My gentle, generous, noble Henry, when my child died, he would not let them bear away my little marble cherub, till even to my spell-bound fancy decay was apparent; I, even I, was obliged to own the hour was indeed come! Then from that little cot where I had watched him through a long, a gradual, but not a painful illness, and was allowed, nay encouraged to watch him still while that watch could have aught of comfort for me, my Henry himself placed him in his little coffin! and while they inclosed that 'soft silken primrose faded timelessly' within that last retreat, so daintily adorned with fluted silk and lace, and so filled with flowers; he pillowed my throbbing brow on his manly breast, and when I awoke from a swoon, in mercy sent, he was bending weeping over me.

"Now harsh foreign, un pitying voices—the voices of men hating our race and our faith—burst on my ears. No prayers, no tears, no agony of mind availed! Twenty-four hours after the sudden blow, having profaned his dear remains, to satisfy their vile curiosity under the name of 'science,' they hurried him into one of the shallow graves of a wretched wilderness called the Protestant burial-ground; and I had not one to appeal to, not one to befriend or protect me. Later, I found means to be heard, and the dear one was removed and conveyed to the family vault in Berkshire. But all that, so difficult, so torturing to effect, I did alone. Oh, I was indeed alone. Oh, of those two dreadful trials, how great the contrast, as Calder Campbell so sweetly sings.

'By ones, by twos, by threes,
Sorrow steal on us: trials to be borne,
Not in mad ecstasies,
Not in hard apathy, not in proud scorn,
But with our human tears in human eyes,
And breaking hearts and all but hopeless sighs.'

"Yes, I found out the difference now between 'the wife' and 'the widow.' Now, who cares how long I fasted—how wildly I wept? Who tried gently to divert a torturing thought, to remove an object that might rekindle a wild regret, a morbid remorse, or change the outward scene again and again, till the mind was forced by the ever-shifting panorama without, to tear itself from the death-bed and the tomb ever present within? Well, I did not die. I was young and strong, and very, very wretched."

"And death is slow in answering to the call of youth and sorrow."

"But I had nothing to lose, nothing to care for. I grew into a machine, and my life was mechanical. A physician who attended me ordered me to Scarborough, because there was another Dr. Smith there, into whose hands he played. Dr. B— sent Londoners to Scarborough; Dr. C— sent Scarboroughites to London, and Dr. B— well, in a state of apathy (almost always the result of intense grief). I was very ill, for the body soon becomes rebellious when sorrow begins in the mind, but still able to get about, and too restless not to do so, I was returning from Scarborough, thinking any place would be better than that where I had already shed so many tears, and passed so many sleepless nights. I was travelling by the Great Northern Railway to London. Part of that line was just opened, and reported dangerous; and I knew no fear, life seemed so valueless, and death so much to be desired to all, that nothing interested me. I saw all that passed, and strange to say I can distinctly read everything (little as, even to myself, I seemed to notice at the time). I beheld there a very beautiful, fashionable, but rather flushed, bewildered, and agitated lady, attended by a gentleman also of a most remarkable exterior, tall, handsome, distingué, but somewhat smarter-looking, to my thinking; they came in at B— station from a post-chaise and four, and, to my surprise, I saw they had with them no attendant, although they had a beautiful little girl about three years of age. My own maid, who affected to consider me too ill to travel without herself by my side (but in reality because she preferred the first to the second class), immediately attracted the attention of the little one; for, to brighten up the mourning which she was compelled to wear in my service, and aware that I was too much absorbed by grief to interfere in such matters, she had trimmed her bonnet, inside and out, with an abundance of glittering black bugle flowers, and these, dancing and sparkling in the sun, caught the attention of the beautiful little fairy, who, in her turn, forcibly reminded me of my own and my lost Henry's exquisite cherub, before disease had laid its withering hand on the blooming beauties of his face and form. The colour of the clustering golden ringlets, the slope of the azure eyes, the shade of the long brown lashes, the tint of the cheek, and the coral of the lips, were so strangely like my little Henry's, that I could almost forget the hideous havoc death had made, and gazing on that laughing cherub, who had torn off hat and tippet in its rosy sport, fancy myself once more a blessed wife and mother, and forget I was a desolate and childless widow.

"So all by degrees the little one, perhaps seeing the love and yearning of my heart in my eyes, made some little, shy, playful advances towards me; and for the first time since my husband's death I felt a human interest in a human creature.

"What the relation of the lady and gentleman was I knew not. At first I had concluded they were man and wife; but a something in their manner and snatches of talk made me doubt it; and my maid, Gossippe, the same I have here with me now, told me afterwards, delighted at being able to interest me in any outward object, that she had remarked a coronet on the lady's handkerchief, and none on the gentleman's, and that his initials were 'G. De C.', while hers were 'P. D.' The poor lady seemed hot, anxious, flushed, tearful, and excited; now leaning her head out of the window to catch the sunny breeze; now throwing herself back in the carriage, tying on her bonnet, and letting down her thick veil; now pale and panting, now crimson and still, and with compressed lips, and clasped hands, and burying her face in her handkerchief, and stifling an hysterical emotion, evidently very irritating to the handsome, self-possessed, or rather sarcastic gentleman, who whispered words which seemed only to increase the emotion they, perhaps, were meant to assuage.

"He tried to amuse, or rather occupy himself a little with the beautiful child, but she seemed shy and coy with him, and even a little petulant: 'Mamma's own daughter,' he said (half in jest, half in earnest). The beautiful mother snatched the child from him, clasped it passionately to her heart, and rocked and strained and fondled it there, till it fell asleep on her bosom.

"In spite of my own hitherto absorbing sorrow, a sort of curiosity about these strangers, and a deep interest in the child, awoke in my bosom.

"At K—, we all got out to procure some refreshments. I lost sight of the whole party, for I repaired at once to the ladies' waiting-room, where Gossippe brought me some coffee. But she told me the gentleman had just left by a branch train, and the poor lady was crying bitterly. As Gossippe spoke, the lady came in with the child in her arms. I asked her to take some coffee; she accepted my offer with a mournful grace that won my heart. She laid her child on a sofa, and drew her chair to my table: she spoke a little, and her voice was sweet and cultivated; her manners more than graceful—they were noble and dignified; on the third finger of her left hand, as she ungloved it to take her tea, I saw a wedding ring, and as her eye detected the glance of mine, the deepest crimson suffused her face and throat, and tears gushed from her eyes.

"She may, though not yet in weeds, have been made, like myself, a widow, I thought; and I could not but take her beautiful hand, and say, 'God bless you, God help you, poor lady!' 'Oh, no, no,' she cried, rending it from me, and her sobs redoubling. I began to doubt her sanity, and was not sorry to hear the warning railway bell.

"She took off her bonnet, washed away her tears, smoothed the longest, most lustrous, and abundant tresses of golden auburn I had ever seen, settled her bonnet strings, collar, and shawl, let down her veil, put on her gloves, and was about to take up her child, but I begged her to trust it to Gossippe, who had been used to children—which she evidently had not—and she thanked me earnestly, rather with her beautiful eyes than her timid voice.

"Once more seated in the train, she sank into a reverie, from which, however, she roused herself sufficiently to enter into conversation for a few minutes, before we reached London. Seeing my name and address in a book of mine—she had asked to look at Tennyson's "In Memoriam,"—she asked me if I was Lady Mildmay, of Mildmay Hall, Berks, and hearing I was, she said she had often heard of my sorrows and my virtues. At this moment I had her little girl in my arms—she was in a rosy and deep sleep—the train stopped—we had arrived at the Euston station—she stooped forward to kiss her child, and asked me to hold it for a few minutes while she looked for her carriage and servants. I had fancied she was a person of rank and fortune, I felt sure of it now, and offered that Gossippe should escort her, and she declined, and asked Gossippe to take care of a basket (a large, handsome basket), and a little travelling bag for her.

"She came no more; we waited and waited in vain. We got out; we went into all the waiting-rooms; we inquired of all the porters and railway officials. There had been a number of passengers and several trains coming in at the same time. 'A tall young lady, in a white silk bonnet, black veil, chintz muslin, dress, and black velvet cloak,' no one had noticed her. One man thought such a person had hailed a cab, but he could not tell which. There had been many private carriages waiting for passengers; all but mine were gone. What was to be done? The little cherub still slept; the basket and the bag were in the hands of the astounded Gossippe.

THE PALACE SQUARE, BARCELONA.

BARCELONA.—V.

The only public square in Barcelona which from its immensity deserves the name is that of the Palace, wherein is to be seen the Exchange, the Custom-house, and the general's palace—the residence of a sort of a petty king or viceroy of Catalonia. It is a large building, crowned with battlements, and ornamented with frescoes, which are of more than average merit. The custom-house is a modern edifice, surcharged with ornament in stucco, and is a very bad imitation of marble. The Exchange, from the grandeur of its architecture, the beauty of its decorations, and the majestic effect of its ensemble, is decidedly the finest building in Barcelona. The houses are of a very simple style of building, four or five stories high, with numerous windows, and balconies of different shapes. The Palace of the Diputacion, where the ancient cortes held their sittings, is a curious old edifice, and there are preserved the archives of Catalonia and Arragon, a very interesting and well-classified collection of manuscripts, some of which date from the ninth century. The University of Barcelona, at one period famous in Europe, is now turned into barracks for the troops.

But the visitor to Barcelona must not expect to pass his time in the inspection of magnificent structures, in lounging in resplendent palaces, or in gratifying his taste for art in picture-galleries. He must be content to do at Barcelona what they of Barcelona do—as little as possible. But there is enough to see; there are living pictures, better than those of the Spanish school; there are adventures to be encountered as varied as those of Gil Blas, and Dulcineas to be wooed fairer than the lady for whom the poor Don rode out to the fray.

As to amusements, surely you can find them at Barcelona. The Barcelonenses are fond of pleasure, especially pleasure of an excitable description, that makes the eyes flash, and the heart beat wildly. The Catalonians are easily excited. They are invariably ready for revolt. Democracy is popular with the lower classes, who, with their toes on the very boundary-line of rebellion, are ready at a moment's notice to leap over that rubicon and make the knives with which they are now leisurely peeling onions, red with the blood of the aristos. For more than a quarter of a century Barcelona has been under martial law, and the captain-general, whose palace we were observing awhile ago, has the power of arresting, trying, and shooting—unless he prefers hanging—any inhabitant accused of conspiracy against the government of that liege lady, the Queen of Spain. The people are overawed by bayonets, and are taught discretion by the long cord and short shrift which the captain-general serves out to the malcontents.

Now, it is a fact observed by naturalists, that in order to tame a tiger, he must never be suffered to taste blood. Let him have but one lick, and his whole nature is changed. So alarmed are the Barcelonense authorities at the rebellious tendencies of these people, that they are afraid to let them see blood. They have accordingly from time to time forbidden the entertainment of the Fiesta de Toros, or festival of bulls. The short sword of the picador, crimsoned with the blood of the bull, kindles a desire for a more excitable amusement.—What if certain aristos, especially the captain-general, were turned loose in the circus, and if certain of the peasantry or town labourers were permitted to serve him after the fashion of our horned friend the bull—would not the sport be capital? Therefore the captain-general forbids the sport, and declares that the Barcelonense must rest content with sham bull fights. This is a terrible deprivation. A mock fiesta is indeed a mockery. But being at Barcelona, we must witness the spectacle. All the world goes—that is, all the Barcelona world—and crams the Teatro de Toros to suffocation. Extremes meet. The bull circus is next door to the railway station. The barbarian shouts of ancient times are thus repeated within the sound of the whistle of modern civilisation.

There is much to be seen amongst the gaily dressed crowd; much pageantry before the show fairly begins, in the arena; at last we settle ourselves in our seat to witness the fight. Nobody will be killed; nobody run through the body; no horse gored or ripped. Dr. Sangrado will find nothing to do; no call for his lancet or hot water. Now the trumpets are sounding. All eyes are turned one way. The folding gates are opened, and in bounds a bull from the pastures of Jarama. He is a noble-looking fellow, but his horns are buttoned, so that he can do no harm.

either side of the entrance his tormentors lie in wait for him. They have their hands full of small barbed darts, with short handles, decked with ribbons. These are to be hurled into the sides of the bull's neck, to worry him. At his very first bound into the arena, he receives one of these missiles on either side. Maddened by the sting, he turns upon his persecutors. They fly—they parry his thrusts—they leap over the barriers. A chulo, in harlequin's dress and bells, waves his red banner to attract the enraged animal away from the fugitives. Another shakes his scarf at him, just as he is making a sally against the banner. A cloak is thrown in to save the scarf. Meanwhile, the barbed shafts are flying thick and fast into the poor brute's neck. He roars with rage and agony. He scatters his foes in all directions. He drives them out of the ring.

Then comes to the charge the mounted picador. He, too, is armed with javelins; and, riding boldly by the side of the cantering beast, with well-directed aim he drives them home, until the bleeding neck is hung with arrows as with a double mane. At intervals, the bull, fearless of the threatening spear, makes an onset, with all his forces. But for the balls, his horns would gore and rip up the unprotected flanks of his enemy. As it is, horse and rider easily escape. The too venturesome chulo alone, who seizes the bull by the horns, may be thrown down, and even trodden under foot, if he be overmastered.

Having bullied the bull to their hearts' content, and to the satisfaction of the audience, he is given over to the matadore, whose province is to hold him fast and draw the arrows from his bleeding neck; after which they drag or drive him out of the circus. Bravos and bravissimos ring through the theatre; everybody but the poor beast seems thoroughly satisfied. But surely it is a miserable sport, and argues a very low order of intellect, which can find any amusement in such brutal sport. There is not in these mock fiestas even the wretched satisfaction of the excitement called forth by danger: it is simply cruel; as though you went shooting to wing a bird without killing it; or angling simply to hook your fish, and replace him in the water. But such is the amusement which a "discriminating" Barcelonian public largely patronises.

The Matron.

NO. XLII.

In this chapter I must begin to accomplish my promise of giving directions about clothes-making.

My limits will not admit of giving patterns for every garment. It is a good plan, when you are about to make a new thing, to take the old one (to a certain extent) for a model; and, supposing it is a dress you are commencing, to unpick the body and sleeves, and lay the pieces flat on the new material, then tack the old and new together, and cut out the latter from the old pattern.

A child's frock is a nice, inviting piece of work in dress-making. If the dress is to be made in printed cotton, mind that the patterns on the backs and sleeves correspond. Frocks are now made full in the skirt, and without gores; therefore when the sleeves begin to wear, a piece can be taken out of the skirt to repair them; and, if you put in the piece carefully, the frock will look nearly as well as when it was new.

When the breadths are joined, make a wide hem at the bottom of the skirt, and (if you have enough material) run a couple of tucks. Recollect that the pattern must always go upwards, and, in the sleeves, towards the shoulder. The straightest part of each sleeve should be set into the front of the frock.

Of plate No. 1, the material is English merino, of a dark brown colour, relieved by trimmings of scarlet worsted braid. Unless intended for a best frock, the lappels and tabs in front may be omitted.

In plate No. 2, the material is a Waterloo blue merino, trimmed with narrow black lace, and flat black woollen braid. The latter is inserted in the front robings, which are divided by rows of small black buttons. Some little skill in frock-making should have been acquired before plate 2 is attempted; and it is of a pattern suited to the children of my richer rather than my poorer readers.

And now, before fulfilling my promise of presenting to my readers a scale of weekly expenditure for families residing in towns, I must make a few preliminary remarks. Rent, clothes, and a reserve in case of illness, can hardly be called weekly expenses; but they must be provided for out of the weekly income. And for this purpose it is well to have a saving-box, to keep it locked, to slip in the money weekly for the specified purposes, and never to unlock this box, except to take out the money and devote it to these purposes.

I shall not mention washing in the items, but I shall allow liberally for firing and soap, supposing, of course, that the washing is done at home. In the summer, much less than 1s. 3d. a week will suffice for firing; but I recommend, nevertheless, that this sum be laid aside weekly, and all the overplus dropped into the saving-box. It will come in "very handy" in the winter months, either for extra firing in case of severe cold, or for some unexpected call for money. With regard to board, I advise my readers constantly to consult the chapters of the "Matron," that treat of cheap, nice, and varied dinners, &c. I have not had space in the following scale to mention the great variety of articles I have directed you how to cook. I have only put down the things in most general use, and I recommend you, whatever you procure, to see that your board and grocery do not exceed the sum mentioned in the scale of expenditure.

I have said nothing of help for those poorer than yourselves; and I can fancy I hear some of my readers exclaim, "You don't suppose that, with such low wages, we, who have children to feed, can give away anything?" Very little, I own; but, in this case especially, "where there's a will, there's a way." A few kind offices to a poor sick neighbour can be almost always rendered by the active mother of a family. A garment, which, after having been long worn, mended, and turned, may be too shabby for you who have appearances to keep up, would be quite a blessing to a poor beggar, who had nothing to protect her shivering limbs from the cold east wind. Here let us consider the plan of weekly expenses. I mention the sum of 18s., because, although many clever mechanics receive much more, it is a general rate of wages for workmen who have no particular talent.

No. 2.

This plan of expenses is suited to a family with three or four children.

My readers may observe that I have entered more into detail about food than I did in the plan of expenses for country people. The reason is that in London one knows pretty well what one can get; and one knows, also, that one can only get what one pays for.

In the country, there is the produce of the little garden, the bacon from the pig, the buttermilk (often given for the fetching it) from farms or houses where cows are kept, and the wild fruits, cresses, and herbs for salads or tea.

And those who can acquire a taste for tea made of English herbs (so easily cultivated in a little cottage garden) spend pence instead of shillings. For, although China tea is likely to become cheaper, there is little chance (in our time) of the duty being entirely removed.

Then, for fuel, there is all the wood that can be picked up on neighbouring estates, and the turf that abounds in some neighbourhoods; this forms a great contrast with the case of town people, who must give a half-penny for every little bundle of wood for lighting their fires. A good housewife will have to show her economy in managing the fuel as much as in anything else. In the summer, sixpence a week should cover the expense of the fire. It is a good plan to use the chump wood (at a penny a bundle) in the warm weather, with a little small wood and small coal. A wood fire is very easily kindled; and, in the summer, it should be let out after breakfast and after dinner. It must, of course, be lighted again to boil the water for tea; but none but a careless, extravagant person keeps in a fire throughout a summer's day, to avoid the trouble of lighting and re-lighting it. Coke should never be burnt without coal; because, when burnt alone, the fumes are nearly as dangerous as those of charcoal. But when broken very small, and burnt with coal, it makes a cheap, excellent fire. In an early number of the "Matron," the subject of firing is treated of at large, so I shall say no more about it here, but turn to another subject.

In London there are cheap and dear districts. Some bakers sell their bread much cheaper than others, without making it less nourishing, or less wholesome. It is well worth your while to have your bread a little browner if you can, on this account, get it a penny a loaf cheaper. Butchers also vary in prices; and the nearest is not always the best shop to deal at.

Though the wife's avocations may keep her a good deal at home, the husband necessarily goes abroad, and is constantly walking backwards and forwards on account of his business. Let him have his eyes open and look for the best and cheapest shops. Should nothing worthy of notice present itself in the beaten track, let him, when he has a spare half hour, begin exploring, in order to find places where the necessities of life are sold at the most reasonable price. By doing this, he will be able to direct his wife how to spend the money to the greatest advantage.

MUTUAL SATISFACTION.

STARS, let me hear you shout!
Why hang, ye leaves, so still?
This night she faltered out
A rosy-lipped "I will!"

The blood rushed through my brain—
She turned her face to me;
Then kisses came like rain
Upon a parched lea.

Light streamed from pole to pole,
The air became perfume,
And all my barren soul
Burst into green and bloom.

Oh, hour that bankrupts joy,
But perfects nature's plan—
This morn I was a boy
And now I am a man!

Stars, let me hear you shout!
Oh, leaves, hang not so still!
Winds, call your music out!
My love has said, "I will!"

My hope has then come true—
He loves me, so he said;
How fast my pulses flew—
My cheek, it burned, how red!

Some things I seemed to hear,
And some I seemed to see;
Was it through eye or ear
He told his heart to me?

So high he seemed to stand,
My hope grew faint and dim;
His love came like a hand
And drew me up to him.

Within me, all is light—
How, why, I cannot say;
For me, night is not night,
And day is more than day!

And thus my hope comes true—
Oh, hope how faint and dim!
And so what can I do
But love and live for him?

NORMANDY.

THE south of France presents to the poetical imagination its blue horizons, its fields gilded by the sun; but, beside the marvels of a spontaneous nature, the picture of an indolent and sensual life. The north of France has other views and beauties of a more elevated character. Less favoured in respect to natural wealth, it creates surprise and admiration by the fertile applications of its industry, a prodigious activity, and the resources which labour has developed in an avaricious soil. In this order of ideas there are true elements of poetry and motives of inspiration singularly applicable to the tendencies of modern societies. Contemplative poetry has had its day; the waves, the flowers, and the stars, have been sung long enough; the delicate sensations of the soul have been analysed. Normandy is an exemplification of this new order of ideas. We can picture her to ourselves as a young and beautiful rustic maid, endowed with a rude energy, as in the time when she received the embraces of Scandinavia; patient, as in the epoch when, down-trodden by haughty dukes, she mourned the fate of her children; proud and glorious, as when she gave birth to William the Conqueror, to Corneille, the tragic poet, and to Poussin, the gifted painter. How many memories are awakened by a figure so grand in its simplicity! In the first place, she presents to the mind the image of the agricultural life whence Normandy derives its principal wealth. She reminds us, by her application, of the industrial activity which has developed all the resources of the soil. If in fancy we drape her like an antique muse, it is because she has excelled in the arts; and without going back to distant times, when a dweller in the Val de Vire invented the French vaudeville, we cannot forget that, in our days, she has breathed through the lips of Boieldieu melodies sweet as the song of nightingales; that, with Casimir Delavigne, she has wept verses sweeter than the sweetest honey of Greece; and that, with the pen of one of the greatest French historians, she has written pages worthy of Tacitus. If it is the property of poetry to awaken dreams, the artist's charming allegory has this essential quality in high degree; and there is not one of our readers who can look at the chaste and sweet, energetic and active face without doing homage to the thought which inspired it. Bright Normandy! thou hast been beautiful and blessed as Leah, valiant as Deborah, laborious and resigned as Naomi! Wast thou not the mother of that fierce and victorious conqueror who humbled the pride of the Saxon at Hastings, and founded a line from which the proudest families of our country boast to be descended? Surely thou art indeed highly exalted.

Small Change.

A BURGLAR was caught last week in P— with twenty-three watches in his possession. He was the greatest "thief of time" we ever heard of—except "procrastination."

A PETTIFOGGER got into a quarrel, and was chastised by a lawyer named Boyle—in other words, he got into hot water and was Boyled.

FROM the small hollow of the dice-box arise fear, rage, convulsion, tears, oaths, blasphemies—as many evils as ever flew from the box of Pandora; and not even hope remains behind.

PEOPLE are always pleased with those who partake pleasure with them; hence there is a maudlin sympathy among brother toppers, but this is fellowship, not friendship.

SELF-LOVE can gild the most nauseous pill, and can make the grossest venality, when tinselled over with the semblance of gratitude, sit easy on the weakest stomach.

A VERBAL, uninquiring assent, even to a truth, is less meritorious than the conscientious error which is the result of patient and candid investigation.

THE truest epitaph our contemporary "ever saw was that of a clown which simply said, Here I am." Then old John Geddes was wrong when he wrote, in reply to those who derided his unhandsome form:—

"You see not here John Geddes. No!
'Tis but his dwelling-place below."

WE congratulate the Americans on their submarine connection with us: in peace we shall give them lightning, in war we may give them thunder.

ANY feeling that takes a man away from his home is a traitor to the household.

THERE are two classes of people in the church: the religionists, who love God by trying to do right; and the Christians, who are inspired to do right by loving God.

THE body of a sensualist is the coffin of a dead soul.

HUMAN foresight often leaves its proudest possessor only a choice of evils.

THE light in the world comes principally from two sources—the sun and the student's lamp.

NEVER ridicule what you cannot comprehend; you thereby betray your own ignorance.

"Do you profess religion?" "No, sir; I profess my faith and practise my religion." Reader, go thou and do likewise.

THERE is one moment in which ill-nature sincerely repents—the moment when it sees pity felt for its victim.

EXEMPTION from care is not happiness; on the contrary, a certain degree of care is essential to promote enjoyment.

THE Horticultural Society has been discussing "the best way of keeping fruit." We find it is kept best locked up in the pantry with the key in our pocket.

No lady will be admitted to the next "Woman's Rights" Convention who does not "shave and sing bass." The officers are expected to wear moustaches.

A FAT candidate for office, who is said to weigh three hundred and seventy-five pounds, asks the people of his district to try him. Are they tallow-chandlers?

A PASSENGER out in one of the late steamers says:—"The Frenchman's story seems to me expressive.

One morning, the cabin boy came for his boots. 'Boots,' feebly sounded from the berth. 'Ah, sare, you may take zem; I sall want zem nairy more.'"

INJURIES accompanied by insults are never forgiven; all men on these occasions are good haters, and lay out their revenge at compound interest; they never threaten until they can strike.

GREAT crimes seldom spring from any sudden demoralisation in the nature of the perpetrators. What seems to us as a fearful precipitation of character, is no more than the rending of a veil from the hitherto concealed parts of it.

THE time and labour are worse than useless that have been occupied in laying up treasures of false knowledge which it will be necessary to unlearn, and in storing up mistaken ideas which we must hereafter remember to forget. An ancient teacher of rhetoric always demanded a double fee from those pupils who had been instructed by others, for in that case he had not only to plant in, but to root out.

It will puzzle you to find any place in field or garden that has not something alive in it. Every leaf has folks, every bud a tenant, every blade of grass a small look-out, every sunbeam or moonbeam a wing in it.

We once saw a soft and gentle and languid female infidel. She recoiled from a feather, shrank from an insect, and shrieked at the sight of a mouse; she had courage to confront and defy nothing except the Deity.

We are all greater dupes to our own weakness than to the skill of others; and the successes gained over us by the designers are usually nothing more than the prey taken from the very snares we have laid ourselves.

THE REAPERS.

O, my soul goes forth with a faith sublime,
And I feel that God is near,
When the fields are ripe in the harvest-time,
And the reapers' hymn I hear.

They come, they come, like the measured beat
That the waves to the rocks impart!
I feel the tramp of a thousand feet,
Like the throb of a mighty heart.

I love the song of the reaper strong,
As it swells from the golden west;
When they time their stroke to shout and a song,
With their gleaming blades abreast.

They come, they come, like a wave-rode flood,
And the grain melts away like a breath!
But their bright blades bear no blush of blood,
And they strike for life—not death.

Press on, best army, and chant that strain,
And not the war-song—wield
The sickle, not the sword—the grain
Change not for battle-field!

On, glorious band, though from each brow
The dew of life drops down:
'Tis nobler far than gems, I trow,
That glitter in a crown.

Sovereigns ye are, that walk the earth
Freer than kings of state;
Then covet not the rich man's spoil—
Be patient, work and wait.

Trust God!—do battle for the right!
Be firm, be frank, be free;
And let thy watchword in the fight
Be "Truth and Liberty!"

CASSELL'S
ILLUSTRATED ALMANACK
For 1880

Will be issued with the Magazines for November, Price Sixpence.

This Beautifully Illustrated and Instructive Almanack, which has now obtained celebrity wherever the English language is spoken, will this year be found to surpass, if possible, its previous attractiveness. It will contain upwards of Thirty Engravings, the subjects as follow:—Twelve engravings representing the modes of Repast in various Nations and Periods;—Twelve engravings representing important events of the year 1858, including the Capture of Delhi—Storming of Lucknow—Bombardment of Canton—Earthquake in Naples—Burial of the Queen of Oude—the Leviathan off Deptford—Inauguration of the Boulevard de Sebastopol—Arrival of the Queen at Cherbourg—Launch of the Ville de Nantes—Fort Napoleon in Kabylia—Her Majesty's arrival at the Town Hall, Leeds—Removal of the decorations, fountain, &c., in the Place de Châtelet. Four emblematical designs of the Seasons;—Astronomical illustrations, &c., &c. The Literary matter, in addition to explanations of the above Engravings, consists of the Calendar, richly stored with historical remembrances; Chronology; Obituary; Abstracts of Acts of Parliament; Important Statistics; Postal Regulations; Stamps and Taxes; Gardening Calendar; the Government; Royal Family; Houses of Lords and Commons, and other matters, interesting to all branches of the community.

N. B. Orders should be given at once to the nearest Bookseller, as delays consequent upon the large circulation, have unavoidably occurred in the delivery of the two last years' issues.

TOA.—Unfortunately for Russia, the grandees do not second the noble projects of their emperor; and it is evident that the vast majority of the noblemen are not in the least inclined to promote the philanthropic plan of liberating the countless millions of peasants. The nobility, in accepting the emperor's permission to debate the question, have solely acted with the view of putting impediments in the way of the very measure their discussions were intended to prepare for execution. But the peasants, knowing what government designs for the improvement of their position, resent the conduct of their proprietors. It has even been asserted that, in some districts of Russia, the nobles have been compelled to shelter themselves in towns, thus placing themselves beyond the reach of the incensed serfs.

A VISITOR TO LONDON.—You have nothing to pay for visiting the British Museum. This museum is open to every one on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, and to artists, and those who wish to study and make copies of works of art, on Thursdays and Saturdays. During the summer months it is also open to the public on Saturday afternoons. The reading-room is open to persons having orders of admission from ten till five o'clock in winter, and from nine till six in summer. The museum is closed between the 1st and 7th of January, the 1st and 7th of May, and the 1st and 7th of September. It is also closed on Ash Wednesday, Good Friday, and Christmas Day.

A BLACKBURN PRIMROSE.—One recognition would suffice for the three gentlemen.—The sentimental language of the bay leaf is "I change but in dying."

FAIR PLAY.—"Fair Play" writes to us from Dublin, denying that any mystery envelops the birth of the great Duke of Wellington. "Fair Play" asserts that the Duke of Wellington was born on the 29th of April, 1769, in the house No. 24, in Merrion-street, Dublin (a house at present occupied by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners), the residence of the great duke's father, the Earl of Mornington. According to our correspondent, Arthur Duke of Wellington passed his infancy at Dangan Castle, about four miles distant from Trim. "Fair Play" adds that these facts are well known and indisputable. However, they have been disputed, for, in the memoir of the late Duke of Wellington by Richard Ford, Esq., March, 1769 is stated as the period, and Dangan Castle as the place of our great general's birth.

HAPPY LOVE.—So you are a newly-married couple: you think of emigrating, and you wish to know our opinion of British Columbia as a colony in which to reside. It is difficult to give a decided answer as to the merits and capabilities of a district that has so recently become a subject of public interest. In fact, British Columbia is as yet so imperfectly explored it can only be described in its more important features. It consists of a stretch of land, from 250 to 300 miles broad, sloping in a westerly direction. It possesses a number of rivers, having their sources in the Rocky Mountains: the chief of these is the Fraser River. British Columbia is refreshed by the breezes of the balmy Pacific Ocean. Into this ocean all its rivers fall. Considering the latitude of this colony, its climate is remarkably mild. Its scenery is picturesque, and in some respects resembles that of the highlands of Scotland. If "Happy Love" is attracted by the report of the gold to be found in British Columbia, we must beg him or them to bear in mind that the country we are speaking of abounds in hills, is consequently rainy, and that the rains swell the rivers, greatly to the inconvenience of those who attempt to gather gold from the shoals which have been washed from the mountains. But in what country is gold gathered without inconvenience? We are rather surprised to hear that "Happy Love" has seriously thought of making his home in British Columbia, without even knowing in what quarter of the globe it is situated. Let him open his atlas, and having found out the map of North America, let him place his finger on a spot that has 49° N. latitude and 120° W. longitude; he will find himself in British Columbia, with the Pacific and Vancouver's Island (part of the colony) to the west, and with the rocky mountains to the east.

VINGT-DEUX ANS.—The suggestion contained in the first part of your letter shall meet with attention. In reply to your request for our advice respecting a choice of a profession, we cannot conscientiously advise you to become an actor. You have evidently received a good education, and the peculiar talents you speak of would avail you in a much more lucrative profession than that of the stage—a profession in which there is little probability of achieving a success that leads to fortune.

R. WILTSHIRE.—"R. Wiltshire" informs us that he has seen with some surprise in one of our numbers that we do not consider passionate love necessary to the happiness of the wedded state. We are still of the same opinion, for, if passionate love (which never lasts) were necessary in marriage, how short-lived enjoyment would be! On the other hand, we quite agree with our correspondent that there is little chance of happiness in matrimony without pure affection; but "R. Wiltshire" must not confound pure affection with ardent love. These feelings differ in nature and in effect. Ardent love belongs to ardent natures; and it is a happy thing for those who feel such love if they are able to unite themselves to the object of this passion: but there is great danger of a reaction. Passionate lovers are far from making the kindest husbands. It is the man of a gentle, considerate nature whose name is pronounced with blessings; it is his love that makes home happy. In imitation of our correspondent, who quotes from that charming poet of domestic life, William Cowper, we will also quote, for Cowper describes the pure affection of which we speak:—

"The love that cheers life's latest stage,
Proof against sickness and old age,
Preserved by virtue from declension,
Becomes not weary with attention,
But will with sympathy endure
Those evils it would gladly cure."

FIDDLER DICK.—A brilliant polish for shoes, and one which will preserve the leather soft, may be made as follows:—Take half a pound of treacle, one ounce of lampblack, a spoonful of yeast, an ounce of sugar-candy, an ounce of sweet oil, an ounce of gum dragon, an ounce of melted tinsglass, and a quarter of a pint of ox gall. Mix all well together in a pint and a half of rain water and half a pint of vinegar. Warm the mixture slightly before using, and apply with a sponge. Polish with a soft brush.

ANONYMOUS.—The first number of our journal was issued December 31, 1853.

G. BALL.—While we decline furnishing you with directions for making fireballs and rockets, we willingly tell you with what paint slides for magic lanterns are painted. Get the finest colours in powder, and mix them with transparent varnish, thinly, so that the light may shine through them. Be careful not to lay one tint over another till the first is dry and hard.

SIGMA.—You should consult some theological dictionary. The subject is not suitable for our columns. The works to which you refer differ considerably from each other.

SPECTATOR.—Addison's signature in "The Spectator" was one of the letters in the name "Cllo," sometimes one letter, sometimes another. Sir Richard Steele used the letter "R."

TINTINNABULUM.—Donati's comet rises about four o'clock in the morning, and sets about nine in the evening. Of course, it can only be seen by daylight by means of a reflecting telescope.

A CONSTANT SUBSCRIBER.—Geraldine—the accent is placed on the last syllable, Geraldine.

A. R. (Inverness).—The point of etiquette about which you inquire must be regulated according to circumstances.

J. MCBRIDGE.—The paragraph you have quoted from our journal refers, not to Sir Isaac Newton, but to the Rev. John Newton, the intimate friend of Cowper, the poet, and for some years rector of St. Mary, Woolnoth, in the City of London.

VULCAN.—We fear you have been too precipitate in connecting yourself with the "company" you name.

A YOUNG SPORTSMAN.—To bronze your gun barrels, you must first clean and polish them. Then make a paste with blacklead powder and water, rather stiff. Apply this to the barrels with a painter's small brush. When they are quite dry, hold them for a minute over a clear fire, or longer if you wish to have them dark. When cold, polish with a plate brush and soft leather.

HIBERNIAN.—Inch, and Innis or Ennis, are radically the same as the Latin insula, an island. Thus, Ennishowen, Enniskillen, Innismagragh, mean the island of Owen, of Killen, of Magragh.

"The blackening wave is edged with white;
To inch and rock the sea mews fly;

The fishers have heard the water sprite,
Whose screams forebode that wreck is nigh."

SCOTT.

ARGUMENTUM.—It is quite certain that, grammatically speaking, the Isles of Wight, Anglesea, and Man, are not in England; it is also certain that they form an integral portion of England.

J. JOHN.—Familiar Lessons in Chess were given in the early numbers of the Old Series of our journal, commencing in No. 15. However, at the express desire of many new subscribers, similar lessons will shortly be repeated. Your conduct towards C is, certainly, not creditable to you, though you profess to act honourably.

JESSIE.—Use the mixture two or three times a week; it will produce no such unpleasant effect as you seem to fear. INDIGO.—If more than 300 persons leave by train, it is, of course, quite correct to say that there were upwards of 300.

R. A.—We know nothing of the institution about which you inquire. Your verses are respectfully declined.

JOHN R.—The "proper arm" for a gentleman to offer a lady is that which will enable him most effectually to preserve her from accident or insult. The arm will require to be changed according to circumstances.

A MERCHANT'S CLERK.—You can compel your employer to give you a character, but whether you can demand a quarter's salary on your leaving in the middle of the quarter, will depend on the terms of your agreement.

T. AMOS.—There are several places in London where all the articles you require can be obtained at once. Your best plan would be to commission some friend in London to procure them for you.

BEATRICE CENCL.—The celebrated poisoner whose name, strange to say, you have assumed, was executed in the year 1599, under the pontificate of Pope Clement VIII.

W. H. (Nottingham).—A tradesman cannot legally demand a higher price for an article exhibited in his window than that named on the ticket; but he is not bound to sell it to you at that price unless he chooses. To refuse, however, is a practice unworthy of a respectable shopkeeper.

W. H. (Ashwell).—One penny stamp will secure the postage of three numbers of our paper to any part of the United Kingdom.

W. N. M., &c.—You will find a receipt for good black ink in No. 30, page 64.

W. P.—The boys at Harrow School are called Harrovians.

C. HOWARD.—"To lay" is an active verb of which the action passes on to the object following—as, I lay the stone of the building; I laid the stone. "To lie" is a neuter verb—as, I lie on the grass— and has no action that passes on. I lay on the grass— the preterite of the verb to lie. I lay is the same in spelling and sound as the present of the active verb to lay—I lay. The participle of the active verb is laid; the participle of the neuter verb is lain.

R. HOLLY.—The chief magistrate or lord mayor of London was called a bailiff before the time of Richard I. This monarch changed the title of bailiff to that of mayor.

L. D.—You had better apply at the government emigration office. There you can procure information gratuitously as to the sailing of ships and means of accommodation for emigrants. At this office it is ascertained that all agreements between ship-owners and intending emigrants are duly performed, and also that the provisions of the Passengers' Act are strictly complied with. Attendance is given at the office on every week-day, and assistance granted to protect emigrants from fraud and imposition.

T. TOMMS.—It is very dangerous to inhale air tainted with the smell of fresh paint. If you are obliged to remain in fresh-painted rooms, mix chloride of lime with water, with which damp some hay, and strew it upon the floor. This will counteract the injurious odour.

LOCUS.—The reason why Italian is preferred for singing is this. Italian abounds in vowel sounds. It has but few of the hissing sounds of the s, and none of the harsh sounds of the th. Both the s and the th abound in the English language, and they are very unfavourable to the display of the voice. On the other hand, Italian has one great disadvantage in this country—it is not generally understood. You are much mistaken in supposing that the meaning of a song does not signify. What would the Irish melodies be without the exquisite poetry of T. Moore?—poetry so full of meaning that it seems the very language of the heart; and the air of the favourite modern song, "Who shall be fairest," though pretty enough, would not have become such a favourite were it not for the exquisite meaning of the following lines:—

"Who shall be fairest,
Who shall be rarest,
Who shall be first in the songs that we sing?
She who is kindest
When fortune is blindest,
Bearing through winter the bloom of the spring.
Charm of our gladness,
Friend of our sadness,
Angel of life, when its pleasures take wing."

PHILIPPA.—With a clean piece of flannel, dipped in spirits of turpentine, rub the white kid gloves and white shoes until they are quite clean. But you will not be able to judge of the effect of the turpentine on the kid until you have allowed it to dry. If after the first process all the stains are not removed, you must repeat the rubbing.

A YOUTH OF SIXTEEN.—You should, of course, be polite to the daughters of your employer, but it is enough to bow to each once a day. If you join a company seated at dinner, you should shake hands with any familiar friend next you, but you should not disturb the party in order to go through the same ceremony with each member of it. As to your question about income, we think you ought to be able to live comfortably on the sum you mention.

W. V.—All the expenses of the wedding devolve on the family of the bride except the fee to the minister who performs the ceremony. This, according to etiquette, should be paid by the bridegroom.

PHILOPERISTEON.—You should have the finger marks removed from your white satin brocade waistcoat by rubbing with the crumb of stale bread, but mind there is not any grease with this crumb.

CHAS. MAY.—"The Dying Mother;" James T., "Wallace's Address;" T. H. Griffiths, "A Song;" R. U. W., "Life's Work; Invocation to the Muses;" G. T. H., "England's Heroes;" Thomas the Rhymer; Amy Allison, "Death;" Fred Mason, A Subscriber, "Lover's Tales;" H. D., "My Wife;" C. F. S., "The Warrior's Burial;" Minnie; E.; H. Anderton, "The Shipwreck;" respectfully declined.

J. W., Thomas F., W. X. Y., A Subscriber, Archimedes, John H., Jack Manders, W. P., M. C. F., Larky Grigg, H. W. G., Alfred Day, M. M., are referred to the articles on Natural Philosophy in our "Hopes and Hears."

A. B.—In speaking of two or more young ladies of the same family, it is the title Miss not the surname that must be rendered plural. Thus you should say the "Misses Ormond," not the Miss Ormonds.

OUTE.—The emphasis should be laid on the second syllable in Toxophilite, thus: Tox-ôf-i-lite; and on the second syllable in Balmoral, thus, Bal-mô-ra-l.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER CI.

A fish hangs in the net, like a poor man's right in the law, 'twill hardly come out.—SHAKESPEARE.

LIFE and death we are told are both uncertain, and experience daily proves the truth of the aphorism. Happy would it be for mankind if uncertainty in human affairs were limited to these; such, however, unfortunately is not the case. Health, riches, fame, success, friendship, and even love, the most absorbing and universal of all passions, are subject to the same sad law. A day, an hour may undermine the foundation upon which they, one and all, rest, leaving life a blank—existence a wreck.

The more we reflect upon this subject, the more inevitable the conclusion we arrive at. Certainty exists only in the exact sciences—uncertainty is one of the conditions of our existence.

But of all the uncertainties in this uncertain world, the greatest uncertainty most certainly is the law; compared with it all others appear insignificant—a mole-hill to a mountain, or, as Hamlet has it, "Ossa to a wart."

Such at least was the inference which Sir Charles Fourreau, Lieutenant Marsh, and our hero drew from the opinions of three eminent counsel whom Mr. Morton had consulted on behalf of Lillian.

Sir Frederick Silvertongue considered that a case of conspiracy and abduction might possibly be proved, and suggested criminal proceedings against Lady Boothroyd.

Serjeant Rough was of opinion that criminal proceedings were quite out of the question, inasmuch as the Boothroyds were the legal guardians of their niece, and in that character had an undoubted right to the disposal of her person.

Bellam, the great Chancery barrister, advised a bill in equity, calling upon the executors of the will of the great-uncle of Lillian, to account for the residue of the personality which the testator had neglected to dispose of. As her father's representative, he considered the young lady had a right to a share in it.

There was one point, however, the three gentlemen of the long robe unanimously agreed in—that in the absence of any legal proof of the marriage of Allan Boothroyd, the case became involved in considerable obscurity.

"Obscurity!" exclaimed Richard Markham; "why it is as clear as the sun in the heavens at noon-day."

"Morally clear, my dear boy," said the friendly lawyer, tapping him on the shoulder, "morally clear. Unfortunately justice does not see with our eyes."

BET ENTREATING PROTECTION.

"Eyes!" repeated the lover of Lillian, indignantly. "It must be blind as ignorance, wilfully blind; how else can you explain the—"

"I know, I know," interrupted Mr. Morton, good-humouredly. "Time was that I entertained some such crude notions myself."

"I confess that I cannot comprehend this diversity of opinion," observed Sir Charles, "where none ought to exist. If law is a science, it certainly is not one of the exact ones."

"And therein lies its beauty," replied the lawyer. "You cannot see it, it is hardly to be expected that you should do so, but I can; it has been the study of my life."

His hearers came, mentally of course, to a conclusion as unanimous as the one the three eminent counsel had arrived at, that the study was anything but a profitable one.

"After all, Morton," said the lieutenant, who had not previously spoken, "you have not given us your opinion. I, for one, feel inclined to be guided by it, assured that it will be an honest one. Do you incline to Silvertongue's advice?"

"Certainly not," was the reply. "Serjeant Rough's objection I consider fatal; the bill in equity is decidedly our best course."

The baronet and our hero looked disappointed. "The pecuniary interest, were it even greater, is a mere secondary consideration," observed the former; "Lillian will be sufficiently rich without it. What I most earnestly desire is to prove her claim to the name of Boothroyd."

"And do you not perceive, Sir Charles," answered Mr. Morton, "that by the means proposed, we open the entire question. The chancellor, no doubt, will direct an action to be tried at common law; this will give us time to seek out witnesses to the marriage. I am sorry to disagree with you," he continued; "as to the pecuniary point, in my opinion, it is large, much larger than you imagine; had it been otherwise, Lady Boothroyd would never have compromised her reputation, to say nothing of her personal safety, by so decided a step as the abduction of her niece, which, fortunately, we are in a condition to prove."

His hearers nodded approvingly.

"If we could only obtain the parchment, deed, will, or codicil, whichever it may prove," added the speaker—"and I am not without hopes of recovering it soon from the hands into which it has fallen—we should then be in a position to judge her ladyship's motives."

"Something I can understand at last!" exclaimed the baronet, pleased with the clearness with which the lawyer explained his views. "I need not urge you to use every means—to spare no expense; money is not an object."

"The first time I ever received such an instruction," observed Mr. Morton, with a smile; "most clients betray a melancholy impatience on the subject of costs. Fear not but I will do my best."

The mode of action having been decided upon, the gentlemen returned to Mivart's, where they found Major Hawley and his strong-minded little wife. They had called during their absence to renew their acquaintance with their goddaughter.

The lady honoured our hero with rather a critical glance when Lillian introduced him to her. The scrutiny appeared satisfactory—considering that he was not a military man, her beau-ideal of a lover—for she honoured him with a gracious smile, whilst her husband shook hands with him most cordially.

"That lawyer is a clear-headed man," observed Mrs. Major Hawley, when informed where Sir Charles and his companions had passed the morning; "one of the very few I have met with who appeared comprehensible."

"And as honourable as he is clear-headed," replied Richard Markham. "I have known him from boyhood."

"And what says he?" demanded the lady.

"The great difficulty lies in the absence of any legal proof of the marriage of Allan Boothroyd."

"Legal proof!" repeated the godmother of our heroine; "what does the nan mean? Was not the mother of Lillian known to be his wife? received everywhere as his wife? visited everywhere as his wife? I should like to have seen the officer in our regiment," she added, in a tone of indignation, "that would have ventured to introduce any creature into our society!"

The eyes of Lillian filled with tears: to her sensitive nature it was painful to hear even the possibility of her parents not having been united discussed.

"To doubt it," said the lieutenant, with emotion, "were to doubt the purity of heaven itself; for, apart from a brother's partial fondness, a nobler being never existed than my sister. When in India, I made a long and fruitless journey to obtain the certificate of her marriage; but, unfortunately, the station at which I believe it to have been celebrated had been destroyed by the rebel sepoys, and the archives burnt. But you, madam," he continued, "who were on such intimate and affectionate terms with her, did you never hear her name the chaplain by whom the rite was celebrated?"

"Never."

"Or inquire where?"

"I had no motive for such a question," answered the major's lady. "No one who ever came in contact with Mrs. Boothroyd could have entertained a doubt upon the subject. All I know is, that it took place before Allan obtained his epaulettes. You should have seen him: there never was a more fond, devoted husband—he was as proud of her as fond. Do you remember, Hawley, how indignantly he expressed himself when Gresham, of the Artillery, bowed to him, because his wife was on his arm, and Gresham had that woman with him?"

"Certainly, my love," said the major; "it almost came to a quarrel. And, after all, the party you allude to was to be pitied as much as blamed; she had—"

"Hawley!" interrupted his wife, "none of your barrack-room excuses for profligacy, if you please; highly unbecoming at your years—very!"

The gentleman coloured to the temples at the reproof thus sharply administered; but, like a well-trained husband, submitted to it.

"Lillian, my love," said the lady, willing to change the subject, which she saw was a painful one to her goddaughter, "you do not wear my gift."

The fair girl regarded her with surprise.

"I mean," added the speaker, "the chain and locket I gave you at your christening—the torquoise. You remember it, Hawley—the one I bought in the bazaar at Delhi."

"Distinctly," replied her husband; "with the sentence from Hafaz—'Hope in all—have faith in all'—engraved upon it. Poor Dr. Tytler and I never could agree about the use of the particle."

"I recollect it perfectly!" exclaimed Lillian, "and wore it, I feel certain, during my residence at St. Faith's, but cannot call to mind when or by whom I was deprived of it."

"Perhaps Rose can afford us some information," observed Lady Bell.

Mark Rayner and his wife, who were both staying at the hotel with the baronet and his family, were sent for.

"We never saw the trinket," replied Rose, in answer to the inquiry. "Lady Boothroyd felt terribly disappointed at not obtaining possession of it; it is one of the reasons she alleged for not fulfilling her promise to give up the leaf torn from the Bible. Happily," she added, with a glance of affection to her husband, "of no importance now."

The subject of the chain and locket was permitted to drop; no one attaching any other value to them than that of a memorial of the donor's affection.

We must now request our readers to quit the happy party assembled in the drawing-room at Mivart's, and accompany us to a less interesting locality—a small, cold-looking, uncomfortable house in a narrow court in the city. The ground floor consisted of two rooms, both used as offices, and communicating by a green-baize door. It would have puzzled a casual visitor to tell what kind of business could possibly be carried on there.

There were neither a safe nor ledger, boxes for papers, nor shelves for samples of merchandise in either of them; the only articles of furniture consisted of a small round table and a few chairs.

The same description will apply to each of the rooms, except that the windows of the one looking into the court were filled with ground glass; with those at the back a similar precaution had not been necessary; they opened into a small paved yard which was not overlooked by any of the neighbours.

This was the private office of Mr. Meadows, a retired inspector of police, who for several years had exercised his old calling of detective on his own account.

Could the old panelled walls of either of those rooms have spoken, they might have revealed strange confidences and startling episodes in real life—secrets to make the fortune of a novelist, and give the philosopher a deeper insight into human nature than all his books had given him. Unfortunately, however, they were dumb: the confessions they have received can never be repeated, unless Mr. Meadows should—but no; the ex-inspector is discretion itself. There is little chance of his ever relating them—the speculation is a hopeless one.

There is nothing very remarkable in the appearance of the gentleman we are about to introduce to our readers, and yet we feel disposed to describe him.

Mr. Meadows, judging from our recollection of him—for we have never been sufficiently intimate to ascertain his height correctly—stands about five feet eight, or at the most five feet nine; his figure, thin and wiry—a certain indication of strength; his head, small, round, and bullet-shaped, not unlike a Puritan's; his features, regular, but not particularly expressive—which latter trait probably constituted one of his great advantages in the profession he had chosen, since it enabled him to listen to the most appalling statements and exciting narratives, without betraying the impression they produced.

The gentleman whom we have just sketched—and many, no doubt, will recognise the portrait, although it is only a pen-and-ink one—was seated in the front office, looking over a small memorandum-book, whose contents would have puzzled Champolion—who read the hieroglyphics as easily as a boy of ten reads his primer—to decipher.

On each page there appeared a number of little crooked characters, interspersed with mysterious dots and Roman numerals; then followed, perhaps, a diagram, which most certainly had nothing to do either with Euclid or the Principia—Professor Airy himself would not have attempted to describe it, although no doubt perfectly intelligible to him who drew it.

The occupant of the room had already received one visitor that morning, and scarcely looked for a second, his clients being far more select than numerous, as our readers will understand when we inform them that it was necessary that those who sought his assistance should come, not only with well-filled purses, but perfect confidence, the latter a sine quâ non to his undertaking a case.

Evidently he prided himself upon his professional successes, and did not think fit to endanger his reputation, however tempting the fee.

There was a ring at the office-bell, followed by a tap at the wall of the passage, given by the servant to ascertain whether his master was disengaged.

"Yes," said the ex-inspector, in a loud, clear tone, but without raising his eyes from the little memorandum-book which seemed to have a peculiar attraction for him.

The bolts of the street-door were withdrawn, and Mr. Morton entered the room.

"I presume that I am not unknown to you," observed the lawyer, with a smile, "although my visit has doubtless surprised you."

"Persons in my profession," replied the detective, "rarely forget a face they have once seen; and as for being surprised, respectable men—very respectable ones—frequently visit me."

"No doubt, no doubt," said the gentleman. "The fact is, I require your aid in a very important affair; and may as well state, at once, that the fees will be large, the confidence unbounded."

Mr. Meadows smiled graciously.

"Do you consult me on your own account?" he asked.

"No; on the part of a client."

"The name?"

Mr. Morton hesitated.

"First let me inquire," he replied, "whether you are engaged in any affair connected with a murder recently perpetrated in Devonshire?"

"At St. Faith's—the steward of the late Sir Norman Boothroyd; I remember the circumstance. There is a large reward offered for one of the assassins who escaped."

"Just so; but you have not answered my question," observed Mr. Morton.

"I am not engaged in any affair connected, either directly or indirectly, with it," said Mr. Meadows.

And the assurance that he was not, perfectly satisfied his visitor, who at once proceeded to relate to him the history of Lillian; to which the detective listened most attentively without interrupting him by a single question, till he had concluded, when, opening his memorandum-book, he began to write.

"The affair is complicated," he observed; "but I have unravelled as tangled a thread in my time. Have you any clue to the name of the man who escaped from the farm after the murder?"

"A slight one," replied his visitor; "in fact, rather a supposition than a clue. Manders, the nephew of the murdered steward—"

"And the murderer?" interjected the ex-inspector of police.

"And the murderer," repeated Mr. Morton, "supposes him to be a fellow named Fiddler Dick."

"His reasons?"

"Fiddler Dick was one of Mike's companions in crime."

"And what is the character of this Manders?" inquired Mr. Meadows.

"He bears an excellent one," replied the lawyer. "He has only just returned from India with the family of Sir Charles Fourreau: all who know him entertain the highest respect for him."

This last observation dissipated any vague suspicion that might have been lurking in the astute mind of the detective.

"This Fiddler Dick," resumed the speaker, "has a wife, who betrayed him some years since to the police. The wretched woman lives in continual dread of his return. I had some communication with her in consequence of inquiries I instituted in behalf of Major Hawley and his wife, clients of mine."

"Do you know her address?"

"No."

"That is of very little consequence," observed Mr. Meadows; "I can easily discover that."

"When you have done so, I wish you would let me know it."

The officer nodded as much as to say certainly, and having made one or two more notes in his memorandum-book, the affair, with the exception of the fees, was considered settled.

"You will look upon this merely as a retainer," said Morton, handing him a cheque for a hundred pounds; "for all necessary expenditure you have carte blanche."

"Very satisfactory—very satisfactory, indeed!" replied the former, as he glanced at the amount. "I perceive that you understand business thoroughly; it is a pleasure to transact it upon such terms. I have your address," he added, "and in a few days trust to have information for you."

As Mr. Morton quitted the court, he met a respectable, stolid-looking man, with a certain bucolic expression of feature and style about him, which convinced the lawyer that he came from the country. He was not far wrong, the party being no other than Marshall, the adviser, or, more properly speaking, the agent of Lady Boothroyd.

There is a sort of freemasonry in every trade or profession; its members generally recognise each other by indications which escape the unpractised eye, at least it proved so in the present instance, for each of the gentlemen mentally pronounced the other to be a limb of the law as they passed—Morton to his brougham, which was waiting for him; Marshall, to the office of Mr. Meadows.

Although our friend Morton possessed a far higher sense of the real dignity of his profession than the country practitioner, the latter far exceeded him in his ideas of the importance his name being upon the Rolls conferred. With Marshall it was a personal feeling which made him as off-handed with those he considered his inferiors, as an inborn natural servility rendered him cringing and subservient to those above him; to him a police officer was simply a police officer, and he entered upon the object of his visit to the clever detective in the same patronising tone he would have employed with one of the rustic constabulary of his native county.

"I want to employ you," he said, taking the seat Meadows silently pointed to. "I am told you are a shrewd, clever fellow. As I intend to pay you well, I expect you to act honestly by me. I warn you that I shall keep an eye upon you," he added, "so it will be useless to attempt to deceive me."

"A difficult task, no doubt," observed the detective, with a suppressed smile.

"I flatter myself that it would be," replied his visitor, fixing his eyes upon him. Marshall had great faith in the power of his glance.

"And having flattered yourself, sir, perhaps you will inform me in what way I can be of service to you."

There was something in the tone as well as the words, that rather confused the country practitioner, who coloured slightly, and resumed the conversation in a less patronising tone, to the great amusement of the speaker.

"A murder has been committed upon the person of the steward of the late Sir Norman Boothroyd."

"I have read an account of it in the papers," replied the officer, who began to feel greatly interested.

"That is not the worst," added his visitor.

"I am aware it is not!" was the reply.

Marshall regarded him with an incredulous stare.

"The ruffian who escaped took with him a parchment or deed, which it is of the utmost importance should be recovered, and for which—"

"Lady Boothroyd is willing to pay handsomely," interrupted Meadows, without moving a muscle of his countenance. "Pray proceed."

"I really, I cannot understand this!" exclaimed the astonished lawyer.

"You are from the country," quietly observed Mr. Meadows.

Never had Marshall's self-importance been so lowered before.

"I see!" he exclaimed, struck by a sudden idea; "that double-faced, treacherous woman has been with you, although she declared everything should be left to my direction."

The ex-inspector smiled. He was too shrewd to deny—and, let us add, too honest to confirm the impression of the speaker by a falsehood. If the gentleman thought fit to mislead himself, that was no affair of his—certainly not. Of course, the opinion his visitor let slip, touching the character of the lady who employed him, did not pass unnoticed.

"Permit me to remind you," he said, looking at his watch, "that my time is valuable. I have an appointment in an hour, which must be kept."

"With her ladyship, I suppose," muttered his visitor, bitterly. "You have been instructed by her?"

"That is a leading question," replied the detective, "and you must excuse my answering it. You are clever, sir, very clever; but we are not quite fools in London. You forget this is a mere conversation, not a consultation."

"I cannot discover the difference."

"Your clients are more clear-sighted, I suspect," said Meadows, "unless in the country you practise for the mere pleasure of practising."

Marshall took the hint, and handed him a fee of five guineas—in his opinion a very handsome sum.

"And now," he said, "tell me, what would you advise?"

"The ruffian will doubtless attempt to quit the country," said Mr. Meadows, in a tone of deliberation; "and, let me see, yes, a ship sails from Liverpool for America at the end of the week."

"Had I better proceed there?" demanded the lawyer.

"It is my advice that you should do so."

"Will you accompany me?"

"I cannot."

"I will pay you handsomely."

"Of course," observed the detective; "but, unfortunately, I have more important business in hand, and cannot quit London for the present. In Liverpool you will find officers both intelligent and active, and criminal lawyers able and willing to assist you; but, perhaps," he added, with a scarcely perceptible curl at the corners of his mouth, "you have lost some portion of your confidence in country practice?"

Marshall mentally admitted that he had, and, after making a second fruitless attempt to induce Mr. Meadows to alter his determination and accompany him, took his leave.

"So," said the detective, as the door closed on his departing visitor, "for four days, at least, I am safe from any interference from that quarter. Four days," he repeated, slowly; "many a fortune has been lost and won in half the time."

One hour afterwards Mr. Meadows quitted his offices to take his usual morning walk. Unlike the generality of mankind, his ideas rose quickly and freshly in the crowded streets.

CHAPTER CII.

And though he posted o'er so fast,
His fear was greater than his haste;
For fear, though fleetest than the wind,
Believes 'tis always left behind.—BUTLER.

It is not the least part of the punishment of crime that its perpetrators dare not venture into the light of day. Night is their day; and, like beasts of prey, they prowl beneath its shade. It must be a terrible thing to regard the cheering sun like a policeman's lamp, to shrink and turn aside the instant its rays are directed towards us—to fear the gaze of our fellow-men—to flit like an uneasy shadow through the crowd, restless, conscience-stricken, and unhappy.

There were two persons of our readers' acquaintance to whom this state of feeling was becoming gradually habitual—Fiddler Dick and his wife.

From the day of the murder, the wretched man had felt that a fearful doom was impending over him. The hand of justice seemed ever ready to grasp him; the hangman's coil to encircle his neck. He had lost much of his former confidence: a sound caused him to start, a casual glance to turn pale with terror. He had but one strong passion left—the desire of revenge upon the woman who had betrayed him. That burnt as fiercely as ever; and when, at night, he ventured, carefully disguised, into the streets, it was in the hope of obtaining some clue to her abode.

For several years past Bet had kept a common lodging-house—a rendezvous for tramps, peglars, beggars, or still more questionable characters; and, to use her own expression, was "pretty well to do in the world." The establishment prospered—for poverty invariably pays an awful per centage for its accommodations.

As long as she knew that the mountebank was safe in the dockyard at Chatham her mind had been tolerably easy. It was only in an occasional dream, or when in a maudlin state, produced by the reaction of her favourite beverage, gin, upon her nerves, that the parting scowl, and the significant speech of her husband, "It ain't for life!" recurred to her. But since she had heard of his release from one of her lodgers, who had actually met him previous to the expedition to the Home Farm, her terrors no longer permitted her to sleep; a pair of vindictive eyes seemed to follow her everywhere, and a mocking voice to hiss the words into her ear; even the fiery stimulant lost its force, and she fell into such a nervous and unsettled state, that life—the life she felt so anxious to preserve—became a burden. She could endure it no longer, but determined to consult with Mr. Morton.

Bet remembered the kindness of the worthy lawyer, the liberality with which he had rewarded the slight intelligence she had procured him of Lillian.

It was some time before she could find sufficient courage to quit her house in the Mint. There at least she felt tolerably safe, the court she inhabited being densely populated by characters amongst whom she had obtained a certain amount of popularity. These were not her only protection; still further to secure herself, as well as assist her in the management of the place, the convict's wife had engaged a tall, gaunt, powerful Irishwoman, who, in addition to accomplishments more or less feminine, could drink like a trooper, without ever appearing drunk, patter chaff with the most experienced tramp upon the road, coax the refractory, control the violent, and, if necessary, defend herself like a man.

We need scarcely observe that, in the present state of her feelings, such a personage was an invaluable assistant to Mrs. Fiddler Dick.

"Norah," said her mistress, addressing the amazon, who stood very nearly five feet ten, without her shoes—in fact, she rarely wore any—"get me my yallar sharl and green bunnit."

"Sure ye are not goin' out at this blessed hour of the night," observed the woman, "to lave me wid me hands full, and the house schwarming wid lodgers; to say nothink of the fleas—the lively critters—their allays at home."

"Indeed, but I am," replied Bet; "so bring the duds at once, and the plaid gownd as is a hangin' by the side of the bed."

Norah mounted the creaking stairs—for the house, like most of the buildings in the Mint, was an exceedingly old one—to what was emphatically designated as "the missis's room," every other being reserved for the accommodation of the lodgers, and presently returned with the articles in question, which Bet slipped on in the little den parted off from the kitchen.

"Well!" exclaimed the servant, "if it's not yourself as looks the rale lady, I'd like to see the woman as does! That is a sharl!"

"It is rather genteel," observed the convict's wife, complacently, as she enveloped her broad shoulders in the object of Norah's admiration. "Now get me a cab."

"A what?"

Her mistress repeated the word.

"Is it goin' to ride ye are?"

"Of course I am," replied Bet. "It wouldn't be safe to walk and be out agin—not that I think he'd know me in this dress."

"Put your wale down," suggested Norah, with a grin.

Before leaving, the mistress of the house gave instructions respecting her customers—who were to pay before being permitted to take up their quarters for the night, and who might be trusted till the morning. This important matter settled—for in the midst of her alarm Bet had still an eye to business—she entered the cab, which had been brought to the entrance of the court, with a sort of aristocratic feeling, and drove to the residence of Mr. Morton.

To her inquiries the servant answered that he was out.

"My usual luck!" muttered the woman; "I allays am in for it."

The well-bred footman stared.

"Young feller," she added, in a patronising tone, "can't you tell me where I can drop on him?"

James felt inexpressibly shocked; the yaller sharl and bunnit had not imposed on him.

Like most persons of her class Bet did not want for cunning. She saw from the supercilious expression of the man's countenance that something was wrong.

With a tact which might have done honour to a more polished visitor, she drew a five-shilling piece from her pocket. The bait took; the eyes of the footman became riveted upon it.

"Is it business?" he asked.

"Most particular," replied the woman, turning the coin carelessly between her finger and thumb.

"Well, then, he is at Golding and Matchett's chambers in Parliament-street. I heard him say he should be engaged there till twelve."

"And wat's the tigger say now?" she inquired. James was so obliging as to walk into the hall and ascertain the time exactly.

"Half-past eleven."

"That'll do, young feller!" exclaimed Bet, with a chuckle, at the same time dropping the coin in her pocket. "Drive to Parlimint-street," she added to the driver.

The expressions with which the disappointed servant saluted her departure were anything but complimentary. He considered himself done, most unhandsonly done, and his disgust of the lower orders became greater than ever.

As the cab with its fare—pardon us, gentle readers, we have no intention to pun—drove down Parliament-street, Bet noticed a crowd of idlers gathered round the entrance to the Horse Guards, reading by the light of the gas-lamp a placard, headed "Murder! Two hundred pounds reward."

It was the one offered for the apprehension of Fiddler Dick.

"Read it out, will yer?" exclaimed a man whose features were closely muffled in a large red comforter.

"Read it yourself," replied those nearest.

"I can't."

"Perhaps the gentleman is blind," observed one.

"Or has forgotten his letters," suggested a saucy, fast-looking boy. "Here," he added, "I'll read it for you."

"Murder! Two hundred pounds reward."

The crowd became too much interested to notice how rapidly the man, who had requested the handbill might be read, drew the red comforter he wore up to his very eyes.

"Whereas, a barbarous and most inhuman murder was committed on the night of the 24th of December last, upon the person of Andrew Sillex, steward, residing at the Home Farm, St. Faith's, Devonshire: This is to give notice that a reward of two hundred pounds will be paid for the apprehension of one of the murderers, who escaped. His companion in crime was shot at the time, and is since dead.

"Application to be made at the Metropolitan Police-station, Scotland-yard."

"Two hundred pounds," repeated a pale, hungry-looking man, "going a-begging, as a fellow may say! I wish I could meet with him; don't you?"

This was addressed to the party so closely muffled up, who growled out the word "rayther."

"But there ain't no description on him," he added.

"Yes, but there is!" exclaimed the youth; "I have not read it all, yet."

"The supposed murderer is about five feet six—"

"That's about your height!" observed the man who had expressed his mortification at such a sum as two hundred pounds going a-begging.

"Thin legs, and a most unprepossessing countenance," continued the reader.

"That resembles you," interrupted the red comforter.

This turned the laugh against the thin gentleman, and drew anything like attention from the speaker, who was no other than Fiddler Dick himself. With that desperate self-possession which extreme danger sometimes gives, the ruffian buttoned up his coat, and, whistling a tune, walked deliberately away. His position was a desperate one. Where to pass the night he knew not; not that he was without money, for, on his arrival in London, he had gone to the lodgings of Mike, and taken possession of all that remained of the old convict's hoard, as well as a small sum which he found in the trunk of Brandt.

"I s'pose I must give it up, arter all," he muttered to himself, "and cut to Meriky. It's 'ard, infernally 'ard, with a fortin in one's grasp, and no one to trust to."

Here he struck his ungloved hand upon the left side of his coat. Had any passer-by noticed the action, he would have concluded that Fiddler Dick merely intended to warm it; the action, however, had a deeper significance, for sewn between the lining of the garment was the parchment he had abstracted from the Home Farm.

As he continued to walk along, chewing the cud of anything but agreeable fancies, he noticed a cab standing in the street, and a gentleman conversing earnestly with a female, whose head appeared half out of the window. The convict started; he could not be mistaken in the features, they were those of his faithless wife.

Fortunately for himself he was in the shade of the gas-lamp, which cast its full light upon the group before him. He would have given his right hand to have heard the conversation, but dared not approach a step nearer for fear of detection. His scowl became terrific, accompanied as usual by the drawing down of the corners of his mouth.

"And so," said the lawyer, "you are convinced your husband will never rest till he has discovered your abode."

"Never," answered Bet; "I shall have no peace of mind till he is hanged." Then seeing that Mr. Morton looked shocked, she added, in a whining tone, "Ah, sir, you don't know him; you haven't lived with him the years as I have—borne all his tantrums, humours, blows, and temper. To think," she added, "that he should get another ticket-of-leave! But there, say the wust on him, there never was sich a hand for gammoning the gentry."

"And you require protection," observed the gentleman.

"Or I must give up my bizziness," replied the woman. "A hard thing, considerin' how I have toiled to get things comfortable together; but I can't stand it. Nothing comforts me ever since I heard as he was out. I feels as if there was a knife at my throat."

"Have you heard nothing respecting him since he left the dockyard at Chatham?" inquired the lawyer.

"Nothink, and don't want."

"Well, then," resumed Mr. Morton, "I will send a person to you in the morning who will answer for your safety, provided you follow his directions implicitly."

Bet answered him that she would follow anythink. It is not necessary now to relate what further passed between the speakers; sufficient for the present that Bet felt exceedingly reassured by the interview with the lawyer, whose praise she summed up by emphatically pronouncing him "a brick."

Whether she meant a regular or an irregular one, we are not sufficiently in the lady's confidence to state.

It was a great trial to the patience of Fiddler Dick—whose instincts, like the wolf's, prompted him to spring at once upon his prey—to behold the woman who had betrayed him, whose life he had vowed a hundred times to take, within his reach, and yet feel himself chained by his fears: forced to crouch and hide.

The apparent respectability of Bet—for he noticed the yallar shawl and green bunnet—added to the bitterness of his feelings.

A few moments' reflection convinced him that any attempt to gratify the amiable propensities of his nature, at the present moment, like the sting of the scorpion, would only recoil upon himself. It was something to have seen her, to have obtained some clue by which he might trace her, and he determined to content himself for the present, by following the cab to its destination.

Few persons were better acquainted with the streets of London than the mountebank; who, in the course of his many vocations, had frequently found occasion to avail himself of passages, short cuts, and turnings, to avoid the pursuit of the police. This knowledge proved serviceable now, since it enabled him to keep the cab in sight without over-exerting himself, or appearing ostensibly to follow it. His perseverance was rewarded at last, by seeing it stop at the entrance to one of the numerous courts in the Mint.

Knowing that it was not a thoroughfare, he paused to recover breath. A wretched-looking female approached him, and asked for charity.

"I am as poor as you are," he replied. "Why don't you ask of those who can afford it?" he added, pointing to his wife, then descending from the cab.

"From her?" exclaimed the woman; "why, she lives by such as I am! It's old Bet, as keeps the lodging-house."

"In the court?"

"Yes: the last on the right hand side."

Fiddler Dick had learnt all that he desired to know; and turning on his heel, he walked away, without bestowing on his informant a single penny.

That night Mrs. Fiddler Dick enjoyed a comfortable night's rest. Whether her interview with the lawyer, the soothing effects of her favourite beverage, or the effects of both combined contributed to this desirable result, we cannot now decide. Certain it is that she rose in excellent spirits: visions of widows' caps, a large reward, and black crape floated before her. Something in the shape of a second husband might, possibly, also have been dimly seen in the perspective—for Bet was a far-seeing person, and had long since come to the conclusion that it was not good, either for man or woman, to be alone.

One by one her lodgers had departed: some to tramp the streets seeking the cold bread of charity; some to vend their petty wares, and others to exercise their still more questionable industry, leaving the mistress of the lodging-house and her handmaid Norah to tidy up the place—no work of supererogation, as our readers may suppose.

In the fulness of her contentment—the lodgers had all paid up—Bet began to sing.

"The misses is gay as an Easter colleen, this mornin'," observed the servant, "and good right she has to be, wid everything genteel about her, like a lady as she is. Sure, it's myself as has the heavy heart," she added. "Och and ohone!"

"Norah," said her mistress, "don't come any of yer wild H Irish, yer know as I can't abide it; but if it's a drop yer mean, speak out and say so; maybe a toothful would do me no harm."

"I'll kiss the blessed book that it will!" exclaimed the amazon, with a broad grin.

"Mind, only a quartern," added Bet, giving her the money to pay for it, "and don't be long—I hate to be alone."

"Myself will be back afore ye can count three over the buckle," exclaimed the woman, as, bottle in hand, she darted into the court.

Considering that the lady weighed, at the most moderate computation, twelve stone, the promise, as far as regards time, might be considered an indefinite one.

No sooner was she left in her dark, dreary kitchen, where no sunbeam ever penetrated, than a sense of loneliness fell upon the mistress of the lodging-house. It was scarcely to be wondered at; the place looked miserable enough—the fire burnt to the last few ashes, fragments of food were trampled on the mud-stained floor, a pile of greasy plates, cups, and saucers stood on the long deal table, which rickety benches flanked on either side.

Added to which, there was an overpowering odour of tobacco tempered with gin in the atmosphere.

Bet had commenced reducing this chaos into something like what she considered order, when the door opened.

"For once you have been quick," she observed, believing it to be Norah with the gin.

"Are you the mistress of this house?" inquired a man, with a pack upon his shoulders, and dressed like one of her ordinary customers.

Bet started.

Although the make-up, to use a theatrical phrase, was exceedingly clever, the keen glance of the woman detected that it was a make-up, and she became alarmed.

"Supposing I am," she answered, at the same time moving so as to place the table between herself and the speaker, "what then?"

"Are you alone?"

"No, I ain't!" shouted the woman; "there are plenty within call, if you thinks to mislis me. Mur—"

"Don't be a fool!" interrupted the man, advancing towards her; "I come from Mr. Morton."

The name of the lawyer somewhat calmed her terrors.

"How am I to know you come from him?" she asked, only partially reassured.

"You saw him last night."

"Where?"

"In Parliament-street."

"All right!"

"And he promised you should be protected against your husband, Fiddler Dick."

"All right," repeated Bet, still more emphatically; "why didn't yer say so at once, without flusterin' me?"

"You can accommodate me, I suppose?" observed the visitor.

"Why, yer ain't a-going to stay here?"

"How else am I to protect you?" demanded the detective, for the pretended traveller was no other than Mr. Meadows.

The woman eyed his spare figure contemptuously.

"You perfect me!" she exclaimed, in a tone of contempt. "Why Dick ud wring the necks of half a dozen like yer."

"Shall I tell you my name?"

"As yer likes."

He whispered it in her ear, and it was extraordinary the effect the sound produced; the reputation he enjoyed amongst persons of the class the mistress of the lodging-house was most familiar with being something fabulous—prodigious.

"What the real—the—?"

The detective nodded.

"Well, I never!" and with a look of admiration.

more expressive even than her words, all further doubt, hesitation, or objection vanished.

"Do you live alone?" inquired her visitor.

Bet explained to him that she had a servant, who was likely to be absent some time longer. She calculated on Norah's love of gossip.

"That is fortunate. Show me the house—only the lower part of it."

Mrs. Fiddler Dick conducted him over it. A very slight inspection was sufficient to satisfy him.

"Your husband will never attempt an entrance from the front," he said.

Bet was of the same opinion.

"But from the window at the back, opening in the passage. I shall return to-night, in fact, every night till he is taken, with two companions. Of course," he added, "you will not show the slightest sign of recognition."

The mistress of the house assured him that she was too wide awake for that.

"I shall leave my pack," observed the officer; "none of your lodgers are likely to recognise me in this disguise, at least."

"Well," said the woman, scratching her head, "it aint so bad; them togs are well worn, but the shoes."

"Don't you consider them dirty enough?"

"Pretty well," replied Bet, eyeing them critically; "though it is London mud, and any one can tell they have been blacked."

"What has that to do with it?"

"A regular tramp's are always iled."

Mr. Meadows quitted the lodging-house with the conviction that even he had something to learn.

MY CHILDREN.

HAVE you seen Annie and Kitty,
Two merry children of mine?
All that is winning and pretty
Their little persons combine.

Annie is kissing and clinging
Dozens of times in a day,— Chattering, laughing, and singing,
Romping, and running away.

Annie knows all of her neighbours,
Dainty and dirty alike,—
Learns all their talk, and, "be jabbers," Says she "adores little Mike!"

Annie goes mad for a flower,
Eager to pluck and destroy,— Cuts paper dolls by the hour,
Always her model—a boy!

Three little prayers we have taught her,
Passing from winter to spring;
Oh, you should list to my daughter
Saying them all in a string!

Kitty—ah, how my heart blesses
Kitty, my lily, my rose!
Wary of all my caresses,
Chary of all she bestows.

Kitty loves quietest places,
Whispers sweet sermons to chairs,
And, with the gravest of faces,
Teaches old Carlo his prayers.

Matronly, motherly creature!
Oh, what a doll she has built—
Guiltless of figure or feature—
Out of her own little quilt!

Nought must come near it to wake it;
Noise must not give it alarm;
And when she sleeps, she must take it
Into her bed, on her arm.

Kitty is contrary, rather,
And, with a comical smile,
Mutters, "I won't," to her father,—
Eyeing him slyly the while.

Loving one more than the other
Isn't the thing, I confess;
And I observe that their mother
Makes no distinction in dress.

Preference must be improper
In a relation like this;
I wouldn't toss up a copper—
(Kitty, come, give me a kiss!)

"ONE of our city merchants," says a correspondent, "having sold a bill to the amount of some £200 to one of his country brothers, took a six-months' note for the amount, with interest at 10 per cent. per annum. After waiting some two weeks after the note was due, he wrote to his customer requesting him to send the amount as soon as possible, as he was very hard up at that particular time. In a few days he received the following reply:—'Dear Friend,—I received your note by yesterday's mail. I can only say in reply, that it is impossible for me to comply with your request, as it is against my principle to pay the interest, and decidedly against my interest to pay the principal.'"

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

TO YOUNG MEN—SOCIAL DUTIES.

EVERY young man has certain social duties and privileges in society which it is necessary that he should recognise. Many young men fail for years to get hold of the idea that they are members of society. They seem to suppose that the social machinery of the world is self-operating. They see political organisation in active existence; they observe the operations of various societies, but they seem to imagine that all social movements whatsoever are to be organised and exercised without their aid, and that these movements exist only as the legitimate objects for their criticism.

One of the first things a young man should do is to see that he is acting his part in society. The earlier this is begun the better. Mutual improvement societies and self-instruction classes have a tendency to teach the lesson of which we speak. They are excellent things. They make men feel a certain amount of responsibility. The members are compelled to do something; and this is precisely the lesson which it is important young men should learn. Half the ills in society originate in the fact that its burdens are unequally borne, and that individuals fail to discharge their respective duties. We, therefore, cannot too strongly urge upon young men the necessity of beginning early to recognise and to fulfil the obligations which devolve upon them. If you have intellect and accomplishments, show them for the elevation and delight of the circle in which you move. If you have none of these, show an accommodating spirit and do what you can. Do your part, and be a man among men. Assume your portion of social responsibility, and see that you discharge it well. If you fail to do this, you are acting dishonestly towards society and yourself. You are robbing society of your services, and yourself of the respect which would accrue from their discharge.

Young men have all noticed how easily some of their number get into society, and how difficult it is for others to obtain an entrance. They are apt to think that society unequally dispenses its favour. But all social duties are reciprocal, and society is far more likely to pay homage to the individual, than the individual is to society. Have you, young man, done anything to entitle you to respect? Have you any excellent quality to recommend you? Or have you any accomplishment to render your company agreeable? Are you able to make any return for the civilities of social life? If society recognise you, how can you recompense society?

You ask what would society have of you? Society is not exacting as to what it accepts, but it will have something. Can you act in a charade? Can you dance? Can you tell a story? Have you travelled, and have you a pleasant faculty of relating your adventures? Are you educated, and able to impart valuable ideas and general information? Have you vivacity in conversation? Can you sing? Can you play chess? Are you a good bean, and are you willing to make yourself useful to the ladies? Are you a straightforward, manly fellow, with whose healthful and uncorrupted nature it is good for society to come into contact? Do you possess any social quality that is of use or ornament to society? If so, it will soon be recognised, if you determine to exert it. But while you do nothing, and wait for society to find out what a desirable ornament you are, depend upon it your turn will never come.

Young men are apt to get into a morbid state of mind which unfits them for social intercourse. They become devoted to business with so much exclusiveness, that they have neither time nor inclination for anything else. They go to an evening party as if they were going to jail, and conduct themselves as solemnly as if they were at a funeral. This disposition is thoroughly morbid, and to be overcome by going where you are invited, at any sacrifice of feeling. Do not shrink from anything but bad morals. Men who affect your unhealthy mind with antipathy will prove themselves very frequently to be your best friends and most delightful companions. Because a man seems uncongenial to you, who are squeamish or foolish, you have no right to shun him. We become charitable by knowing men. There is an infinite variety in human character, and for you to say that you do not love and will not associate with a man because he is unlike you, is not only foolish but wrong. You are to remember, that in the precise manner and degree in which a man differs from you, do you differ from him; and that from his stand-point you are naturally as repulsive to him as he, from his stand-point is to you. Therefore meet every man honestly.

You will find many a jewel under an uncouth exterior.

Remember, also, that you have no influence unless you are social. A strictly exclusive man is as devoid of influence as an ice-peak is of verdure. The retribution which results to the man who isolates himself from society is as terrible as it is inevitable. The pride which sits alone and will do nothing for society, will find that society will do nothing for it—that in its chosen isolation it may remain till it drops, unwept, into the grave.

FRENCH LESSONS;

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH.

CHAPTER XXVI.

"I SUPPOSE, Robert," said George, "that you can now tell me in French the names of almost all the fruits in season and out of season."

"Oh, yes," answered the pupil.

"But unluckily," rejoined the instructor, "man, in our day, requires something more substantial than fruit for his daily fare, and you may as well add some good eatables to your vocabulary; begin with bread."

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.
Bread	Du pain
Household bread	Du pain de ménage
New bread	Du pain tendre
Stale bread	Du pain rassis
Broth	Un bouillon
Gravy soup	Un consommé
Vermicelli soup	Un potage au vermicelle
Rice soup	Un potage au riz purée
Roast meat	Du rôti
A leg of mutton	Un gigot de mouton
Roast beef	Un rosbif
A plain mutton chop	Une cotelette au naturel
A veal fricandeau with asparagus	Un fricandeau aux pointes d'asperges
A fricandeau with mushrooms	Un fricandeau aux champignons
Fried brains	Une cervelle frite
Tongue with peas	Une langue aux pois
Sweetbreads and gravy	Un ris de veau au jus
Sweetbreads and endive	Un ris de veau à la chicorée
Calves' liver roasted	Un foie de veau rôti

"I am sure I should like some of those dishes very much," remarked Robert. "The very names of them look quite tempting."

"I have not directed you to write down these names merely as a temptation," said George, "but to preserve you from a mortification I have suffered myself; viz., that of being quite ashamed and puzzled at an hotel or a 'restaurateur's,' when requested to order my dinner. Of course, being in France I wanted to have something in the French style, but I did not know the name of anything."

"I hope you remarked the idiomatic manner of translating 'with such a thing;' viz., 'A tongue with peas,' 'Une langue aux.' Mind when you require with in this sense, that you do not translate it by avec. Another caution I must give you, is never to translate 'A leg of mutton,' by 'Jambe de mouton.' This would be quite absurd; always say 'Un gigot,' and do not confound foie, liver, with foie, faith; or fois, time. The first is masculine, the second and third feminine.

"The right position of the adjective forms the subject of to-day's exercise. The French frequently place the adjective after the noun (a thing seldom done in English). In French it is difficult to give absolute rules about the place of the adjective, for custom often decides the question; but there is one thing that it is very important for learners to know, viz., that accordingly as the adjective is placed before or after the noun, the meaning sometimes changes.

"Adjectives that are derived from participles are always placed after the noun, so are all adjectives expressing colour, taste, flavour, and sound. A similar position is given to adjectives expressing the point of view in which we consider things or persons, those which express the state and situation of things, and those designating countries.

"With regard to adjectives derived from present participles, some follow the noun, while others have quite as correct a position when placed before it.

"Adjectives of one syllable are generally placed before the noun, but you must recollect what I told you about the position of the adjectives altering the sense. This fact is so very important that in the next lesson I shall make you write out a list of those adjectives that determine the sense according to the place they occupy.

"At present I have not much more to say about the adjective, except to point out to you that in passionate and poetical language, some of those adjectives that would otherwise follow the noun are placed before it. As to numerical adjectives, they also are generally put before the noun, but they come after it when used to designate one person among others of the same name. When used to designate one particular thing among others of the same kind, the adjective may be placed either before or after it.

EXERCISE.

PLACE OF THE ADJECTIVE.

1. The first man, having disobeyed God, was banished from the earthly paradise. 2. Charles the First and Louis the Sixteenth perished on the scaffold, the victims of the madness of the people. 3. Louis the Fourteenth and Charles the Twelfth were the two greatest monarchs of their age. 4. Will you lend me ten pounds? I will pay you to-morrow the ten pounds which you lent me yesterday. 5. These ladies have been my first love. 6. She is a handsome and well-bred woman, and her husband is an amiable, well-behaved man. 7. I placed my goods in a great open basket. 8. He is a big, fat man. She is a handsome and good woman. He is a little, old man. 9. Your sister is a pretty, well-bred, rich, amiable, and generous woman. 10. Have you seen this tall, fat, ugly, vulgar-looking man, who passes every day by our house? 11. In passing over Russia, after the campaign of Napoleon, we saw nothing but ruined villages, burnt cities, and demolished ramparts.

LE CORRIE.

1. Le premier homme, ayant désobéi à Dieu, fut chassé du paradis terrestre. 2. Charles Premier et Louis Seize périrent sur l'échafaud, victimes de la fureur du peuple. 3. Louis Quatorze et Charles Deux furent les deux plus grands rois de leur siècle. 4. Voulez-vous me prêter dix livres? Je vous prêterai demain les dix livres que vous m'avez prêtés hier. 5. Ces dames ont été mes premières amours. 6. C'est une femme belle et distinguée, et son mari est un homme aimable et poli. 7. Je placai mes marchandises dans un grand panier ouvert. 8. C'est un homme gros et gras (or C'est un gros homme gras). C'est une belle et bonne femme (or C'est une femme belle et belle). C'est un petit homme vieux (or C'est un homme petit et vieux). 9. Votre sœur est une jolie femme, bien née, riche, aimable, et généreuse. 10. Avez-vous vu cet homme, grand, gras, laid, et commun, qui passe tous les jours devant la maison? 11. En traversant la Russie, après la campagne de Napoléon, nous ne vîmes que des villages ruinés, des villes brûlées, et des ramparts démolis. "Now, Robert," observed George, "let us see how the travellers succeed in lodging hunting."

CONTINUATION OF LE VOYAGE À PARIS.

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.
Oh, here are furnished apartments to let. We will go in.	Ah, il y a ici des appartements à louer.* Entrons.
Sir, you have apartments to let.	Monsieur, vous avez des appartements à louer.
Yes, sir. I have some on the first floor, and some on the second. Which do you require?	Oui, monsieur, j'en ai au premier et au second. Lesquels desirez-vous?
I do not know yet. In that case, see them both. The staircase is rather steep. Is it lighted at night?	Je ne sais pas encore. Dans ce cas, voyez les deux. L'escalier est un peu rapide. Est-il éclairé le soir?
Yes, sir. Are there cupboards in each room?	Oui, monsieur. Y a-t-il des placards dans chaque pièce?
There are cupboards everywhere.	Il y en a partout.
I like these apartments on the second floor, but there is not air enough. The ceiling is not sufficiently lofty.	J'aime beaucoup ces appartements au second, mais il n'y a pas assez d'air. Le plafond n'est pas assez élevé.
It is more lofty on the first floor.	Il est plus élevé au premier.
Let us see the apartments on the first floor.	Voyons les appartements au premier.
It is more pleasant here. You see the furniture is all mahogany, and the curtains and beds are very clean.	C'est mieux ici. Vous voyez que les meubles sont en bois d'acajou, et que les rideaux et les lits sont très propres.
You will furnish us with china, linen, and plate.	Vous nous fournirez la vaisselle, le linge, et l'argenterie.
May do you intend to dine at home?	Est-ce que ces messieurs dîneront chez eux?

* Des appartements à louer means in English "apartments to let;" but the French sometimes use the words un appartement for a set of apartments.

† Chambre, pièce.—Pièce, in this sense, represents "room."

‡ au second.—Observe that, although in English it is necessary to say, on the first floor—on the second floor, in French you may omit the word étage, "floor," and merely say, au premier—au second.

Sometimes. Observe, gentlemen; that this is a very fine part of the town. Your apartments are newly fitted up, and they are well aired, also the other lodgers are all respectable.

Quelquefois. Remarquez, messieurs, que c'est ici un très beau quartier de la ville. Vos appartements sont fraîchement décorés, et bien aérés, et la maison est très bien habitée.

OF NASAL SYLLABLES.

Nasal syllables are those which are formed by the union of the vowels, a, e, i, o, u, and the simple sounds ai, ei, eo, eu, with the consonants m, n.

The combinations of these ten simple sounds with m and n produce four new simple sounds, called nasals, represented as follows: an, in, on, un.

These sounds are called nasals, because the air which produces them, after having, by aspiration, reached the nose, descends from it into the mouth; and by this double operation gives to the voice a peculiar tone, thus called on account of its origin.

The nasal sounds, instead of being an imperfection in the French language, add to its harmony, by introducing a variety in its expression which does not exist in other languages.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON XXV

616. What is the order of the colours in the rainbow?—The red is uppermost and the violet undermost.

617. We often see a second and fainter bow higher than the first—how is this formed?—By rays that enter the drops at the lower part, experience two reflections at the back part of the drops, pass out at the upper part, and proceed on to the eye.

618. Why is this bow fainter than the other?—Because the light suffers two reflections, instead of one, and considerable light is lost in the act of reflection.

619. Do two persons see the same rainbow?—They do not; they see the same colours, but these proceed from different drops.

620.—When is the rainbow usually seen?—In the afternoon, when the sun shines at the same time that it is raining to the east of us. It is also sometimes seen in the west, on a showery morning.

621. Is it ever seen under any other circumstances?—We often see cataracts that send up clouds of spray, spanned by its beautiful arch; and, in a bright day, its brilliant colours lend a new beauty and grace to fountains sparkling in the light of the sun.

COLOURS OF BODIES.

622. Why is one object, as a wafer, red; another, as a lemon, yellow; another, green, &c.?—Because each reflects to the eye the light of its own colour.

623. The colour is not, then, any quality necessarily belonging to the substance?—It is not; for the colours of flowers, trees, and other objects, are only seen when light from the sun, or some other source, falls on them. Besides, the same substance has not always the same colour.

624. Explain by an example.—Phosphorus, for example, is of a pale yellow colour, but, if melted and cooled suddenly, it becomes perfectly black.

625. Give another example.—Charcoal is black and opaque, but the sparkling diamond, which is the same substance in another form, is as clear and transparent as glass.

626. To what, then, is all the beautiful variety of colours in nature owing?—To different arrangements of the particles of bodies. It is by this simple expedient that the beneficent Creator has so clothed the earth with beauty, and made it a delight to the eye.

627. Transparent gems, different varieties of glass, and many liquids are variously coloured—to what do they owe their colour?—Principally to coloured light transmitted through them. They extinguish certain colours, and allow others to pass through the eye.

628. Is the red light that comes from a red object, or the yellow light that comes from a yellow object, a pure unmixed colour?—It is a mixture of that colour with more or less of each of the other colours.

629. What simple proof have we of this?—It is observed that a coloured object always appears of the colour, whatever it may be, of the light that is thrown upon it.

630. We say that charcoal is black—is black a positive colour?—Perfect blackness is the absence of all colour and all light. An object is said to be black when it reflects a feeble light to us. Black is no more a colour than silence is sound.

§ Très bien habitée, a free, idiomatic way of stating that the lodgers are respectable.

631. Why do certain objects, paper, for instance, appear white?—Because they reflect the different colours in about the proportion in which they are combined in white light.

ELECTRICITY.

EXCITATION AND CHARACTERISTIC EFFECTS OF ELECTRICITY.

632. If a thick glass tube be taken in the hand, rubbed briskly with a dry woollen cloth, or a silk handkerchief, and then brought near to light substances, as small pieces of paper, small balls of elder pith, &c., lying on a table, what will be observed?—The little pieces of paper, or pith balls, will fly into contact with the glass tube, and then dart off again. They will continue to fly up and down for some time.

633. How does the glass tube produce these effects?—It at first attracts these light bodies into contact with it, and then repels them away from it.

634. Will any other substance, besides glass, when held in the hand and rubbed, attract light bodies?—Sealing wax, and many other substances, when rubbed, will act on light bodies just as glass does.

635. What is this peculiar state into which the surface of the glass is brought, by rubbing, called?—The state of Electrical Excitement; the glass is said to be electrically excited, or electricified.

636. What is supposed to be the nature of this excitement?—The friction, from rubbing, is supposed to disengage on the surface an exceedingly thin and subtle fluid, which is called electricity.

637. Is friction the only mode of developing electricity?—The electric fluid may be disengaged by the simple pressure of one surface against another, also by heat, and chemical action. Every cause that produces any agitation among the particles of bodies, disturbs the electrical equilibrium, and sets free some of the electricity that is intimately associated with these particles.

638. Suppose an excited glass tube, or stick of sealing wax, were to be drawn through the hand, closed tightly upon it, what would be the result?—Its electrical excitement would be destroyed.

639. How is this explained?—The electric fluid passes off into the arm, and descends through the body into the floor; from thence it flows off into the ground.

640. Under this idea, what is the human body said to be?—A good conductor of electricity.

641. If the excited glass tube, or sealing wax, be touched, at one point only, with the knuckle, will the electric fluid be drawn off from all points of the surface?—It will not; only from the spot that is touched.

642. What may we infer from this?—That the electric fluid does not flow freely from one particle of glass, or sealing wax, to another.

643. What are such substances that obstruct the passage of electricity called?—Non-conductors of electricity. Some substances are better non-conductors, that is, offer more resistance to the flow of electricity than others.

644. Can a brass or iron rod be excited by holding it in the hand and rubbing it, as a glass tube can be?—It cannot; but a metallic rod can be feebly excited, if it is provided with a non-conducting handle of glass by which it is held.

645. How are these facts explained?—The rod is a good conductor of electricity; if the hand touches it, the electricity flows off into the ground as fast as it is disengaged; when a glass handle is used, a non-conductor is interposed between the rod and the hand.

OLD AGE.

No longer does this weary heart
Throb to each fancy new;
Nor can fresh scenes to me impart
The bliss they used to do.
But like a well-spring all alone
Upon some desert drear,
My heart has cold and careless grown
To every joy and fear.

The hours of childish glee are gone,
Like bubbles in the air;
And love on flighty wings has flown
To the regions of despair.
Nay, does the sunny stream of joy
Within my bosom flow;
But like some long-neglected toy,
I'd smile to see it now.

'Tis ever thus we learn to lose
The friendships we have made;
For can we life to flowers intrust
That long have been decayed?
No! early love is but the dream
Of childhood's calm repose,
Which fades like any other beam
As twilight darker grows.

GUILTY; OR, NOT GUILTY?

On the 12th of May, 1830, Jean Charles Bouillon was placed at the bar of the Seine Court of Assize charged with poisoning his second and third wives, and his son, an infant. He is described in the records of that court as being fifty-eight years of age, of small stature, but well made, and having a very intelligent countenance. He was born at Rheims. His parents got him admitted into the school at Brienne, where he had Napoleon for a schoolfellow. He quitted this school in 1790, and entered the army as a volunteer. After the battle of Jemappes he was made a lieutenant, and shortly afterwards he was attached to the army of the west as a commissary, in which quality he resided at Nantes. In the year 1797 he belonged to the army of Italy in the same capacity. In the fulfilment of his duties he was called upon to place seals upon the monts-de-piété (pawnbrokers) at Verona and Padua. He was afterwards accused of having appropriated some valuable articles contained therein to his own purposes. A council of war met to make inquiries into the matter, and he was sentenced by it to five years in irons. The judgment was annulled for informality, and a second inquiry took place, when he was acquitted. The president of the council, however, in his report made some severe reflections on Bouillon's conduct, which prevented his being restored to his former situation, although he continued to receive a pension until 1813.

In 1799 Bouillon returned to France, and was married to a lady belonging to a most respectable family; the union turned out unhappily, and they were divorced; the child, a boy, being left in the care of the mother, who, on its attaining the age of seven years, was to give it up to its father, who, however, took care never to claim it.

From the time of his divorce down to about 1823, he led a rather dissipated life; his pecuniary difficulties were considerable, and though he resorted to some rather equivocal methods of obtaining money, his circumstances were not improved thereby. In the last-mentioned year he became acquainted with an exchange-broker, named Mirecourt, and his sister. The latter was possessed of some property, and Bouillon proposed to marry her; and after some little difficulties had been overcome they were married. Soon afterwards Mirecourt's affairs went wrong, his sister's property being partly swept away in his ruin.

On the 25th of August, 1824, Bouillon and his wife left Paris for Noyent-sur-Seine. On arriving there, they went to the house of a M. Frugé, who, as he had received no notice of their coming, was away from home, and they were, therefore, under the necessity of waiting two hours in the street. The same evening Madame Bouillon was seized with violent pains in her stomach, which her husband attributed to her waiting so long in the cold. The following day she seemed very well until the evening, when the pains returned with greater violence, and continued throughout the night. The next morning Madame Frugé urged Bouillon to send for a doctor, but he refused, and after making some tea for his wife, which he gave her himself, he started for a place five leagues distant. The condition of Madame Bouillon was at that time alarming; from the first moment of her seizure she had asserted she was poisoned, and expressed her opinion that it was caused by the soup she had taken on her way from Paris having been prepared in a dirty copper vessel. She continued to grow worse until the 30th, when she died. From the appearance of the body, no one who saw her doubted that she had been poisoned. Bouillon alone refused to believe it. The rumour of the affair having reached the authorities, the body was exhumed and examined, but though there were extraordinary appearances which induced them to express an opinion that she had been poisoned, yet no poisonous substance was discovered.

The prisoner affected the deepest grief at the loss of his wife; nevertheless, in a few months afterwards he made several applications with a view to marrying again, which were unsuccessful. On the 11th July, 1826, he married a Mdlle. Despret, against the wish of her friends. She appears to have been a person of a most excitable disposition, highly imaginative; so much so, indeed, that some of her relatives had, at times, doubts of her sanity. She was for some time a novice in the house of the *Dames Hospitalières of St. Thomas, and obeyed the rules with the most perfect resignation; nevertheless, she appeared to have some repugnance to taking the veil, and eventually, as stated above, married Bouillon.

In March, 1827, she gave birth to a son. It was a premature birth, but the child was well-shaped and strong; yet up to the month of May it was subject to continual attacks of vomiting, attended with convulsions. The doctor directed that it should be sent into the country to nurse, which was accordingly done, and it recovered its health. On being returned to its mother, the attacks began afresh; and on the 5th of December of the same year it died—in the opinion of the doctor, of poison. A post mortem examination was proposed, but objected to by the prisoner on the ground that the child having once vomited two pins, some more might be found, which would only add to the grief of his wife. Singularly enough, when the examination, ordered by the Court, of the body took place, two pins were found in it—the one in the right hip, the other between the third and fourth ribs—the points of both being directed towards the exterior of the body.

The motive for the crime, as suggested by the Public Prosecutor, was the desire on the part of Bouillon to relieve himself of the burden of its maintenance; also, that having determined to sacrifice his wife, it became doubly necessary to sacrifice the child, inasmuch as its continued existence, after its mother's death, would have been a bar to his getting possession of a sum of 11,000 or 12,000 francs.

No sooner had the child died than the mother was attacked in a similar manner, which gave rise in the doctor's mind to the gravest suspicions. On one occasion, Bouillon, at the moment he was going out, took her a basin of tisane, which she declined to drink; he insisted, and she therefore swallowed it, and a quarter of an hour afterwards she was seized with violent vomiting, attended with extreme acidity and thirst. For three weeks after she was subjected to these attacks, which were always sudden, and generally came on after taking some prepared drink. The doctor, convinced that she was being poisoned, gave directions that the substances thrown up from the stomach should be preserved; but these directions were always eluded. On the morning of the 4th of May, Bouillon passed a short time by the bed-side of his wife, and afterwards left her to go to Versailles. Directly he had left she sent for Dr. Riquet, to whom she, with great agitation, stated that she had something frightful to communicate—that on the morning of the 4th of May her husband brought her a cup of tisane; that while she was in the act of kissing the hand which offered it to her, she saw him drop something from the other into the cup; that she told her husband to put it on the table, and she would drink it presently; that as soon as he had gone out, she examined the cup, and found therein something white, which she put into the saucer; that the following morning her husband came into the room, and seeing her quiet, he asked her, with a frightened air, what she had done with the tisane; to which she replied that she had thrown it out of window; and finally, she added that before he departed for Versailles she saw him open his writing-desk, and take from thence a small packet wrapped in white paper, which he put into his pocket.

On finishing her recital, Madame Bouillon handed to Dr. Riquet a paper, containing the substance which she had taken from the cup, and which, on being analysed, proved to be arsenic; and, at the same time, adjured him to observe the most profound secrecy with respect to what she had related to him. By the advice of Dr. Riquet she left her husband's house in his absence, and retired to a private asylum for sick people. The doctor was in an unpleasant predicament. On the one hand, he feared that if he were silent, she might be poisoned; and, on the other, it was an offence against the laws for a medical man to divulge any circumstance communicated to him professionally. In this emergency he related to another doctor what had occurred. But nothing was decided upon then. Some days afterwards Madame Bouillon called upon him, and showed him a letter, which she said she had written at her husband's dictation, and which it was her intention to send to him. In this letter she retracted all that she had previously stated, and, in answer to the remonstrances of the doctor, she told him that her husband had agreed to make her an allowance, and that he himself would go abroad. Dr. Riquet eventually decided on giving information to the authorities, who ordered Bouillon to be apprehended and put on his trial. After all the above facts had been deposed to in court, it was decided that Madame Bouillon should be allowed to make a statement, which she accordingly did, to the following effect. She affirmed, in the most earnest manner, that her husband was entirely innocent; that she had no recollection whatever of having made the statements imputed to her; that, if she did make them, she must have been labouring under mental aberration at the time; and reproached herself bitterly with having said anything to cause her husband so much suffering. She asserted that, so far from herself and her husband having had disputes, their establishment was a "model" one. In the middle of her examination the court suspended its sitting for a few minutes, in order that she might get some refreshment; and, on her return into court, she stepped up to the dock, and held out her hand to the prisoner, who took it eagerly. This action on the part of Madame Bouillon excited great emotion in the court, which, throughout the trial, was crowded to suffocation. On her examination being resumed, she persisted in saying that all she had stated to the prejudice of her husband was false, and that she was quite unconscious of having made such statements. Several times during her examination the prisoner was deeply affected by the affectionate manner in which she spoke of him.

After hearing speeches from the counsel for the prisoner and from the public prosecutor, the jury retired, and, after deliberating an hour, returned into court with a verdict of "Not guilty."

JOHN BRIGHT.

TWENTY years ago the great question which agitated the public was that of free trade. A society was formed to repeal the statutes which closed our ports against foreign corn, and prominent amongst the champions of the Anti-Corn Law League was John Bright, of Rochdale. He was a young man, having at his command an imposing style of oratory; his mind was well stored with facts and figures, and his speeches were of that plain and straightforward character which gains the attention and enlists the sympathy of a multitude. It was thus as an anti-corn law advocate that John Bright first became known in the political world. Like Cobden, he was from the manufacturing districts, and possessed, in a large degree, that clear insight into a question, and that indomitable energy as to its solution, which characterise most Manchester men. When the League visited London, and began its system of "Tours" into the agricultural districts, he became closely identified with all the proceedings of that body. His speeches from the platform of Drury Lane brought down the house. They were printed and circulated all over the kingdom. His celebrity was established. Wherever he went his fame went before him. The farmers and artisans who met to hear the orator were delighted by his plain statements and his common sense, at the same time that his earnest and impassioned manner gave double weight to all his facts and figures.

In April, 1843, he contested the representation of the city of Durham, and, failing, tried again in the July following, and was returned. He brought with him into the House a high reputation, and though it was confidently predicted that, being a platform man, he would make no figure in the Commons, his good sense soon enabled him to catch the key-note of the House, and to obtain a hearing within doors, as he had done without. In 1847 he was returned for Manchester, and represented that city for ten years. His opinions on the war with China—his consequent ejection from his seat, and his subsequent return to Parliament—the active share which he took in the defeat of the Palmerston ministry, and the support which he has accorded to their successors—have taken place too recently to require any special notice here. When John Bright was first returned for Durham he professed to throw aside altogether party considerations, to vote for measures and not for men, and to support those plans for popular progress and national advancement which might be brought forward by Whig, Radical, or Tory. This line of policy may possibly have originated those eccentric movements which have called forth so much animadversion.

John Bright may fairly be taken as an able exponent of the doctrines of that class of politicians known as the Manchester School. He is thoroughly identified with that party; the principles which he enunciates are the principles which they hold.

He tells the working men that the mass of the people have no political power whatever in the People's House—that they are altogether excluded, and that even in the limited sense in which they may be said to be represented, parliamentary reform is essential, and vote by ballot necessary, to guard against the undue influence which is exerted over the electors. At the same time that the people are unrepresented, they are so mixed up with the confusion of European politics, that they cannot escape from it, and are heavily saddled with the debts of past generations, and so thoroughly involved in European complications, that at any time the taxation, which is now felt so severely, may be increased, and the demand for labour destroyed. He tells the people that they are recklessly plunged into war—that commerce is impeded, trade impoverished, and industry hampered by political squabbles, which cannot, by any possibility, be of moment to the people, who suffer from the disasters they entail upon them. He tells them that their money is voted away in reckless expenditure, on the marshalling of armies and equipment of fleets, which are unnecessary, and worse than useless. He shows them that they must never look for a reduction of taxation while this system continues. "Not five years ago," he says, "we were rejoicing in peace, and there was a growing prosperity evident in every part of the country. Since that time 40,000 English lives have been sacrificed, and £100,000,000 spent in one short war. It was the blood of the people that was shed in that contest, and the day's labour and day's wages of the people were charged with the costs." In the train of war come taxes, want of employment, diminished wages. All these evils fall on the people. No one is the gainer but the military class. The whole question resolves itself into one of peace or war. The blessings of peace are felt by the majority; the beneficial results of war—if there be any—are only felt by the few. Peace furnishes opportunity for social and intellectual progress, but war retards every effort at advancement. The policy which unites the nations of the world together is not that which is produced by armies and armaments, but by familiar intercourse, intimate commercial relationship, the union which exists in trade between the buyer and the seller, and which renders a misunderstanding inimical to the interests of both.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

JOHN BRIGHT, ESQ., M.P.

Mr. Bright tells us we have been spending too much. That there is a contest between the rich and the poor, and that the poor go to the wall. We have endeavoured, he says, to make this heavy taxation easily borne. But the weight and burden of it is thrown on the working classes. He argues that the origin of this taxation lies in our foreign policy. The combative spirit has been excited, and managed so as to support aggressive warfare. While the complaint of heavy taxes is being made, millions of money are voted on navy estimates. We are lavish in our expenditure for warlike purposes, while our land teems with paupers. There is no fleet, he says, except that of France, which approaches the fleet of England, and France is our present ally. If the French minister were asked why his navy estimates were so large, he would say he was building large ships, which were of no use, because England was doing the same; that France must have a great navy because England has a great navy. Therefore, Mr. Bright argues that European nations are simply emulating one another in their naval and military strength, and recklessly burdening and impoverishing the toiling millions of the land.

Arrayed against Mr. Bright are those who contend that the policy of the so-called Manchester school would expose the country to foreign enemies, and that we should sink from the high position we have occupied to a third or fourth-rate power, and instead of taking the lead in the affairs of Europe, should be crippled in our trade and commerce by nations of superior strength. All this outcry about non-representation, exorbitant expenditure, and excessive taxation, is pronounced to be the mere claptrap of the demagogue, seeking to advance the interests of his own party by getting up a popular grievance. His line of argument is said to be fallacious, and the policy which he proposes is declared to be destructive of our national greatness. It is maintained that the increase of our national defences is peremptorily demanded in order to preserve the balance of power, and that the peace policy is neither judicious nor practicable, and is, in fact, calculated to defeat its own purpose.

At the same time, it is generally acknowledged that Mr. Bright heartily sympathises with every effort for the social and intellectual advancement of the people. Those who have no faith in his politics respect the indomitable energy of his character. His speeches on India exhibited statesmanlike ability, and showed an intimate acquaintance with the condition and prospects of our Indian empire. For the abolition of the paper duty he has strenuously laboured, regarding that impost not only as a tax on knowledge, but as a tax on industry and enterprise. He has recently become Vice-President—his friend Mr. Milner Gibson being President—of the Association for the Abolition of the Paper Duty, and has in this, as in other matters, advocated the principles of popular progress and social reform.

In whatever light we may regard his politics, however much we may question the plans which he suggests, but one opinion can be entertained of his ability and zeal. In or out of the House, there is much to admire in the clear intellect, impressive eloquence, and straightforward manliness of John Bright.

IMPERIAL HEROISM.

PICTURES FROM HISTORY.

PRUSSIA AND AUSTRIA; OR, TRUE HEROISM.

NEARLY six hundred years ago, after a terrible period of massacre, robbery, and wrong, known in German history as the great interregnum—Count Rodolph of Hapsburgh, a nobleman of small wealth, but of good repute for wisdom and valour, was chosen emperor. From that time his family became more and more rich and influential, until at last the imperial crown was absolutely hereditary among them. Through all the most trying periods of the German history the Austrian house of Hapsburgh maintained its supremacy and influence; but in the middle of the last century the empire had fallen on evil days.

There had been a great war, called, from the time it lasted, the "Thirty Years' War." The effect of this war had been to breed disunion between the emperor and the hereditary princes of Germany, and the latter accordingly endeavoured to render themselves as far as possible independent of the former; and chief among those who thus strove was the house of Brandenburg, in the electorate of Prussia.

In the beginning of the eighteenth century Prussia was elevated to the dignity of a separate monarchy. The new kingdom was looked at with some contempt by the powers of Europe as a mushroom monarchy, which would never have any great influence in European history. But one of the characteristics of mushrooms is rapid growth, and certainly the comparison was borne out in this particular, for the Prussian state rose rapidly; and after it had existed as a kingdom during only forty years, the mushroom monarchy was audacious enough to measure itself in combat with Austria,—and this is how it was enabled to do so:—

In the year 1740 the Emperor Charles VI. died, leaving behind him an only daughter, famous in history as the Empress Maria Theresa. A great empire was thus confided to the hands of a young maiden, surrounded indeed by able and zealous counsellors, but utterly inexperienced in the art of government. At this momentous crisis there succeeded to the throne of Prussia a king who, whatever may have been his faults, was at least entitled to praise for the energy, ability, and statesmanship he displayed during a long life of unwearied exertion—a life at whose commencement Prussia was a fourth-class, while ere it closed she became a first-class power. This man was Frederick William the Second, commonly called Frederick the Great.

Frederick's father, a tyrannical despot, but a man not destitute of ability, had by unwearied exertion trained an army in Prussia, to such a state of discipline and efficiency, that it became far more formidable than its numbers would have seemed to indicate. With this army to back him, Frederick advanced his claim, before the Austrian court, to certain territories which had, it was said, been made over to his ancestors by a treaty, whose stipulations had been left unfulfilled. The Austrian court protested and remonstrated, but in vain, and a short outbreak of hostilities showed the power of Frederick and the efficiency of his troops in such alarming colours, that submission, or at least conciliation, was considered by the Imperial government the best policy to be adopted under the circumstances, and the young king of Prussia obtained from his embarrassed adversaries more favourable terms than their sense of justice alone would have induced them to grant. But to put off the Prussian king with half concessions and fair promises, was like the policy pursued by Ethelred the Unready, when he bought the Danes over with gold. Frederick had tasted the sweets of power, and for seventeen years he remembered its flavour, until, in 1756, a new and most memorable contest, the famous Seven Years' War, began. In the meantime, Maria Theresa had married Francis of Lorraine, who, in 1748, was acknowledged Emperor of Germany; a man of very moderate talent, but of an amiable and benevolent disposition, who for many years counteracted by his advice, as far as possible, the misery and devastation brought upon the empire by the obstinacy of Maria Theresa, as much as by the ambition of Frederick. Maria Theresa's whole aim was to render Austria great in power among the nations; Francis looked more to the domestic well-being of the people at home. Her striving was to make her people great and feared; his endeavour, to make them happy.

From 1656 to 1662 the war raged uninterruptedly between the two great German powers. The balance of material strength was greatly in favour of the empress, but there was not a general in all her armies who could cope with Frederick, or with the brilliant array of military talent and genius he had concentrated round him. His generals Ziethen, "the King of the Hussars," as his soldiers dubbed him; Schwerin, who fell at the battle of Prague; and Field-marshal Keith, were in themselves a host; and the system of tactics adopted by Frederick, similar in many respects to that so successfully pursued by Napoleon Bonaparte, was admirably calculated to dupe and mislead the pedantic Austrians, who did everything by measure and by rule, and fancied that their foes must necessarily act on the same plan.

But Frederick cared little for prescription, precedent, or rule. To beat the Austrians was his object; and to accomplish this object, he fought, not according to books of military science, but according to the exigencies of the moment, whether his movements had precedents in books of military science or not. His rapid marches and masterly retreats—wonderful combinations of manoeuvres which utterly bewildered the Austrians—desperate defences of seemingly untenable posts, and unexpected measures of every kind, were the weapons with which he baffled the enemy's superior force. Sorely tried in several campaigns, with half his army, perhaps, sacrificed in a single battle, as in the disastrous fight at Kollin, Frederick was never conquered, for each new reverse seemed to rouse him to fresh vigour; and before the contest ended he had wrung reluctant admiration and applause from his enemies themselves.

The end of the Seven Years' War, with all its horrors of bloodshed, devastation, and robbery, forms a mournful commentary on such contests in general. Each party was to keep what they already possessed: "as you were," was the word given to the two armies who for seven years had been ruthlessly massacring each other. The contending parties were to keep possession of the territories they already had, and the glory they had acquired during the struggle.

But the countries in which the fierce war had been carried on—the fields across whose smiling surface the demon of war had flown—it was long before they could be again "as they were." Villages had been depopulated and left to utter decay, the seed-corn had been eaten by the peasants in the rage of hunger, and thousands of acres lay untilled; the conscription had drained Prussia and Austria, year by year, of men, until families perished by hundreds, for want of fathers and protectors to watch over them in the cruel days of oppression and strife; women and even children followed the plough over the neglected districts, and not unfrequently were seen dragging it, the horses and oxen having been consumed as food. In Prussia, at least a sixth part of the population had perished; and even from the eyes of the iron-hearted Frederick there fell some bitter drops, as he made his first progress through his ravaged country, after the peace signed at Hubertsburgh.

And what was the Emperor Francis doing while his wife and Frederick were thus consuming their forces and their wealth in long and profitless strife? Ah, his was a nobler aspiration. His wishes were for a higher fame than the battle-field could give: to bind up the broken heart, to seek out poverty in its retreat, and to bring the balm of consolation into the dwellings of the aged and afflicted was the occupation of the good emperor; and the deep affection with which the peasantry still speak of him at the present day—the eagerness with which they point to little memorials of the sayings and doings of their benefactor are proofs of the extent to which the Emperor Francis worked and strove to gain his subjects' good-will.

Among the stories they tell of him, with pride and pleasure, is the following:—A winter more than ordinarily severe spread misery and destitution among the poor of Vienna. Some, who had not a roof to shelter them, crept beneath the shadow of church-walls and arches, and there crouched down to die; but Francis had not forgotten them: every day he went himself to seek out and help them, or, when business kept him at home, he dispatched agents on whom he could rely.

The cold ceased; but then the Danube, swollen by the winter snows, came rushing over its banks towards the suburbs. At its approach the inhabitants fled; but in one of the low-lying quarters the river cut off their retreat, and several families were seen clinging to the roofs of houses, awaiting the doom that threatened to overwhelm them, as the river, laden with great blocks of floating ice, rose higher and higher. No one would put out a boat, for the river was implacable and seemed to roar for its victims. At last the Emperor, weary of remonstrating and persuading, himself leaped into a wherry and pushed out into the midst of the stream.

The effect was electric—they could not let their good emperor perish, and a dozen boats were soon following the fragile bark in which Francis was forcing his way against wind and wave. The poor sufferers were saved, and more than fifty grateful hearts, rescued by his heroism from impending death, put up prayers that night for the good Emperor Francis.

CHAPTER CVIII.

Love's image upon earth without his wings.

BYRON.

We left Ellen St. Ange intensely interested in Lady Mildmay's story, which we were compelled to break off at the most interesting point. At Ellen's earnest entreaty, Lady Mildmay "hastened"—as old Horace advised all who tell a tale to do—"to a close."

"There could be no use in staying at the station. I sent Gossipie to seek for my carriage and servants, and when she returned, having found them in readiness, I placed the little sleeping beauty in her arms, and we drove to my town residence in St. James's-square."

"The little foundling thus palmed off upon me in a manner so unjustifiable in itself, yet so providential for my widowed heart and grief-absorbed spirit, was the beautiful Perdita, who is the comfort, the pride, and the delight of my life, and of whose real birth and parentage I am to this hour as ignorant as yourself."

"What a very interesting and romantic adventure!" said Ellen. "But what did the basket and the bag contain?"

"The bag contained a few articles of apparel for the child, all of the most elegant and costly description; and the basket was full of toys and other nursery matters. The child's clothes were all marked 'P.M.' I have, therefore, called it Perdita Merry. And as I had, in early youth, a young schoolfellow named Vernon, who married a Captain Merry, and died abroad, I have chosen to allow the few (Gossipie of course excepted) to believe that Perdita is a child left by that early friend, and adopted by me."

"And have you never heard a word of the mother?"

"Never: but every year a hundred-pound note comes by post, on the anniversary of the day Perdita was left with me, and written on the back are the words 'For P.M.'"

Lady Mildmay ceased—Ellen sank into a reverie. This strange romantic tale connected with the lovely girl she was grown quite fond of, and the lady who interested her so much, engrossed her thoughts. At length she said, "What is your own solution of this mystery, Lady Mildmay?"

Lady Mildmay's cheek grew crimson.

"You do not think Perdita a child of shame!" said Ellen.

"No, but I fear her beautiful mother was a daughter of sin."

"How so?"

"I have pondered so much on all the details of this curious affair," said Lady Mildmay, "that I have arrived at a conclusion which I think must be very near the truth, and probably the only reason why I have not been able to ascertain the facts is, that at the time of my adopting Perdita, which, had I not done, she must have gone to the Union, I suppose, I was living in total seclusion, and knew nothing at all of what was passing in that sad world, misnamed gay. I believe that Perdita's mother was one of those miserable deluded beings who, having married, perhaps in obedience to parents, or from motives of ambition, find out too late that they have a heart, and having married one they cannot love, end by loving one they cannot marry. I fancy the gentleman with her, was her seducer, and that they were stopping together just at the time I first met them. I think she, in the midst of her guilty madness, could not forget that she was a mother, though she did that she was a wife: that she had carried off her little girl with her, against the wish and advice of her heartless, profligate partner in guilt. Whether she meant to leave the child with me, or whether, when looking for her carriage and her companion, she met with some misadventure, or was terrified by some imaginary or real pursuit, I know not, but I dare say had I, at the time, been living in the world of fashion, or been au courant (through the papers), I should have heard of some tale of sin or shame in high life, ending in an elopement; and should easily have identified the principal parties as those I had met. I own now, Perdita has become so inexpressibly dear to me, so essential to my little all of happiness, and so entirely my only object of interest in life, that all I dread is any dénouement that may give to any other parties a right in the person, the fortunes, and the affections, of the innocent, affectionate, and beloved child of my adoption. And now here she comes. I hear her merry laugh, her fairy step, and that amphibious nondescript Mrs. Golightly, arm in arm with Perdita, is to me like a satyr in attendance on a sylph, or 'Comus' with the 'Lady,' in Milton's splendid masque."

Perdita came gaily in at this moment, vainly endeavouring to repress her laughter. Mrs. Golightly looked flushed and angry.

"I said it would be so, Lady Mildmay," she remarked. "Because, to oblige you, I made my dress purely feminine, I have been followed, stared at, in short, insulted. Yes, insulted! Of course a young inexperienced girl (almost a child) is no protection for a creature so fatally attractive as I am, alas! become in the eyes of those sons of Belial, blown with insolence and wine."

"But what has happened?" asked Lady Mildmay, who, grave as she habitually was, could not refrain from smiling. "Tell me, Perdita."

But Perdita only burst out afresh, into the merriest laughter.

"Ah," said Mrs. Golightly, flinging off her bonnet and shawl. "She will not laugh thus, if she is ever herself the object of the bold bad passions it is my wretched fate to inspire, but it is only now and then that nature sends forth, as if in a spirit of mischief, a woman so fatally irresistible. Look here, a Lovelace wearing the academical cap and gown, who fixed his eyes on me all through the service, has torn a leaf from his prayer-book, impious wretch! and has written this under this attempt at a likeness of me and of Perdita:—

Ah, Beauty! every heart becomes your spoil,
When you appear set off by such a foil!

This was thrust into a prayer-book Miss Perdita and myself had condescended to accept the loan of. The likenesses are perfect: no one can mistake the impious meaning of the profligate writer. It is a gross insult to me as a woman, and not very complimentary to poor little Perdita, who, so very inoffensive and unremarkable in every way, need not have provoked the insulting epithet, 'a foil.' However he, base seducer that would be, he shall find his vile impromptu 'a foil' to his purpose. It is one of the arts of men, when under the influence of the feelings which prompted this effusion, to endeavour to sow discord between women, by insulting comparisons. They know full well l'union est la force, and, therefore, they try to disunite us. Let them fail, signally fail, oh, Perdita. And do not envy me, my child, those gifts which are and have been the curse of my life."

"I do not, indeed, I do not covet one of your gifts. I would not possess them if I could," said Perdita.

"You deceive yourself, I fear. But wait, they have provoked the vengeful muse within me. Ah, men think all weapons theirs but the needle. The pen and the sword they would monopolise. We will see with what justice they do so." She sat down to a writing-table, took her refulgent goggles, threw back her clusters of wild grizzled hair, and wrote rapidly, furiously, spasmodically.

TO A LOVELACE IN CAP AND GOWN.

And have you dared to raise your eyes to me?
Base profligate, whose tribute I despise.
Swine from the herd of Epicurus he,
Who casts upon my charms his roving eyes.
Wretch of a sex by me yepest unfair,
Ever the unprotected female's foe.
I, wise betimes, defy your every snare,
And forth in coat of male I soathless go.
For every man 's of every man afraid,
Surtout and trowsers "are the only wear;"
And by their help I, too bewitching maid,
Escape the woes that wait upon the fair.
Hence, son of Beller! hence, and aim your darts
At meaner charms, nor basely aiming toll
To sow dissension between female hearts.

This doggerel Mrs. Golightly read with triumph, amid a laughing chorus. She inclosed, sealed it, and took her stand at the window; suddenly she called Perdita—"Look, look," she said, "Perdita, are not those the very men whose bold glances so chafed, so offended me, and who wrote these lines?" "Yes," said Perdita, shrinking back. But at the very moment she said "yes," Mrs. Golightly threw up the sash and passed out the letter she had prepared. It fell at the feet of a young man in cap and gown, who took it up, kissed his hand, and hastened on with it.

The ladies were very much shocked at an act so likely to compromise them all, and Ellen and Lady Mildmay were very indignant that by calling Perdita to the window at the moment, she should have been in a manner associated with such an imprudence and impropriety; indeed, from the delightful and deferential manner in which the young Oxonian and gentleman commoner had taken the letter and hurried away with it, it was to be feared he imagined it came from the beautiful young Perdita, for whom he had of course intended the compliment Mrs. Golightly appropriated and resented.

There was nothing to be done; and Mrs. Golightly, sane on all other points, was so very mad on this, that no argument had the slightest weight. She kept on spouting snatches of her own reply, with every variety of gesture and inflection of voice; and as Ellen was to leave her behind, and quit Oxford early the next day, Lady Mildmay whispered to Perdita that all she could do was to avoid such a monomaniac for the future. Mrs. Golightly had a brother a fellow of Brazenose College, and a nephew an undergraduate of the same community; and her object in being at Oxford was, as she told Lady Mildmay, to judge, by watching them and their proceedings unknown to them, how far they were worthy to inherit the property which, as she was "voulu au célibat," she had to dispose of. Her brother was some fifteen years younger than herself, an eminent scholar, very grave, stern, proud, and reserved; and her nephew, the son of a brother she had lost, was a brave, merry, laughter-loving scapegrace, who had just got through his little-go, and was already deeply in debt. Mrs. Golightly had a horror of both: she paid ready money for everything, and during her stay in Oxford settled her hotel bill every evening.

Before the ladies parted for the night, three staid, elderly men were shown in. They professed to come to pay their respects to Mrs. Golightly, who whispered to Perdita that the fame of her beauty and genius had got abroad, and that she would probably be beset by all the dons in Oxford.

Lady Mildmay had her own suspicions of the object of these three intruders; and found they tallied exactly with Ellen's, and were verified by the result.

The names they sent in were Dr. St. Zeer, Dr. M'Probe, and Dr. O'Pry. They watched every word Mrs. Golightly uttered, and exchanged glances of a very significant nature. They very adroitly got her upon her favourite topic, and smiled when she said to them as she had done to Ellen—

"For, oh, alas, to me belongs
The fatal gifts of beauty and of song."

One of them, Dr. Probe, so provoked her by a defence of her own sex, that she grew extremely excited—drew forth the lines and caricatures she had received, and her own reply—and while reading it with the wildest of gestures, flashing eyes, flushing cheek, and dishevelled hair, Dr. Probe informed her that it was in consequence of the insult she had received, and which with her admirable reply had reached the ears of her brother, Dr. Golightly, that they had taken the liberty of waiting upon her, assisted by that gentleman, and that as Dr. Golightly wished to have the account from her own lips and was prevented by a severe cold from leaving Brazenose College, they came to have the honour of escorting her to her brother's room; and they hoped an example would be made of the young scapegrace who had presumed to address her.

Mrs. Golightly said she would attend them, but in going among men she was resolved not to appear in the light of an unprotected female; she had a pretty good notion of what that would expose her to. They begged she would consult her own taste and wishes.

"I consult a dire necessity," she said, and left the room, but quickly re-appeared in her great coat and man's hat, and armed with a stout walking-stick.

A quiet smile and very meaning glance passed between the three doctors.

"I shall be back to share a sandwich and a glass of sherry with you ladies," said Mrs. Golightly, bowing to all à la ronde.

A carriage awaited the three doctors, Dr. St. Zeer handed in poor Mrs. Golightly, close followed by M'Probe and O'Pry. She appeared no more at the Angel. Her unfortunate verses had been shown to her brother, who, long doubting her sanity, was convinced now that she was stark staring mad, and got three medical men thus adroitly to examine her, and their opinion being unanimous as to her aberration of intellect, he begged them to convey her at once, and by a cléver coup de main, to a private asylum a few miles from Oxford, called "The Rosery;" though no roses showed their faces there: the dull house was surrounded by high walls and long windows barred with iron.

Poor Mrs. Golightly, so harmless and so sane on all points but one! But who could resist her own brother? and all feared (for lunacy laws were then what they are now), that his object might be, as her nearest relative, to appropriate a considerable part of her fortune. Still nothing could be done after the searching examination and decision of the three doctors, and Ellen wept bitterly, and Mrs. Golightly did not appear again in the literary world.

At 9.15 a.m., all were off—Lady Mildmay, Perdita, and Ellen. In the carriage was an old gentleman who seemed much struck with Perdita, and, entering into conversation, tried, as far as good breeding would permit, to ascertain her name and history; Perdita seemed to like to talk to him, and as his age and manners were not such as to excite any alarm, Lady Mildmay did not check her innocent prattle. At C— they got out, a quarter of an hour being allowed for refreshment, and at the same time from a second-class carriage alighted a woman of elegant figure and bearing, but very shabbily attired. She looked miserably ill,—indeed, in the last stage of consumption; but Lady Mildmay, turning pale and red by turns, looked earnestly at the person in question, as she staggered rather than walked into the "ladies' waiting-room," where, sinking on the sofa, she closed her eyes, and seemed about to faint. In common humanity, Ellen rushed forward and held her salts to her nose; Lady Mildmay took her shabby bonnet off her beautiful head, whose bright auburn tresses were tinged with gray; Perdita chafed the wan hands; the attendant brought some brandy, and wetted the pale lips. Suddenly she opened her eyes—they glared wildly on Lady Mildmay! and from her to the beautiful Perdita, who knelt as she chafed with eau de cologne the thin pale hands!

A shriek escaped the sufferer's lips;—a groan followed.

"You are Lady Mildmay," she cried, almost fierce in her mental agony.

"I am."

"And that child!" pointing to Perdita, "that angel of beauty and mercy is the child of my desertion and of your adoption." She tried to rise to stretch out her arms to the pale, astounded girl, when suddenly a gush of scarlet blood burst from her lips! She had broken a blood-vessel. All screamed aloud, and cried out for a doctor, and the room filled; the old gentleman came in among others. The wretched woman's eyes met his—"Go, go!" cried she, "oh, Delaware, go! I know you. I remember those kind, reproachful eyes, that gentle smile—I, the wretched, guilty Penelope. I am dying fast, do not kill me by that cold, dreadful gaze. Let me live, let me kneel down to him. Do not take my child to your cruel, scornful sister; away, cold ones! It is Delaware, and I am his guilty wife. Let me hear from you, he forgives me ere I die, that he will leave my child with Lady Mildmay. My lord, my dear, my injured lord; you have been well avenged; the wretch I preferred to you, and for whom I bartered all earthly peace and heavenly hopes, he deceived me by maligning you, he ill-treated, reviled, forsook me. I have known hunger, father! I have known blows, mother! on my wretched body his marks will be found when I die. That angel is our child! our Penelope! that saint is the lady in whose care I left her when the sight of my brother and you, fifteen years ago, made me fly and hide away like the guilty wretch I am."

"This agitation will kill her on the spot," said a surgeon who had at length been fount among the passengers, and who drew near with a sponge, a basin of cold water, and a case of instruments.

She warded him off. "Nothing can save me," she said; "Lady Mildmay, do you remember me?"

"I do," said Lady Mildmay, ghastly pale, and trembling violently.

"My lord, can you recognise in this miserable wreck—this guilty victim of the profligate De Courcy—one once as fair, as innocent as you lovely girl?"

"Alas! I do, Penelope," and he wept bitterly.

"Then," she cried, with a scream, throwing herself at his feet, "forgive the guilty wife, and embrace the guiltless child!"

The earl spread out his arms, Perdita fell fainting into them, and the wretched creature, once Lady Delaware, sank with her wan brow on her husband's feet. They raised her, they tried to restore her—in vain, in vain: God was merciful and she was dead.

From a letter found upon her, and addressed to Lady Mildmay, it seemed her seducer, who had met and fought the Earl of Delaware, had been convicted in damages ruinous to him. A divorce was obtained. He who had promised marriage, spurned her then, and vented on her his wrath at the disastrous results of that base intrigue. For years she had borne with his neglect, his reproaches, his insults, his cruelties; her own fortune of three hundred per annum had been restored to her by the earl, who could never obtain any tidings of his child. Of this, she annually paid the hundred a year to Lady Mildmay for her child's support. Dreading that if her husband discovered and got possession of his daughter, his sister, who now kept his house, but had disliked her, would have the charge of the young Lady Penelope Meredith, and visit on the innocent child the guilt of the miserable mother.

Dreadful were the scenes between De Courcy and his victim, to get that mother to abandon to him the sum set apart for the forsaken little one.

At length he was killed in a brawl at a gaming-house, and the miserable woman, feeling she was dying, resolved to endeavour to return to England to see her injured husband and forsaken child, before she was called to her last account.

De Courcy having forestalled her whole year's income in his losses at play, she was in the depths of poverty, and, to pay her passage, had sold even her very shawl and travelling cloak.

The Earl of Delaware was deeply affected by the sudden death of the woman he had loved so well; but the possession of such a daughter consoled him. His gratitude to Lady Mildmay knew no bounds; he proposed that they should live together, and as Lady Mildmay was too young and too handsome still, to admit of such an arrangement without scandal, and as the earl and herself grew daily more pleased with each other, and Perdita—for so they both loved to call her, and called her still—joined her entreaties to her father's, Lady Mildmay consented to become Countess of Delaware.

Ellen heard from her on her bridal tour. Perdita was staying with her the while, and to Ellen's delight the countess said that she had met in a railway carriage Mrs. Golightly in her favourite great coat and full trowsers, slouch hat, and stout walking-stick, but less ridiculed than in England, as any amount of absurdity abroad is explained by a shrug, and the word "Anglais." Yes, Mrs. Golightly was abroad; she had escaped from "The Rosery" and all its horrors, had been removed through Ellen St. Ange's persevering efforts, and by the aid of the nephew, to whose bosom friend she had, little suspecting who he was, thrown out, at the Angel, the poetical reply she was so proud of. In conjunction with the author of the caricature and impromptu, they, with two more of their adventurous clique, had carried off Mrs. Golightly from "The Rosery."

CHAPTER CIX.

And moody madness laughing wild,
Amidst severest woe.—GRAY.

We trust our readers are sufficiently interested in their quaint old friend, Mrs. Golightly, to be glad to hear that after some months of cessation from literary labour, and its consequent excitement; and after consulting, by Ellen St. Ange's advice and entreaty, one of the most celebrated physicians, and following his prescriptions, Mrs. Golightly recovered from the ludicrous delusions which had so nearly entailed upon her perpetual imprisonment, with every species of torture and indignity. And now we must pause to express our warm and earnest sympathy with those of our reformers, who are resolved to sweep from the face of the earth those strongholds of sordid, irresponsible cruelty, where the mad are rendered incurable, and the sane driven frantic—the PRIVATE LUNATIC ASYLUMS of Great Britain.

There may be a few exceptions: for the honour of humanity we trust there are; but hitherto every revelation of the secrets of these "prison houses" does indeed

"Make each particular hair to stand on end,
Like quills upon the fretful porcupine."

We have all shuddered at the horrible death of a poor old man, who in a lunatic asylum was killed, not by slow fire, but by what is, if possible, a more cruel invention still, slow water—kept in a shower-bath, into which no ray of light was admitted, locked in, while on his doomed and crazed old head fell, during nearly twenty mortal minutes (hours they seemed to him) a heavy weight of ice-cold water without any intermission; and when this was done, and he was released at last more dead than alive, a loathsome emetic was forced down his gasping throat, in the process of which crowning torture he expired. The same dastardly and iniquitous system was carried out in the case of poor old Mrs. Golightly, whose harmless monomania for a time was irritated, by this and similar cruelties, into frenzy.

What she endured no pen can describe, no tongue can reveal, and we cannot even pause to attempt to paint them, since we have much to tell of the adventures of those more interesting to the reader, namely, Hope Evermore and her Larky Grigg.

CHAPTER CX.

The shades of eve were closing fast,
As through an Alpine village passed
A youth, who bore, 'mid storm and ice,
A banner with the strange device—

Excelsior! LONGFELLOW.

We left Larky Grigg tearing himself, in the proud and resolute virtue of his young heart, from the woman he loved so truly, and who had said, in the devotion and innocence of her affection and reverence, "My will is thine."

Loving as Larky Grigg loved, and as no man of fashion—no Sybarite of sentiment—could love, but loving with the first passionate love of a heart of which Hope was the darling, and a fancy of which she was the idol—it was a sublime act of heroism in the self-educated man—the son of the people—one of the million—who, as we have said, loved as such men only can love, to tear himself away at this moment of danger and enchantment. But if "the woman who deliberates is lost," the man who does so is as certainly and as irretrievably ruined.

Never had Larky Grigg prayed so fervently as when, in the anguish of his tried and almost yielding heart, he groined out beneath the silver moon and silent stars, as he knelt on the wild heath, "Lead me not into temptation, but deliver me from evil!" And what a temptation it was! There was that Evil Spirit, who is ever at hand to glide in (when passion tramples down the fences which virtue builds round the heart of man)—there he was with flattering doctrines of temporary expediency, and that gloss which the old serpent has ever been able from the beginning to impart, not merely to his own coils, but to the very slime that marks out his deadly path. With what bright, false colours does he paint, with passion for his helper, what, seen by the calm light of reason and reflection, seems so base, and foul, and vile.

But Larky knew by the struggle in his breast that his safety was in flight. Young Christian hero! the world rings with applause when some soldier risks his life to gain the object of his dreams by night, his thoughts by day—"Glory." The world is loud in its recognition of any showy act of generosity or devotion; but of the quiet sacrifice, the secret heroism, of a Christian's heart, it knows nothing. Yet, faint not, faint not, young Christian hero! there is One who knows all things; there is One who sees us as we are; there is One who appreciates thy valour in that struggle with thyself and with the evil spirit that would beguile thee into taking a mean advantage of Hope's loving trust and womanly reverence for her lover's judgment. To Him thou art greater at this moment than he who taketh a city; for He knows, and He only, how thou lovest her thou leavest, and what rapture it would be to thee, in thine ardent but pure love, to link her arm in thine, and to cheer her on, while she treads the wild heath by thy side, and to watch her, as a pilgrim the shrine of his saint, while she sleeps in her virgin beauty, on a bed of heather pulled by thee, and shaded by some guardian tree.

The Evil One had whispered, "Now is the time! claim her now! before she is shut up by a watchful parent, and tempted by all that can fascinate and bewilder! Now that she loves thee well enough to leave all, and brave all, and endure all for thee!"

And Larky, having prayed for light and strength, had said, "Get thee behind me, Satan! It would be wrong to make her thanklessly leave the friends of her youth, forget the delicate proprieties of her sex, disobey the will of one who, though unknown, claims a father's right in her, and follow a young man alone, at night, at the risk of her own reputation and the future prospects of both."

And so Larky tore himself away, strong in that faith which can remove mountains, and in his case has done so. And a lovely prospect smiled before him, of better days to come; when his own good head and strong arm should have made his fortunes such that even Hope's proud friends would smile upon her choice.

For some time Larky hurried along. He was afraid—afraid of temptation; afraid of himself. But, by degrees, as he felt that distance had now placed an insuperable barrier between him and his beloved one, he grew more calm; he relaxed his pace, reviewed his conduct, and thanked his Heavenly Father for the guidance that had saved him from sin and sorrow, and began to turn over in his own mind what he had better do.

When he set out from London, he had in view the great object of letting Hope know of the change in her prospects, not with any doubt of the constancy and sincerity of her affection, but with a wish, which was so ardent as to be a desire, to see and judge for himself how she herself, independently of her love for him, was affected by the change in her position.

Poor Larky! the rapturous expectation of seeing her, the conflicting emotions, the engrossing feelings of his heart made the way, in spite of its length and its difficulties, seem short to him.

When we journey towards the sun we do not feel the tedium of the way, but when we turn our backs on the great luminary, all seems lengthening shadows, cold, and dark, and dreary. But yet to light thy path, young Christian hero, there is a polar star. It may not warm, but it will light and cheer thee; and so take heart, and on—on, brave Larky; thine is an uphill path, but far off, by the side of the temple of fame, is the home of love. So buckle on thine armour, the armour of the self-educated man—knowledge, and virtue, and high principle, good deeds, and pure thoughts, gentle manners, and noble aspirations. Let a helmet of righteousness cover your head, and a shield of faith guard your heart.

CHAPTER CXI.

"Oh pause," the maiden cried, "and rest
Thy weary head upon this breast."
A tear stood in his bright blue eye,
But still he answered with a sigh,

"Excelsior!"—LONGFELLOW.

LARKY GRIGG had not left his mother—(kind, dear Apple Blossom!)—without a hint of the object of his leaving home. Just at that time he was out of work. Jem Goodman and Mr. Stephen had advised him to wait till something suitable offered; and, in the meantime, they encouraged and helped him to carry on the noble and arduous work of self-education, which he had so well and resolutely begun.

Larky Grigg had little money, for he had been obliged to expend his small hoard in books and scientific instruments. He was careful and economical, and therefore could afford to be generous, and had often been so.

His mother did not know how low his funds were; and when she gave him a sovereign, it was with no idea that he was in want of it. But Larky, who liked the idea of walking, for he was strong and healthy, and did not like to pass through lovely counties seeing nothing but iron rails and dull stations, set off with a bundle and a stick; and so kind to each other are the working classes, that some gave him a lift, some a bed, and some a meal, and he had spent little or nothing on his way to Burnside. But he had not the same energy or joyous spirit on his way back; and the first inn that he approached, as he bent his way homewards, had sufficient temptation to make him halt, and resolve to order tea and a bed.

The hostess was a kind, motherly woman, Tibbie McDougal, who took a great fancy to Larky from his likeness—real or supposed—to a son she had lost in battle. She was about to sit down to her own tea, and she kindly asked Larky to partake, giving him to understand that as he'd "mak na deference to spake o', seeing the tea was already a-brewing, he'd be only indebted for the bed." Larky thanked her, and cordially accepted what was so very cordially offered. He was made a good deal of by the hostess and her very pretty daughter, a blue-eyed, flaxen-haired lassie, that might have served as a model for "Highland Mary." She was evidently much struck with Larky Grigg, and never met his eyes or answered a word of his, without the deepest and prettiest of blushes, while her Scottish accent gave to her words the wild sweetness which the heather imparts to the northern honey.

This girl's name was Robina (but her mother called her Beenie), and both mother and daughter, when they saw that Larky Grigg could not eat, and looked ghastly pale, tried to tempt him with dainties in the shape of jelly and cakes, whisky, and Scotch ale, but all in vain; a sudden shivering came over Larky Grigg's frame, his eyes grew dim, his head dizzy. The kind hostess led him into the adjoining room, and helped him to bed; and as a raging thirst, a scorching heat, and agonising pains in his head, succeeded to his shivering fit, Mrs. McDougal took her seat by his bedside, having desired Beenie to put on her plaid and run over to "auld Janet"—a canny woman—(both doctor and midwife), to come and prescribe for the "puir, dacent lad;" and auld Janet was not long coming. She felt Larky's pulse; she shook her head; applied remedies she had brought with her, and took up her station for the night as Larky's nurse. Yes, there lay poor Larky Grigg in a little highland bothie, tended by strangers, while Hope Evermore, little dreaming that her beloved was struggling with Death's dark angel, was only some twelve miles off.

COINCIDENCES.

CRIMES and casualties run in series, in human affairs, just the same as fashions or disorders rage. If a man commits suicide by hanging, other cases of the same kind are sure to follow, before long, in the same community. So if a railroad train breaks through a bridge, destroying life and property, other trains will soon break through other bridges, with like results. Three children at a birth make their appearance in some part of the country, and straightway other triplets are issued by enterprising mothers in various localities. A steamboat runs its nose into the side of another, smashing in the planks and timbers; and before the sheets are dry upon which the account of the accident is printed, other collisions take place in other parts of the country. Sometimes a woman poisons her husband, and then husband-poisoning becomes the prevailing form of homicide for awhile, to be superseded in its turn by some other class of murder, which will have a similar run. Once upon a time a man ascended to the top of a high monument in one of the public squares of Paris, and threw himself headlong to the ground, thus finishing his mortal career. Upon that, every Parisian who was weary of life, adopted the monument as the road to eternity, until, at length, suicides, by leaping from the monument top, became so common, that the city authorities were obliged to shut up the access to the stairway, in order to prevent the alarming spread of the mania. And finally, somebody's good-natured friends got together and march in procession to his house, laden with all sorts of valuable gifts, and surprise him with a bountiful present. After this, for a month to come, nothing is heard of but surprise parties, surprising all kinds of people with all kinds of presents, of which the surprised recipients are usually the planners and payers for the costly articles which are bestowed. Verily, like the Pharisees of old, "they have their reward." For is it not noticed in the papers? The moral of all this may be found in the story of the tailor who laid down under the trees to sleep, while carrying a bundle of caps to market, having first put one on his head in lieu of a night-cap. A gang of monkeys stole his caps while he slept, and fled to the tree-tops, each one imitating the owner, by putting one on his head. Upon awakening, the man saw that all his caps were lost to him, and in despair of recovering them from the high trees, he tore his own cap from his head, and dashed it to the earth. Forthwith all the imitative animals followed suit, by throwing their caps to the ground, and the tailor thus recovered his property.

At a recent mesmeric lecture, in a country town, one of the experiments most signally failed, to the chagrin of the lecturer. Having, as he fancied, mesmerised a table and a man's hand, and by some means held the two so effectually together that it all depended on his single will whether they should ever again be parted, he placed a shilling in tempting proximity to the hand "in a fix," and exclaimed, "There now, my man, if you can take up that shilling you may have it!" "Thank you," said the honest fellow, as he very coolly dropped the coin into his waistcoat pocket.

THE CASA DE GRALLA, BARCELONA.

BARCELONA.—VI.

THE Casa de Gralla, erected about the year 1530, is one of the most remarkable buildings for its extent, design, and elaborate ornamentation, to be found in all Barcelona. It is less than a palace, but more than a private dwelling. It is called by the Barcelonians the Casa de Gralla, because a family of that name were its original owners. The present proprietor is the Duke of Medina-Celi. Most of the palaces and noble houses of Spain resemble those of Italy. Their nobility ends on crossing the threshold. The furniture and decorations are in a terribly dilapidated condition, and there is little to remind the visitor of their former glory. In the Casa de Gralla, for instance, a Marseillaise pianofortemaker has established his agent, and where, once upon a time, there was dancing and revelry, duelling dons and demure donnas, there is nothing now but cabinet, cottage, and grand pianos to be sold, or perhaps let on hire.

Some years ago the municipality of Barcelona determined on pulling down the old building, for the purpose of opening a new street. By the exertions of a young Catalan architect, however, their plan was modified, and the structure preserved—a model of the style of the Spanish renaissance under Charles the Fifth.

Barcelona is a city of paradoxes. Things new and old are oddly thrown together. The bull circus and the railway terminus are next door to each other. The famous university looks haughtily down upon the visitor, and its appearance seems as learned as of yore; but 'tis only a barrack for soldiers. As in the instance of the Casa de Gralla, many a noble palace is let out for commercial or trading purposes. But the Barcelonian still retains his dignity, and hidalgos, gipsies, and dulcineas keep up many of the old customs.

Now, in the matter of love-making, the Spaniards still adhere to time-honoured practice. All the world woos; but it has different ways of wooing. If you were a Hindoo or Mohammedan, you might arrange your love-making on strictly commercial principles, and buy the woman you adored for so much. If you were a Red Indian, you might win your lady's favour by your success in the chase, or by the scalps at your girdle. In Hungary you must propose through a kíro, or agent; while in New South Wales—supposing yourself one of the aborigines—you must capture your bride by main force, silencing her frantic struggles with anything but tender words or affecting caresses—namely, by introducing her at once to your club, and making her understand that you are her master, in the strictest sense of that word.

In Barcelona, things are managed differently. See!—there is a veritable senorita coming—a Catalan maid—a child of the sun. How airily she approaches, gliding, as it were—so dainty is the movement of her feet! With what an irresistible grace she plays with her fan! She does not see you—not at all—till quite close, when she lifts her silken lashes, and her eyes meet yours. Enough! You are her slave. You follow her—watch where she enters—loiter till she comes out at the vesper hour, in company with her duenna—follow again; and who can feel surprise, for she has stolen your heart! Watching, and following at church, and theatre, and promenade, is, you will say, slow work. But we are no laggards in these latitudes. Are you fairly in love? You are! then slip a billet-doux into her hand, or if you prefer, go on your knees to her duenna. One way or another the matter is arranged. What is the next thing to be done?—ask pa? No; you must first of all go through that interesting performance of climbing to your lady's window, and receiving from her own lips a confession of her love. You apply to the watchman, whose duty it is to go bawling the hours and the state of the weather all night long. Can he oblige you with a ladder? He can. Will he?—(chink, chink; good money, by Pluto.) He is only too happy to serve your worship. Want your ladder at twelve—sharp. Ave Maria purissima; your worship may rely upon him. At the appointed time he is at his post. The price you pay for the ladder is exorbitant; but in love matters who counts the cost? You mount to the first balcony—to the second, and your ladder extends no further; but a rope ladder from your lady's window is let down. One desperate effort more! Don't look down, or you will have an attack of vertigo. You are up in the balcony, at your lady's feet—the prettiest pair of feet that ever trod the earth of Catalonia. You are too much overcome by your feelings and your unrivalled exercise to say much at first; but you declare your passion, pour forth a torrent of ardent vows, press her hand—her—well, never mind—and you are an accepted lover. So you descend the ladder, and the next day are introduced to the family, entering the house by the front door, observing punctiliously all the formalities in such cases made and provided. From that point the process of courtship is carried on very nearly as in other Christian countries. The ladder business is the only distinctive feature; but this is insisted upon as an appropriate mark of homage, as a true test of love.

CONCEALMENT, AND ITS EFFECTS.

"Poor, dear boy, how I pitied him!" said Mrs. Atwood. "He did not mean to do it, and so I told him not to let his father know a word about it."

It seems the boy, Leonard, had been playing battle-dore upon prohibited ground, in the back parlour, and, with his youngest sister, had broken the chimney-glass. It was a small crack, and by removing the candelabras a trifle, it would not be discovered. And so the busy whisper ran round, "not to say a word about it to father;" and this concealment, we are sorry to add, was not for the first time practised upon Mr. Atwood; so, in truth, we ought to have prefaced our story with "Poor, dear Mr. Atwood! How he was to be pitied!"

The father of Leonard was not a rich man, but by frugality he made a small salary supply all ordinary wants—for superfluities he had little spare change—yet by dint of close calculation he had managed to furnish a parlour neatly, and even prettily, of the articles he had picked up at auctions. Whenever they were faded or sunburnt, he had contrived to conceal the defects; and such concealment as this, we are not disposed to treat harshly, as it injures no one. Mrs. Atwood was a pleasant, amiable person—one who tried to do well whenever it did not cost her too much labour—but she was deficient in those nameless little traits of neatness which make a home doubly attractive. Her work-box was always in confusion; knots and tassels, fringes and muslins all lay in the same pile, and occasionally a stray collar or a lost handkerchief would be drawn from the rubbish. It was a frequent remark of hers "that she had plenty of things, if she only knew where to find them."

Such women are often unbalanced. They forget that saving is a greater virtue than buying; but all the lectures in the world fail to help such people. The world goes easy with them, and sometimes they are reckoned the happiest people in it.

Mrs. Atwood had another fault. She was inconsistent in her conduct to her children. Sometimes she would pet them for the very thing which, at another time, she would censure. She seemed to have had a lack of judicious training herself; and, of course, she could not be expected to govern others discreetly. The father, too, had a kind of square and compass rule, which was not always judicious. He thought children were, or ought to be, like automata, so that when you but touch the wire, they will move with exact precision. When they failed to do so, a harsh word was occasionally used, and he had managed so, that now, a mere look, in the presence of strangers, would correct any irregularity. Of course, the children were rather afraid of their father; but of their mother,—why, they did do pretty much as they pleased, in his absence.

All this management prepares us to hear of the detection of the broken chimney-glass.

Mr. Atwood seldom sat in his back parlour but on a Sunday. He always had a habit, upon the morning of this day, before he went to church, of stepping before this veritable glass and adjusting his cravat; and this he did, even when he came straight from his chamber, where he had arranged himself with so much precision. When the Sunday came, therefore, he detected that the glass was cracked.

"Wife!" said he, with much impetuosity, "how came this about? How came this glass so shattered? Leonard, Susan, which of you did it?"

The children stood in the passage, and looked at their mother, who shook her head, and put her finger on her mouth, as a token of silence.

"Have you been playing battledore on this forbidden ground?" asked the father, peevishly.

"No, sir," was the prompt reply; and so sincere did it seem to sound, so truthful, that the father was forced to devise some other way to account for the accident, when the mother interposed.

"Husband," said she, "you cannot believe that these children would break the glass and deny having done it. I trust they are not the only ones who do all the mischief in the house. I will not accuse any one; but you know that sweeping and dusting, and removing mantelpiece ornaments, might have caused the mischief. I do not say it did do it, but it might."

The children understood the drift of such remarks, and thinking them too good to be kept, informed Fanny, the servant girl, how ingeniously their mother had screened them; "but," added they, "she did not tell father it was you that did it."

The poor, innocent girl felt the colour mount to her forehead. She wondered how Mrs. Atwood, who was so good and kind to her, could be guilty of such an implied falsehood. It worried her, and she resolved that she would not stand as the guilty one in the eyes of her master, and that day she divulged the whole secret, still quoting to Mr. Atwood the old injunction she was so accustomed to hear:—

"Don't tell how you heard of it, or who did it."

Poor Atwood, was he not to be pitied? Think how the duplicity of his wife stared him in the face; how the unblushing falsehood of his children rose before him. What could he do? Why, he pondered over it, and it vexed him. He had lost his confidence in the strongest hold of his affection, and little forgotten things kept rising anew, recalling this and that act of petty deception, which he had detected long ago, in both mother and children. But Fanny was a good, faithful girl, and he well knew the disclosure she had made would cost her the loss of her place, and so the concealed knowledge lay hidden in his own breast. What a load this single circumstance had brought upon them all!

Five years from this event the boy had become a young man, and the little girl began to assume the look of womanhood. The former had learned the art of good penmanship, and was now in the employ of a merchant as copying clerk. His salary was small, but to the conception of a young man who had been accustomed to only a trifling pittance, it looked enormous, particularly as the great vortex which swallows up all in board, was obviated by living at home for nothing.

During the first three months, a gold watch was purchased on credit; then a chain and some dangling seals. The tailor was not passed by, and all that could give an exquisite finish to a young man was procured, so that, at the end of the year, the £100 salary still left him in debt for nearly a hundred more, and this he had anticipated by further promotion; but, alas, that does not always follow. His employer questioned the propriety of retaining him any longer; but knowing the hard-working, steady habits of his father, he determined to let him remain, without additional salary.

It is always a bad sign when a young man's wants exceed his income. It proved so in the case of Leonard Atwood. The ravenous monster, debt, preyed upon him. There was but one expedient left, and that would prove the ruin of his character, as it lay in embezzling his master's property! But then, again, came into action the old art he had early been taught of concealment! He took the required amount, at a rash venture, and paid his debts. A sense of guilt flashed over his countenance, and that night, just as the disk of the sun was setting behind the horizon, a young man turned down a narrow, unfrequented lane. Strange thoughts rushed through his brain—strange fears—and of how little value then appeared all the tinsel baubles which had brought guilt into his heart! But he recomposed himself, ventured home, and affected his usual pleasant manner; and yet the "God bless you, my grandson," of his aged grandfather, sent such a thrill through his soul as almost resulted in madness.

In a few days there was a council held in the counting-room of the merchant with whom Leonard Atwood was connected. His father was there, and the men who had received their recent payments from the young man. The bills were identified, and the officer of justice was in attendance.

There was yet another secret session in the bed-chamber of his mother, and the father was there likewise, and the daughter; and tears were shed, and groans were uttered, and hearts were crushed, because the improvident young man had become a criminal at the bar of justice. And one great absorbing feeling predominated. One thought added poignancy to all other thoughts, and that was, the lesson of concealment which his mother had early taught him; so that the broken chimney-glass was always considered an ominous sign of evil ever after by the broken-hearted parents.

Depend on it, my young friends, the practice of this wily art will always bring reproach and ruin in its train; therefore, weigh consequences before you descend to humiliating arts.

The Matron.

NO. XLIII.

In the last chapter I drew up a scale of weekly expenditure to assist families with small means; and if this scale facilitates the difficult task of saving, I shall have succeeded. Perhaps some of my readers may think such a scale unnecessary, while others may make it a guide to form a plan exactly suited to their own circumstances. A plan of some kind is an advantage in everything. It is particularly valuable in what relates to income and expense; and it is by following some plan that inexperienced young couples may avoid running into debt, and finding it necessary to get their things on credit. Those who live on credit never seem to have anything of their own. Hardly is their income, salary, or wages in their own hands than they must hand them over to their creditors. Thus when, at last, "pay-day" comes, it is as much a day of trial as of satisfaction. Another evil of running in debt, is that it makes you so painfully dependent on the shopkeeper who gives you credit. Besides, living on credit makes you poorer. The tradesman must charge you more for everything he sells you than if you had paid ready money for it. He must charge you for the use of his money, and very likely he will try to make you pay something towards the bad debts on his books.

No. 1.

Another caution relating to expenditure is this, avoid, if you can, buying things in very small quantities. Recollect, that it is as troublesome to a shopkeeper to serve you with half an ounce as with half a pound. He must make you pay extra, for giving him extra trouble; and, of course, he does this in one way or another, either in charging you a higher price, or in giving you a smaller quantity, or an inferior article. And, again, what time is lost in such frequent goings or sendings "to the grocer's round the corner!"

If a few of my readers may be indignant at my supposing it likely they should wish to send for goods in such paltry quantities, others in different circumstances, and with kinder feelings, may be much obliged to me for my hints on this important subject. And let me observe, that to benefit the poorer classes of my readers, is quite as satisfactory to me as to please the richer ones, or to obtain the approbation of the lords or legislators who may inspect our pages to discover in what consists the great charm of our paper, with its world-wide reputation.

I have not concluded the subject of income and expense, but I shall take leave of it for the present, to consider another subject that we have on the stocks, viz., dressmaking.

The principal difficulty of dressmaking consists in making the body fit well. In the beginning of this century, when the skirt was so scanty that it clung to the figure, it must have been hard to please those who had swelled beyond, or shrunk below the just proportions of beauty. But now, thanks to the immensely full skirt, all can be made the right size. Not so with the body. One of the greatest faults young dressmakers commit in the cutting out this part of the dress, is in having the front pieces for the chest too narrow, and in making the arm holes too small. These are defects that never exist in dresses of the true Parisian cut, and that would perhaps be avoided if a really well-made body, either in material or in an illustration, were constantly before the eye. With this view of the subject we offer our readers two plates, representing bodies that are really well cut. The materials composing them are black tulle and white muslin. Worn with a coloured silk skirt, they would either of them be well adapted for a costume for a concert or an evening party. The trimmings of plate 1 are of velvet, either black, or suited to the colour of the dress, and the bows on the sleeves correspond; but in any case the edging round the velvet should be of narrow black lace.

In plate 2 the trimming is of British lace in vandykes and light satin ribbon, to the taste of the wearer. The material is black muslin.

We must direct our readers' attention to the easy and graceful appearance of these dress jackets. This appearance has been produced, in a great degree, by allowing ample breadth in the material for the front of the body.

Another fault that destroys the good effect of the body, almost as much as cutting the fronts too narrow, is that of cutting the backs too long, but on this point I will say more in the next chapter, when ample directions shall be given on the interesting and important subject of making a pretty, fashionable, and comfortable dress.

Small Change.

THERE is no tyranny more intolerable than a conscience unrestrained by love. Like an ill-loaded gun, it recoils at the breech, and kills at the muzzle. A conscience unsubdued by love torments the owner, and bruises those upon whom he lets it loose.

WHY is France like a skeleton? Because only a Bony part is left.

MIND unemployed is mind unenjoyed.

How is it that Methuselah was the oldest man, when he died before his father? His father was translated.

THE good distrust themselves—the perverse their neighbours.

THERE is no lack of industry in the world—the lack is in making the right application of it.

LORD Byron once said: "You never know a man's temper until you have been imprisoned on board a ship with him, or a woman's until you have married her."

EVERY scheme of happiness must needs be imperfect that does not embrace the three incidents of wife, home, and children.

OUR sweetest experiences of affection are meant to be suggestions of that realm which is the home of the heart.

A PRIEST said to a peasant whom he thought rude, "You are better fed than taught." "Shud think I was," replied the clodhopper, "as I feeds myself, and you teaches me."

CONCERNED men often seem a harmless kind of men, who, by an overweening self-respect, relieve others from the duty of respecting them at all.

A MAN'S wit is a part of himself; his wealth or his poverty is part of his fortune. The one is inherent in him; the other is appendant to him.

No man is perfect. The ideal man is the whole Christian brotherhood. That alone presents God's idea in the creation of man.

THE merit of some people is principally in the clearness of their perceptions, while the worth of others is mainly in the strength of their affections. The former appreciate without loving, the latter love without appreciating.

WHY is the best baker most in want of bread?—Because he kneads (needs) it most.

AN old gentleman says that he is the last man in the world that would tyrannise over his daughter's affections. So long as she marries the man of his choice, he don't care whom she loves.

A CITIZEN of Hallowell has taken a fancy to the head of a dog that howls in his vicinity, and offers a pound for a sight of the head, minus the body.

WE may set it down as an axiom that young ladies cannot know everybody's names, when it is utterly impossible for them to know what their own will be a twelvemonth afterward.

"WELL, Mr. Robinson, and how does your son get on with his violin?" "Astoundingly: there were fourteen of us playing together last night, and he took the lead." "Capital!—admirable!" "Yes, and he kept it so well, sir, that none of us could catch him!"

THE best shot ever heard of has been made in Calais, where a gentleman fired, in midnight darkness, at the bark of a dog, and the next morning found the animal dead, the bullet having hit him in the throat. The entire race of sportsmen, from Gordon Cumming down to any undistinguished Cockney, may be safely challenged to beat this.

Puzzles for the Ingenious.

Answers to the question proposed for solution in No. 44, page 287, have been received as follows:—

Let x = total value.

$$\therefore x - 1,000 = 1st \text{ share.}$$

$$\therefore \frac{x}{3} - 800 = 2nd \text{ „}$$

$$\therefore \frac{x}{4} - 600 = 3rd \text{ „}$$

$$x - 1,000 + \frac{x}{3} - 800 + \frac{x}{4} - 600 = x$$

$$12x - 12,000 + 4x - 9,600 + 3x - 7,200 = 12x$$

$$12x - 12x + 4x + 3x = 12,000 + 9,600 + 7,200$$

$$7x = 28,800$$

$$\text{Proof: } 41,144 \text{ 5s. 6d.} - 11,000 = 30,144 \text{ 5s. 6d.}$$

$$30,144 \text{ 5s. 6d.} - 800 = 29,344 \text{ 5s. 6d.}$$

$$29,344 \text{ 5s. 6d.} - 600 = 28,744 \text{ 5s. 6d.}$$

$$41,144 \text{ 5s. 6d.} - 28,744 \text{ 5s. 6d.} = 12,400 \text{ 0s. 0d.}$$

Incorrect—M. Gillan, C. Cressy.

FOR SOLUTION.

There is a rectangular shaped barge, the length of which is twenty-seven feet, the breadth six feet, and the depth five feet, outside measurement; the thickness of the planking being three inches, and the weight of a cubic foot of the timber forty pounds. How many tons would be required to sink this barge?

Chess.

Problem No. 80. By R. B. WORMALD, Esq.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to move, and checkmate in four moves.

Solution of Problem No. 76.

WHITE.

1. Kt takes P on Q Kt 4

2. Kt to Q B 7

3. Kt or Q mates

BLACK.

1. Q takes B

2. Any move

Black has other defences, but none to delay the mate beyond the third move.

EXON.—We find that your Problem, No. 1, can be solved in the following manner:—

WHITE.

1. Kt to K 3

2. P Queens (ch)

3. Q or R mates

BLACK.

1. Kt to Q Kt 5

2. B takes Q

WM. M'KENZIE.—Problem No. 21 can be solved in three moves, e.g.:—

WHITE.

1. R to K 4

2. B takes R (ch)

3. B to K B 3 (mate)

BLACK.

1. R takes P (best)

2. K moves

In Problem No. 22 Black's defence of Kt to K 3 is unsound, as White can take Kt with Kt and mate next move with R. The Problem can also be solved in four moves, commencing with B takes P.

J. PHENIX.—Your Problems are meritorious, and shall appear at the earliest opportunity.

J. P. COURTENAY (Dunkineely).—Your Problem in four moves can be solved as follows:—

WHITE.

1. B takes P

2. B to K Kt 4 (ch)

3. Kt mates

BLACK.

1. K moves

2. K moves

And your Problem in five moves can be solved in four moves, e.g.:—

WHITE.

1. P to K 4

2. R to Q 7

3. K to Q 6, and mates next move

BLACK.

1. P to Q 6

2. K moves

W. COATES.—Problems Nos. 1, 3, and 4, are not, and shall appear shortly. No. 2 can be solved in the following manner:—

WHITE.

1. Kt to R 2

2. K to K 7

3. P to Q 4 (dis ch) and mates next move

BLACK.

1. K to K 4 (a)

2. K moves

(a) If K to B 4, White replies with K to K 7, &c.

C. T. ATKINS.—If you can remedy the defect arising from Q to K B 7 for the second move of White, your Problem will be a clever piece of composition.

J. J. WATTS.—Many thanks for your letter. Your analysis of the position to which you refer is quite sound.

WILLIAM JONES (Halifax).—The game possesses scarcely sufficient interest for publication.

T. SIMPSON.—We shall endeavour to act upon your suggestion, if we find it practicable to do so.

T. MARTIN, Jun.—Your inquiry must, we regret to say, be answered in the negative.

J. B. B. (Trinity College, Dublin).—It will be sufficient if you indicate the pieces on the diagram by their initial letters, e.g.:—W B for White Bishop, B K for Black King, B P for Black Pawn, &c.

Solutions up to the present date by F. G. R. (Norwich), D. W. O. (Sligo), J. J. Watts, J. B. C., T. Simpson, J. P. B. (excepting No. 68), T. Martin, jun., Netram Nhoj, M. A. R., W. Jones, Oxon, J. Palmer, Nemo, C. Austin, E. Grant, Robert Wilson.

THE NORWICH CHESS CLUB.

The members of this club, we are given to understand, will shortly resume their winter gatherings for play, and that it is proposed to present a board and chessmen to the successful competitor in a match at chess (to be played at the close of the season), in which all the members will have an opportunity of contending.

NOW READY, PRICE SIXPENCE,
CASSELL'S
ILLUSTRATED ALMANACK
For 1859.

This Beautifully Illustrated and Instructive Almanack, which has now obtained celebrity wherever the English language is spoken, will this year be found to surpass, if possible, its previous attractiveness. It will contain upwards of Thirty Engravings, the subjects as follow:—Twelve engravings representing the modes of Repast in various Nations and Periods;—Twelve engravings representing important events of the year 1858, including the Capture of Delhi—Storming of Lucknow—Bombardment of Canton—Earthquake in Naples—Burial of the Queen of Oude—The Leviathan off Deptford—Inauguration of the Boulevard de Sebastopol—Arrival of the Queen at Cherbourg—Launch of the Ville de Nantes—Fort Napoleon in Kabylia—Her Majesty's arrival at the Town Hall, Leeds—Removal of the decorations, fountain, &c., in the Place du Châtelet. Four emblematical designs of the Seasons;—Astronomical illustrations, &c., &c. The Literary matter, in addition to explanations of the above Engravings, consists of the Calendar, richly stored with historical remembrances; Chronology; Obituary; Abstracts of Acts of Parliament; Important Statistics; Postal Regulations; Stamps and Taxes; Gardening Calendar; the Government; Royal Family; Houses of Lords and Commons, and other matters, interesting to all branches of the community.

N. B. Orders should be given at once to the nearest Bookseller, as delays, consequent upon the large circulation, have unavoidably occurred in the delivery of the two last years' issues.

L. STUART.—We pity you for your disappointment, since you so much wished to see the comet; but you have only yourself to blame. In the early part of the month, on the Saturday, the 2nd instant, especially, it became so brilliant as even to attract attention from the listless. On the 10th, at about midnight, the comet was nearest the earth; it was then separated from us by about 51,000,000 miles. Its greatest brilliancy was attained the previous day, when the intensity of light was very strong. But, of course, it was not visible in those parts where the atmosphere was cloudy or foggy; and it must be remembered that showers and fogs are so partial that the sky may be clear in one county and black as thunder in another. In the absence of moonlight in the evening hours, the comet formed a splendid object in the western sky during the second and third weeks of the month. On the evening of Tuesday, the 5th of October, the comet's nucleus made a near approach to Arcturus. This proximity of the comet to so important a star proved a very interesting phenomenon. At one time their distance from each other was little more than one-third of a degree.

J. S. (Liverpool).—You can get all the volumes by giving a direct order to any respectable bookseller to procure them for you. This would probably be necessary, as they might not be found complete in stock. Should you not succeed in obtaining them by this means, send an order, with remittance, including carriage, to Messrs. Petter and Galpin, and they will forward them. The cost of the volumes will be 3s. 6d.; carriage, 3s. 6d.

ALICIA.—Coaches are of more recent date than you seem to suppose. We may fix the time of their introduction at 1564; for the poet Taylor gives the following prosaic account:—"One William Boonen, a Dutchman, brought first the use of coaches hither, and the said Boonen was Queen Elizabeth's coachman; for, indeed, a coach was a strange monster in those days, and the sight of them put both horse and man into amazement."

VIATOR.—The hope and expectation of finding gold furnishes travellers with wings, and it seems that the new "El Dorado" (British Columbia) is to be of easy access in a very short time. On this subject we give you the words of our present Foreign Secretary, Sir E. B. Lytton:—"Honourable gentlemen who look at the map may imagine this new colony at an immeasurable distance from England, but the Government had already received overtures from no less eminent a person than Mr. Cunard for a line of postal steam-vessels for letters, goods, and passengers, by which it is calculated that a passenger starting from Liverpool may reach the colony in about thirty-five days, by way of New York and Panama." Besides this line of route, it is probable that an effort will be made to open a communication by land through Canada, for which certain depressions in the northern part of the Rocky Mountains offer facilities.

A STEADY YOUNG LADDIE.—As you have "never yet engaged in any kind of manual labour," you are not likely to obtain from the government a free passage to Port Natal, or to any other place.

LORD MAYOR.—There are two Lord Mayors in England; one in London and the other in York, which city is a county in itself, and enjoys large privileges, confirmed to it by a long succession of kings. The title of Lord is also borne by the Mayor of the City of Dublin. The prefix of Lord to that of Mayor of London was granted by Edward III., with the style of "Right Honourable," in 1354. The first Lord Mayor of Dublin was honoured with that title by Charles II. in 1665.

A YOUTH.—Mr. Rarey has, we own, done great wonders in his way; so had Astley and Franconi before him. Astley's plan was to give each horse his preparatory lesson alone, when there was no noise to divert his attention from his instructor. If the horse was interrupted, he was dismissed for that day. When perfect in certain lessons by himself, he was associated with other horses whose education was further advanced. It was Astley's practice to reward his horses with slices of carrot or apple when they performed well.

IN A FIX.—You are liable for the debts your wife may have contracted previous to marriage, provided they are not barred by the statute of limitations.

K. J. JECNE.—Your lines on the "Death of Your First Love" are promising, and do credit to your poetical talent. Since you can be so eloquent, we wonder you require us to prompt you in your approaching interview with your new love; however, we will do our best for you. If the lady is very sentimental, the description of your early sorrow may touch her heart; "and when we learn to pity, how soon we learn to love."

A COUNTRY GIRL.—The word "Selah" is generally supposed to be a note of admiration, requiring a solemn pause in the psalm or song. It is usually placed after some remarkable passage, and seems designed to excite and quicken attention.

A WEEKLY SUBSCRIBER.—Supposing you to be really attached to the young lady, you are in a painful situation; but have you not brought it on yourself? In your letter you say (alluding to the young lady), "I love her very much, and expected some day I should make her my wife." Some day is very vague. Perhaps the young lady thought it rather too vague. Probably she has forsaken you for a man capable of making up his mind, and who may already have requested her "to name the day." We cannot blame her, though we pity you.

W. H.—Personal security is the security given in a person's own name without reference to freehold, copyhold, or leasehold property, or any goods or chattels he may possess.

HARVEY.—As a young man in his 23rd year, you should have shown more good sense and penetration. The lady is evidently unsuited to you, and as the shortest follies are the best, the sooner you come to an explanation with her the better. You should courageously tell her what has estranged your love from her.

RICHARD MARKHAM.—As you have already changed your mind three times, we have no confidence in our advice as being sufficiently powerful to teach you constancy; but as, of course, you expect we should say something, our opinion is that you had better not think of any lady till you are a few years older.—AGNETA.—We cannot in conscience advise you to resign a situation in which you have secured the approbation of your employers. The number of young women who wish to be industrious, yet who find no occupation, is perfectly frightful. We can assure you that taking pupils is a most precarious mode of subsistence. Try rather to suit your temper to your circumstances, than to make your circumstances suit your temper.

L. TODD.—Roger Bacon is reported to have invented gunpowder.

AN AUSTRALIAN.—You have no reason to fear that the magnificent colony of which you are a native will ever be eclipsed in importance by British Columbia, or any other settlement. The advantages that Australia possesses in soil, climate, and mineral produce are unrivalled. You are mistaken respecting the discovery of Australia. We have good reason to believe it was first known to the Portuguese, and that when they called it Java Major, they obtained the first glimpse of it from the island of Java itself.

HONORIA.—You are wrong in supposing that volcanoes only exist in hot countries. One of the most important in the world, Mount Hecla, is in Iceland. In answer to your second question, we can only say that we are not aware of any burning mountain having actually existed in England within the historic period, but a near approach to it was seen in 1815, near Weymouth, Dorsetshire, when Holworth Cliff smoked and inflated spontaneously. It began by the sinking of two acres thirty feet, which, in three years, slid eight hundred feet towards the sea. It contained bitumen, with limestone and shells. In 1826 vapour rose from the summit, and soon after smoke, to the height of twenty-one feet. It must have been an alarming sight to bystanders. On digging at the spot, a body of flame appeared, and the hole, to the depth of six feet, resembled a limekiln, with a strong sulphureous smell. Workmen scattered the materials, but it was evidently an incipient volcano.

W. A. and D. N.—Phosphorus is manufactured chiefly from bones. It is a very powerful and diffusible stimulant; but, on account of its activity, it is exceedingly dangerous.

PLUTO.—If your uncle be a wise and experienced man, it may be worth your while seriously to consider his objections. A COUNTER-JUMPER.—Surely you do not expect us to recommend a clandestine correspondence, especially when relations of riper years, and more perfect knowledge of the circumstances, have forbidden it.

C. WILLIAMS.—You had better consult a good system of physical geography; an answer to your inquiries would occupy too large a space.

JESSE.—We hope you have recovered from the effects of your sprain long before this; in future cases the following lotion may be used with advantage:—Sugar of lead, half an ounce; vinegar and water, each a quarter of a pint; camphorated spirits, a quarter of an ounce; mix, and apply frequently.

A SUBSCRIBER FROM THE BEGINNING is recommended to apply to a neighbouring binder. The illustrated cloth cases for binding the Old Series of the "Family Paper" in separate volumes, may be obtained through any bookseller, price 2s. 6d. each.

J. P. REES.—You will find directions for polishing stones in No. 30, page 64; but for pebbles you will require a lathe and tools, such as are used by lapidaries.

CAPT. GREVILLE.—The Lessons in French were commenced in No. 23 of the New Series of our journal.

M. D.—The novel about which you inquire has been out of print for many years.

Z. Y.—Paternoster-row and Ave Maria-lane (in the immediate vicinity of St. Paul's Churchyard) derive their names from the fact of the stationers or text writers, who dwelt there in former times, having sold a kind of book then in use, viz., the A B C, with the Paternoster, Ave, Creed, and Graces. Turners of beads for rosaries also lived there, and were called paternoster-makers.

ECONOMY.—You must send your felt hat to a hatmaker to be restiffened; you will not be able to do it yourself.

J. P.—You can deposit as small a sum as £25 in the Bank of England; it will be necessary to employ a broker to purchase, in any stock you please, to that amount.

PERPLEXITY.—You are certainly in a very curious predicament. We cannot advise you to propose to the second lady until you have come to a clear understanding with the first. It is perfectly necessary that you should know whether your proposal of marriage (made two years ago) ever reached its destination. In making the inquiry, you need only ask the lady to whom it was addressed if she ever received a letter from you of such and such a date. Should she reply that no such letter ever reached her (and supposing that you are now become indifferent to her), you must courageously inform her that, in case the letter should still come to hand, you are bound to own that the wishes expressed in it are now no longer felt by you, and that suspense and disappointment have brought about a thorough revolution in your feelings; in fact, that you consider yourself as free as before you penned the letter. If, on the contrary, the lady received the letter and left it unanswered, her culpable neglect completely frees you, and any attempt on her part to recover damages would only expose her to ridicule.

J. F. K.—Apply to the Government Emigration Officer at Liverpool.

D. JONES.—See No. 41, page 340.

GULMARE.—The Marchioness de Boissy, at present figuring in Parisian society, is the "Terese, Countess Guiccioli" of Byron's notoriety; pronounced Gwu-che-o-le.

A SUBSCRIBER.—You will have to pay for your case, containing the portrait, at the same rate as the letter postage—namely, according to the weight.

A CONSTANT READER.—The situation you hold will not exempt you from the tax upon dogs.

J. W. R. (Reading).—You require four parts more to complete the series of "Cassell's Educational Course." Languages, except English, are not included in this series. You can obtain them from any respectable bookseller.

BALLY ELLIS.—The names you have sent us are pronounced thus:—Grée-sy, Pic-co-lóm-i-ny, and vét-e-ri-na-ry. Your other question you must decide according to your own cool judgment, and as circumstances seem to dictate.

A MAJOR.—It is believed that 3,000 stars are displayed to the naked eye on a clear night.

L. B.—A moderate sized French lamp will consume a quarter of a pint of oil in twelve hours and a half.

C. T.—You can obtain the publications referred to upon application to the publishers.

A LITTLE DAISY.—You are rather premature in your plans about valentines. However, it is better to be too soon than too late. There is not the least impropriety in your sending a valentine to a gentleman, provided it is anonymous.

A YOUNG LADY.—The manner in which you are to use the wash recommended in No. 36, is as follows: Damp the hair with it frequently, and do not apply water immediately after, but allow the wash to dry on the hair.

JOSEPH (Aberdeen).—By all means wait till you are able to make a fair offer.

A MUSICIAN.—The cause of obstruction in the throat must be ascertained before any proper remedy can be applied.

G. BURRELL.—There is nothing poisonous in elderberries; but the best way of preparing them for use is to press the juice out, and then boil it down with a quantity of sugar so as to form a syrup. This should be carefully bottled. A tablespoonful may be put into a half-pint glass or jug, and hot water poured upon it. If approved, a few cloves or whole allspice may be boiled with the syrup.

PETER.—To revest means to clothe again, or to reinvest; but the word is seldom used. In reference to money, the word invest is still used.

A ALFA.—There are numerous dealers in game, not only in Leadenhall market, but in various parts of the metropolis. They receive large and regular supplies from the country every day.

AN ANXIOUS FRIEND.—We understand that Captain M'Cintoch is alive and safe. Letters have been received from him. In the course of last season he was unable to get into the north water, and passed the winter in "the pack." He recruited at Disco, and, undaunted by his failure, has proceeded again in search of the missing expedition.

NELLY.—The inside of the loaf is correctly termed crumb, not pith. You do not put your second question very clearly, but if what you are anxious to know is the nature of a cloud, we must inform you that clouds are the moisture of a cold region of the air, condensed in small globules.

T. SMITH.—Every infant must be registered within six weeks after its birth, by a parent, or some other person duly authorised, giving personal notice to the registrar of the district. No fee is required.

FANNY.—Spermaceti ointment is the basis of lip salves. To one ounce of spermaceti ointment add a quarter of an ounce of finely powdered lump sugar; melt together, and when cool, add three or four drops of oil of lavender, otto of roses, or any other scent. Apply it with a feather or the tip of the finger.

HENRICUS.—We refer you to the answer given to "A Youth of Sixteen," in last number; adding, for your own peculiar case, that the lady must bow to you—not you to her—excepting to return her salutation.

PATTY.—You seem very much puzzled by this word, legal tender; but you would immediately understand us if we called it what it is—a legal offering in the way of payment. Gold and silver coin of the realm, or Bank of England notes, constitute a legal tender. If £100 19s. 11½d. had to be paid, the tender, to be good, should be £100 in gold or bank notes, half-a-sovereign, nine shillings and ten pence in silver, one penny, and three farthings.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARTLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER CIII.

Then your hose should be ungartered, your bonnet unbanded, your sleeve unbuttoned, your shoe untied, and everything about you demonstrating a careless desolation. But you are no such man; you are rather point-device in your accoutrements; as loving yourself, than seeming the lover of another.—SHAKESPEARE.

ALTHOUGH William Thornton had none of those marks about him by which Rosalind describes a true lover—that is to say, he continued to dress, look, and move in society like any ordinary mortal—his heart had not recovered the blow his supposed rejection by Alice Boothroyd had inflicted.

We say supposed, for our readers are aware—or, if they have forgotten it, we beg leave to remind them of the important fact—the letter which blighted his hopes had been written by the young lady's manœuvring mother.

Poor William! he had not even the consolation of feeling himself an exceedingly ill-used person; for the childish affection which he and Alice had entertained for each other gave him no right to accuse her of trifling with him; it was simply one of those delicate flowers such as we sometimes see the plant put forth before its leaves are unfolded—a graceful caprice of nature.

Still he felt the disappointment keenly; more keenly, perhaps, than he would like to have acknowledged. His boyish love had been one of the incentives which led him to distinguish himself at the university; his dreams had been so sweet, and had lasted so long, that he looked upon them as real. A singular error for a wrangler to have fallen into; especially in so unpoetical an age as the nineteenth century, whose hard realities stare imagination out of countenance, and play the deuce with the ideal.

Despite its dogged pursuit of the real, it is a question, after all, whether the true philosopher might not discover a certain amount of poetry even in this present age of granite and iron. The speculator upon change, the merchant whose life is passed in the counting-house, the politician scheming for office, the lawyer with his musty parchments, authorities, and precedents, the engineer, the mechanic; in short, the whole tribe of materialists—earth's last and worst idolators—who, like mathematicians, pretend to deal only with facts: have they not, one and all, in some corner of their busy brain an ideal—never acknowledged, and but rarely glanced at—some sun-lit picture—drawn, perhaps, in youth—or dream, never to be realised, yet not without its secret influence?

We have sometimes doubted whether publishers, composers, and printers' devils—with their starling-like cry of "Copy!" "Copy!" their inexorable reminders of so many more folios being required, and that they ought to have gone to press the preceding day—are quite exempt from this same weakness; nay, more, have fancied—we confess to a highly imaginative temperament—that we have discovered some traces of it even in their nature.

And we were right: life, with all its phases, is but one long epic. The verse may flag, the incidents become uninteresting, or bear a stereotyped resemblance to each other, but the action still goes on—poetry in its episodes, although the theme be barren.

There is nothing like change of scene when either the heart or brain require reaction—unless the disease, unhappily, should be so far advanced that all cure is hopeless. This, fortunately, was not the case with William Thornton. He was not one of those who, on the first disappointment, sink into a state of melancholy or misanthropy. He still believed that happiness might be found in the world, and, since it would not come to him, like a sensible fellow, he resolved to seek it.

Everything had been arranged for his departure; his chambers in the Albany let; passport en règle, and letters of credit signed; one painful task, however, still remained for him—the parting with his father.

The disappointed lover, as our readers are aware, was an only son; and the affection of his parent was centred in him, not with a selfish, exacting love, which bases its claims upon authority, and demands the greatest sacrifice without making the slightest in return—as in the case of Alice and her mother,—but with that generous, expansive confidence which enables age to see its youth reflected in the happiness of its offspring.

Although Mr. Thornton felt the approaching separation keenly, he never, by word or hint, attempted to dissuade William from his project. A simple expression of his wish upon the subject would have been sufficient, but he wisely refrained; for, without seeking an explanation of his son's motives for quitting England, he divined that he had encountered one of those disappointments which leave the heart like some gallant vessel struck upon a rock—an inevitable wreck, unless by a vigorous effort it rights itself, and regains the open sea.

The traveller's destination was Italy; that grave of nations, so rich in recollections of the past that the mind can scarcely bring itself to doubt its future.

"It is a land of beauty," observed his father; "do not forget, for my sake, that it is also one of danger."

William promised that he would not.

"I am very absent this morning," said Mr. Thornton, nervously; "I have a letter for you, which has been forwarded from the Elms."

He placed it in the hand of his son, who, on recognising the seal, the well-known Boothroyd arms, coloured to the temples; then turned exceedingly pale. His hand trembled as he broke it.

"Father," he exclaimed, "I must postpone this journey. At the moment I cannot explain to you my reasons: be assured," he added, "they are not unworthy ones."

"That I feel," replied the worthy manufacturer; "my confidence is not more unbounded than my affection. I make no offer—proffer no services. The fortune I have toiled for is only held in trust for you."

The young man pressed the hand of his father gratefully.

"But is it certain, quite certain," continued the speaker, "that this journey is put off?"

"For the present, at least," answered William. "Perhaps I was selfish in ever contemplating it, knowing how necessary I am to you."

"Your happiness, my dear boy, is far more necessary. I would not purchase the gratification of my own feelings by the sacrifice of that. I will leave you now, for I perceive that you are agitated."

The instant he was alone, William Thornton reperused the letter. There was no error, no forgery: this time it really was from Alice.

If any of our readers anticipate a sentimental declaration of love, they will find themselves mistaken: the writer had too pure a sense of female delicacy and pride. Even to herself she blushed to avow the preference her heart secretly cherished for the companion of her youth.

The communication ran thus:—

"Dear William,—I feel certain that you have not forgotten your old playfellow Alice, and, even if you have, that you will not refuse to see her, or judge favourably the step she has taken in writing to you. She is very unhappy, and relies on your counsel—perhaps on your assistance.

"She will be in Kensington Gardens on Thursday at three."

"And it is two now!" exclaimed the excited youth. "She has not forgotten me! If unbeloved, at least I am remembered as a friend, one whom she can trust to in her sorrow. She speaks of assistance; could the sacrifice of my life assure her happiness, I would not regret the purchase."

Perhaps there was a lingering hope, unacknowledged even to himself, nestling in a corner of the speaker's heart. As he drove towards the place of rendezvous, how the memory of old times returned! He thought of the meeting in Meldown-park, when the snow as now was on the ground, and the leafless trees silvered with frost.

"I wonder if Alice recollects it?" he asked himself. "I think I see her now, her fairy feet scarcely touching the ground as she ran to meet me. They were happy times," he added, with a sigh; "pity they could not last for ever."

How many a gray-haired man has echoed the same wish! Childhood is sweet, for its memories rarely leave a sting behind.

"Pity the world should e'er awake
The young heart from so fair a vision;
Or time the rosy fetters break,
That hold it in that gentle prison."

At the entrance to the gardens he recognised a carriage with the Boothroyd arms, and in the first walk Alice, who advanced hesitatingly to meet him.

"You must think my conduct strange—very strange, William!" she observed, in a tone of sadness; "but do not judge it till you have heard my reasons."

"Believe me they are unnecessary, my dear Miss Boothroyd," he replied, "to convince me of the propriety of any act or thought of yours."

"Miss Boothroyd!" repeated the fair girl, in a reproachful tone; "you used to call me Alice. But you are right," she hastily continued, perhaps to repress a sigh; "we are no longer children, and all things change with years."

"All but the warm friendship, the deep interest I take in everything that concerns your happiness," observed her companion, at the same time offering her his arm, which was frankly accepted; "they can never change, and since you condescend to remind me of them, I will once more call you Alice."

"Oh, yes, it has a much kinder sound!" exclaimed the heiress, with something like the shadow of her former sunny smile upon her lips.

The heart of her lover beat wildly as he listened to the well-remembered voice, and felt the slight pressure of her arm upon his. We have known even the recollection of such a moment startle the sluggish blood of age, and send it coursing through the veins with the rapidity of some mountain stream, suddenly released from the freezing embrace of winter.

"You are aware," she continued, "of the circumstances that have taken place since the death of my poor father, the re-appearance of his brother Allan's child?"

"I have seen her," replied William; "she is engaged to be married to the son of my father's partner."

"And you believe her to be my cousin?"

"No one who has ever beheld you could doubt it for an instant," was the reply; "the resemblance is so striking. If she is an impostor, never did blood and race so far belie themselves. She has your graceful figure, the same arched brow, dark eyes, and eloquent smile. Pardon me," he added, seeing that the warmth of his expressions had called a blush upon the cheek of his companion; "but there cannot be a doubt to her right to the name of Boothroyd."

"I believe it too," said Alice, seriously; "and would willingly acknowledge her; share home and love with her. It would be so sweet to have a sister; but my mother will not listen to me."

Her hearer was not surprised, having long since formed his opinion of Lady Boothroyd.

"Of course," she continued, "I cannot brave the authority of my only parent; that would be wrong: neither will I consent to be made a party to injustice. Inform my cousin," she added, "that I have evidence to give which may go far to establish her rights."

William Thornton gazed with inexpressible admiration on the high-principled girl as she made this important statement. There was no enthusiasm, no mock heroism in her tone; the words were simply, but firmly uttered.

"And you will give that evidence in a court of justice?" he exclaimed.

"Yes."

"It will affect your fortune."

"Shall I permit such a consideration to weigh with me?" exclaimed Alice—"Never! Fortune, I hate the word; it has been the bane of my existence. Not a day has passed since my father's death that I have not wished myself a beggar. These are strange words, William," she added, hastily; "forget them—pray forget them, and let us speak of my cousin."

"Yes, certainly," answered her companion, musingly.

"You remember the day," she continued, "previous to your departure for Eton, much such a day as this; we were children then. With boyish gallantry, that we both smile at now, you scaled the wall of Meldown Park to bid me farewell?"

"Remember it!" repeated the lover, rousing himself as if from a dream, "yes, Alice—yes—I well remember it!"

"On quitting you I lost my path, and came upon an old pavilion in the garden; it was locked; curiosity tempted me to peep through the crevice of the door, and I beheld a girl, about my own age, wrapped in a coarse rug; I have never forgotten her, or the words she uttered, in a foreign tongue."

"Can you repeat them?"

"Mai bhooka hoon."

"And their meaning?"

"I never knew. The rector of St. Faith's once told me that they were Hindostani."

"This is indeed most important," observed her companion; "you speak of a day impressed upon my memory by so many recollections. How well do I remember my riding from the Elms, fastening my pony to the old oak tree at the end of the lane, and climbing the wall of the park; how on my return I trembled lest the loss of your chain and locket should draw on you the anger of Lady Boothroyd."

"My chain and locket!"

"Yes; the one I found, and afterwards restored to you."

"Was it not a gift?" exclaimed Alice, in a tone of surprise.

"I found it in Meldown Park," replied William Thornton.

"I see it all," said the fair girl, involuntarily raising her hand towards her neck, as if to remove it, but an impulse of maiden modesty restrained her, for what might not William think should he discover that she wore it next her heart?

"It must have been my cousin's, the poor prisoner's in the pavilion," she added, blushing deeply, "and may serve to prove her identity."

Swiftly as the action had been checked, her lover noticed it, and a new-born hope dawned within his breast.

"You thought it my gift, Alice," he said, in accents of mingled reproach and tenderness, "wore it—nay, wear it as such, and yet can consign the giver to despair."

His companion slowly repeated the word, despair, wondering what it meant.

"I know it was presumptuous," he continued, "to avow my love, for what devotion could merit the gift of a heart like yours; and yet, Alice, it was my boyhood's dream, the incentive to exertion. I had energies, ambition, high thoughts of winning a name that might render me less unworthy of you. I have been punished for my folly," he added; "your rejection of me has destroyed them all."

"You speak in riddles," replied the astonished girl, "and yet I feel assured that you speak truthfully. Your feelings are too generous and manly to permit you for an instant to trifle with mine. Rejection," she repeated, "my rejection of you! How could I reject the love that was never proffered?"

"You received no letter from me?"

"None."

"It must have fallen into your cruel mother's hands!" exclaimed William Thornton, half mad with joy. "She always hated me, and, to destroy my happiness, answered it in your name. I love you, Alice!" he continued, in a tone which betrayed the depth of his emotion. "Life has no hope that is not centred in you; it was your smile that first taught me there was a love dearer than a parent's, and the conviction has become a part of my existence. You will not render that existence a blank, a void—purposeless and cheerless!"

As these impassioned words sank into her ears Alice Boothroyd trembled.

"Why," she murmured, "why was not this told before?"

"Speak!" said her lover, scarcely less agitated than herself; "joy or misery hang upon your decision!"

"I dare not speak, William, as my heart would prompt me!" sobbed his companion. "There is a barrier between us; and it is better—much better that you should never know how dearly I have always loved you. My father extorted from me a promise, and I dare not break it."

"That you would bestow your hand upon your cousin Illston," said her lover, who had frequently been tortured by reading paragraphs in the papers announcing their approaching marriage. "It was an evil promise, Alice, extorted by pride and selfishness; your heart had no share in it; reason rejects it; love implores you to forget it!"

"Impossible," murmured the victim, with a shudder, "I dare not break it."

"If Illston has but one spark of generosity in his sordid nature, he never will exact the sacrifice."

"I have tried that," answered Alice, despairingly; "told him that my soul revolted at the thought of our marriage; appealed to his pity."

"And the answer?"

"You know him; it is unnecessary to repeat it."

"I will appeal to him," observed her lover, sternly, "in different and perhaps more persuasive accents, the soul-less cur. What! accept a hand the heart cannot accompany? Extort a vow from pale and trembling lips? Alice, the very thought is madness. It must not, shall not be. Had I no other feeling towards you than a brother's—fond, but unimpassioned love—that love would find some means to prevent the sacrifice."

"Do nothing rashly," exclaimed the agitated girl; "nothing to compromise your safety, promise me that. There are still some months before he can claim his victim. I have been urged—persecuted—since the discovery of my cousin's existence to abridge the period; but I refused—turned a deaf ear to my mother's commands—her entreaties."

"Bravely done, Alice," said the youth; "bravely done."

"I am not likely to yield now," she continued, with modest firmness; "I have your love to sustain me, and it has given me strength—all but hope. I have been in the great world, William, since last we met, mingled in what is called society, and yet I know little of its usages. Do not deem me unmaidenly, when I avow that your love is dear to me—very dear to me, for I fear my heart almost unasked was yours."

There are few of our readers, of course we mean our male ones, but at some period of their lives have been transported out of sober reason, by listening to a similar confession. They, and they only, can understand the transport with which the lover of Alice Boothroyd listened to the frank confession. An author, whatever he may have felt, might as well attempt to paint in words the colours of the rainbow, the perfume of the flower, as describe them. Such feelings occur but once, when the heart is in its spring.

Love, like every other passion, is terribly exacting; no sooner does it feel its strength, than it becomes more exigent. William Thornton who, an hour before, would have declared the distant hope of being one day beloved the nil ultra of human felicity, now declared that he would not part till Alice had named a day when they should meet again.

"I will bring Lillian with me," he urged, "and Richard Markham, her lover. She is beautiful, almost as beautiful as yourself, and good as beautiful. You will find in her a sister."

As Lady Boothroyd fortunately was almost daily engaged in consultations with the lawyers, her daughter thought she might venture to promise, the inducement, of course, being to meet her cousin.

"And now, William," she said, "we must part; longer absence might excite suspicion. It is hard, very hard," she added, "to love candour and truthfulness, and yet be compelled to dissemble."

"Silence is not dissembling," observed her lover; a piece of casuistry borrowed from Cupid's ethics, and therefore, we presume, excusable. "I saw your carriage at the gate, can you trust the servants; have you no fear?"

"None of the one who attended me into the gardens," replied Alice with a smile, at the same time pointing to a domestic, who during the interim had kept at a most discreet distance. William recognised the gray-headed domestic who had taught his young mistress to ride, and beckoning him to him, would have given him money.

It was declined.

"You can do better than that," said the old man, respectfully, and with a smile; "take me into your service when you are married."

The lady walked on. It is extraordinary what tact even the most innocent of the gentler sex display, when happiness is the game, and hearts the stakes.

"That will be some time first, I fear," observed the gentleman, with a sigh.

"Not if you strike up boldly, Mr. Thornton," replied the domestic. "I always said, when you were a boy, and used to meet Miss Alice to canteer your poppies together, that it ought to be a match, and it will be a match. She can't abide her cousin. If you want at any time to send a letter," he added, in a whisper, "I am always to be found at an evening at the Mews in St. James's."

"Thank you, Joseph," answered the lover, "I shall not forget your kindness."

The old man touched his hat, more pleased at the speaker's remembering his name than at the gift of the sovereign which he at last consented to accept.

"His father may have made his money in trade," he thought, "and if he has, I don't see the great harm in it, but the son is a real gentleman, worth a dozen of such upstart puppies as my lady's nephew."

The words of adieu between the lovers were necessarily few and brief, and they parted, but not till the day of meeting had been named.

William Thornton quitted Kensington Gardens comparatively a happy man—life had once more a value and a purpose; for the knowledge that he was beloved had given him hope, and there are few of us but know what a dull thing existence is without it. We need scarcely say that all idea of visiting Italy was abandoned. Rome, as her citizens proudly boast, may be the centre of the earth; but, for once, the laws of gravitation were reversed—most decidedly it had lost some portion of its power of attraction.

The now happy lover's first thought, and it was a kind one, was to dispatch a hastily-written note to his father to inform him that the change in his intentions was decided; his next to drive to Mivart's hotel—he guessed where he should find our hero—and send up his card to request an interview.

At present, the acquaintance between them was a slight one: they had met but once—at a party given by Mr. Markham.

A brief conversation explained the purport of his visit; no sooner was it told than Richard insisted on his following him into the drawing-room, where he had left Lillian with Sir Charles, Lady Bell, and the lawyers, who pronounced the intelligence he communicated most important.

"An invaluable witness," observed Mr. Morton.

Mr. Ballam, the eminent Q.C., who, as Chancery proceedings were decided upon, was retained, pronounced Miss Boothroyd's conduct exceedingly disinterested.

"She is a noble girl," exclaimed Lady Bell; "I feel that I could love her." An observation that brought a flush of pleasure to the face of the lover of the gentle Alice.

Lillian spoke not, but her heart was filled with gratitude that one so young, beautiful, and good, should seek to acknowledge her. She now felt that she desired to share something more than the name of Boothroyd with her—the affection of a sister.

"And the chain and locket?" said Sir Charles Fourreau.

"That," answered the messenger, "Alice will have the gratification of placing in her cousin's hands herself."

Lillian smiled, and anxiously looked forward to the day that was to witness her meeting with a relative, whom she already felt disposed to love.

CHAPTER CIV.

Beggars! the only free men of our commonwealth;
Free, above Scot free; that observe no laws,
Obey no governor, use no religion
But what they draw from their own ancient custom,
Or constitute themselves. BROWNE.

For several nights Mr. Meadows and his assistants had been constant lodgers at the house of Bet, but without effecting the object of their visit—the capture of her husband.

The worthy detective began to fear lest his prey should escape him, and expressed as much to the convict's wife.

"Yer don't know Dick," replied the woman, "as I does: he is on the scent, I can feel it; if he ain't found out the crib yet, he soon will; he'd beat the fox for cunning, and, for the matter o' that, yourself into the bargain. Yer may smile," she added, "but I tell yer that he would."

"To-night, then, we will return again."

The above conversation took place on the morning of the fourth day, after the departure of the lodgers, when only Bet and Norah remained in the house. As the speaker quitted the kitchen, the former threw one of her shoes after him, for luck, as she expressed it.

Some of our readers may smile at this and think it puerile, but the throwing of the shoe is a very ancient custom, and still practised in many rural districts, especially in Yorkshire, where the ceremony of throwing the shoe after the bride for good luck is called trashing. The shoe in connection with marriage may be traced to a period anterior to Christianity. In Deut. xxv., the ceremony of a widow rejecting her husband's brother in marriage is by loosing his shoe from off his foot; and in Ruth we read, that it was the custom in Israel concerning changing, that a man plucked off his shoe and delivered it to his neighbour. Hence Mr. Thrupp, in "Notes and Queries," suggests that the throwing a shoe after a bride was originally a symbol of renunciation of all authority over her by her father or guardian, and the receipt of it by the bridegroom, even if accidental, an omen that the authority was transferred to him.

There is little doubt but the writer is correct in his surmise as to the original intention of the act, although now only regarded as a sign of good luck. Query, by a wretched old bachelor, who has been smoking a cigar with us—Has the origin of the custom been lost sight of in consequence of the bride no longer recognising the authority of her husband?

Monstrum horrendum!

That same night a motley group was collected in the lodging-house in the Mint, where Poverty held carnival. Once within its walls, the desolate widow threw aside her cap and weeds; the pious father of five small children, whose white pinafores were carefully taken off that they might be kept clean for the next day, forgot his affectionate solicitude, and sent them with a crust hungry to bed. The fellow was an artist in his way, and knew that a good meal would rob their cheek of its paleness, their eyes of the imploring, anxious look, which, like the aforesaid pinafores, formed a part of his stock-in-trade. The cockney sailor—whose experience of the ocean extended probably no further than the sea of Battersea—shifted the model of the ship he had been wrecked in from his head, where he had borne it all day, and began counting his gains. If large, the precociously intelligent little urchin who, in his peregrinations, rode upon his shoulders back to back, shared in his supper. If not, the dear little tar, who was honestly hankering to fight the battles of Hingland, was sent supperless to bed. Not that the child was ever deprived of a proper allowance of food, for it was part of the old rascal's make up that the boy should look well and chubby, especially as he did the pale, haggard, and interesting himself—or, rather, gin did it for him.

Vendors of small ware, whose industry was an excuse for thieving, area sneaks, fortune-tellers, with here and there some unlucky child of misfortune not yet fully initiated into the life he had been driven to, others who could scarcely recollect a different one, made up the groups at the tables which filled the kitchen, whose stifling atmosphere, redolent of beer, tobacco, and gin, proved almost too much for the well-disciplined nerves of Mr. Meadows and his assistants; who, after partaking of a very frugal supper, which they brought with them, retired—as was supposed—to rest, in the small room they occupied by themselves, at the end of the passage, where window opened into the back yard.

No sooner had her customers retired to rest, and the strong bolt upon the door which cut off all communication between the upper and lower part of the house, been securely drawn, than Bet tapped at the entrance of the chamber in the passage.

Instead of three bricklayers out of employ, the characters they had assumed, two policemen in uniform made their appearance. They were active, determined-looking men, perfectly alive to the danger of the service they were upon. The third, who wore plain clothes, was the master-mind that directed them, the ex-inspector, Mr. Meadows.

"You may sleep," he said, "securely; we shall watch till morning."

"But I can't sleep," replied the woman, who was in a state of maudlin sentimentality, produced by the united influence of her feelings and gin; "arter all you know he is my husband."

The detective smiled.

"Who, if he had his will, would very soon be a widower," he observed; "no doubt but he would contrive to get a very comfortable living out of your establishment. It pays well, Mrs. Fiddler Dick."

"Pretty well for that," answered the mistress of the house, tartly.

"And with such a home he might soon get another wife to assist him to manage it."

Bet's touch of sentiment vanished.

"Good night," said Mr. Meadows. "Should you hear any noise in the passage, remain still until we call you."

To insure his directions being obeyed, the speaker drew a cleverly contrived screw from his pocket, and as Bet disappeared, attached it to the door between the passage and the kitchen.

That done he extinguished the light, and with his two companions patiently disposed himself to watch till morning, or the arrival of Fiddler Dick.

The situation of the three watchers was anything but an agreeable one. Stationed like statues, afraid to move or speak, in that cold, dark passage, whose walls, reeking with damp, sent forth an unwholesome chill, highly suggestive of rheumatism. One of the men had placed himself close to the shutter of the window, his companion by the door, both ready to pounce upon their prey in the event of his making his appearance, of which as the hours dragged on they began to despair. As for their chief, no amount of disappointment could weary his patience; he must not only have possessed a talent, but a positive taste for the profession to which he had devoted himself.

Virtue, they say, is its own reward—a melancholy truth, for in this world it rarely receives any other; we say rarely, for the exception occurred in the present instance. Just as they were about to abandon all hope of effecting the capture for that night, a low, hissing noise broke gently on their ears.

The officers were instantly on the alert; they recognised the peculiar sound made by a spring saw as its teeth bite into the iron.

Evidently some one was attempting from the outside of the house to cut through the bolt of the shutter. The men scarcely ventured to draw their breath.

Several times during the operation the saw was withdrawn, and there was a pause in the work, at which the experienced Mr. Meadows, however, felt no alarm lest the operator should escape. He knew that it could only be for the purpose of oiling the instrument. He proved right in his calculation; it was speedily introduced again.

As a slight click announced the completion of the operation, he gently drew a pair of handcuffs from his pocket; not stout, vulgar bracelets, such as any ordinary detective might carry, but delicately finished instruments of steel, that locked with a spring.

In the field how frequently have we marked the difference between the young and old sportsman: the first, all impetuosity and eagerness, frequently loses his bird by impatience; the latter waits tranquilly till it is fairly on the wing, takes his aim coolly, and bags his game, without bustle, haste, or exertion; as if the affair were a mere matter of course. Nothing but his Manton misfiring can disappoint him.

Mr. Meadows and his assistants were old sportsmen; they betrayed neither haste, excitement, nor impatience, but remained cool and collected till their bird should rise; in other words, it was not till the shutter was pushed open, the sash raised, and Fiddler Dick within the passage, that the two officers pounced upon him. To seize his arms, bring his wrists together, whilst the ex-inspector passed the handcuffs, was the work of an instant.

"That will do," said Mr. Meadows, satisfied by the click of the instrument that his prisoner was secured.

The mountebank was, literally speaking, so taken by surprise, that for several instants the power of utterance was denied him. His first sign of returning self-possession was to give vent to his feelings by an oath: the next, to make a desperate dash at the window to regain his liberty.

The movement was intercepted.

"Quiet, quiet!" said the captor, much in the tone of a groom addressing a restive horse; "it's of no use."

"What is this for?" demanded the ruffian.

"You will know in good time," was the reply.

"A man may break into his own house," added the prisoner, "when he ain't got no key; there's no law agin that, I suppose?"

"Certainly not," answered Mr. Meadows; "the observation shows a nice appreciation of the law."

By this time the speaker had unbarred the door, and admitted Bet and the servant Norah, who had been waiting the event.

The latter brought a light with her.

When husband and wife met there was something truly fiendlike in the expression of both—hate, impotent rage, and a ferocious thirst for revenge in the countenance of the former; a mocking grin of triumph on the features of the latter.

The woman was the first to break silence.

"I don't think yer will come back agin this time, Dick," she exclaimed; "it's for life now."

The prisoner shuddered.

As yet not a word had been said respecting the murder of Andrew Silex or the robbery at the Home Farm, and he began to recover courage.

"I ain't done nothink," he observed, "and this house is mine."

Bet set up a hearty laugh—the assertion seemed to tickle her fancy.

"Yourn, is it?" she said; "well, p'raps 'tis; pity you won't have much time to enjoy it. A comfortable crib, Dick—very comfortable."

Mr. Meadows had no wish to prolong the scene; for him the excitement of the chase was over.

"Is this your husband?" he asked.

"That's him."

"I told yer so," said the prisoner; "yer can't do nothink to a man for breaking into his own house." His wife laughed again—she evidently enjoyed the joke exceedingly.

"Certainly not," replied the officer; "but the same immunity does not extend to breaking into the houses of other persons."

"Or cuttin' a throat," added Bet.

The countenance of Fiddler Dick changed fearfully: he felt that it was all up with him, and experienced, by anticipation, no doubt, a certain very unpleasant choking sensation in the throat.

One of the officers held the light, while Mr. Meadows proceeded to search his prisoner. The first article taken from him was a large knife, such as butchers and pig-jobbers use. It was evidently quite new. Bet guessed the purpose for which it had been purchased, and congratulated herself upon her escape. A short pipe, tobacco-pouch, twenty-three sovereigns, and a handful of loose silver, completed the inventory of the pockets.

"Them's mine!" exclaimed the woman, greedily.

"Patience, patience!" replied the detective; "the law will decide."

"Law!" interrupted Bet, indignantly; "ain't I as good as his viddy?"

"Not yet, my good woman; whatever you soon may be. Come," he said, turning to the wretched prisoner, "where is it?"

"Where's wot?"

"The parchment stolen from the Home Farm."

"Don't know what you mean. I ain't got no parchment, and know nothink about the Home Farm—never was at such a place in all my life."

"That's a lie," observed his affectionate wife. "Look at the corners of his mouth; I can allays tell when he's a lyin', by them."

It was not to be supposed that so experienced a person as the ex-inspector of police would remain satisfied with the assertion of his prisoner, especially when the latter had so deep an interest in concealing it; the parchment being the chief evidence to connect him with the crimes of robbery and murder.

Proceeding methodically in his examination, Mr. Meadows first unbuttoned the murderer's waistcoat, and carefully felt the lining. Satisfied that it was not there, he next examined the coat.

"I thought so," he said; "give me a knife."

"There's one, sharp enough for anythink," observed Bet, pointing to the one taken from her husband, which a policeman held in his hand.

Despite the struggles of Fiddler Dick, the garment was ripped open, and the long-suppressed codicil to the will drawn forth.

"That does yer, don't it?" demanded his wife, in a triumphant tone.

"And it does you, too," observed Fiddler Dick; "it makes the gal Lilly yer hated, a lady; yer know, as Mike said, she would one day be worth her weight in gold to him. I could a-got five thousand couter for that bit of sheep-skin, at least yer might a-got it for me; that's what I came for—nothink else."

At the words "five thousand pounds," Bet stared with astonishment—perhaps the idea struck her that she had acted too precipitately.

"I ain't a liar now, am I, Mr. Meadows?" said the speaker.

"Perhaps not," replied the officer, "as far as regards the value of the parchment. As to your intentions towards your wife," he added, pointing to the knife, "she is the best judge of them."

By this time the first gray streaks of morning had penetrated into the narrow, unhealthy court; and the officers, not wishing to encounter the mob of desperate characters living in the vicinity, at once proceeded to remove their prisoner, in a cab, to Union-street police-office, where, on their arrival, he was locked up in a cell to await the sitting of the magistrates.

A policeman was placed with him.

"Five thousand couter!" muttered Bet, as the vehicle drove off; "and that gal gets a fortin, and I only a hundred! The cheats! the villains! That Mister Meadows, with his 'ily tongue, is wus than a Jew! Five thousand couter!" she repeated, as if there was a fascination in the number; of which, however, she had not a very clear perception, it being far beyond her power of arithmetic to calculate. All she knew was that it was a great many hundreds—something enormous.

"You forget that big, ugly-lookin' knife," observed the servant.

"So I does, Norah," replied her mistress, "so I does. But Lilly—a fortin! Bad luck to the day I fust split on him!"

About an hour before the arrival of the magistrates, the policeman who had been placed in the cell with Fiddler Dick came running into the hotel where Mr. Meadows had retired to refresh himself after his night's exertions. From the terrified countenance of the man he guessed what had occurred.

"You have neglected my orders," he said.

"My wife brought me some breakfast," replied the officer, "and I—only—"

"You quitted the cell, like a fool?"

"Yes."

"And the prisoner?"

"Has hanged himself."

The detective hastened to the station, and found the intelligence but too true. No sooner had the wretched mountebank been left alone, than he formed a noose by tying his cravat to one of the bars of the windows, and anticipated by his own rash act the hand of justice.

In the course of the day an inquest was held; a verdict of felo de se returned, accompanied by a severe censure on the negligence of the policeman, who was dismissed the force.

As we shall only be anticipating events by a few months, we may as well state here that Bet never recovered the effects of her disappointment; sober or drunk, the wretched woman frequently repeated to herself the words, "Five thousand couter!" and she died with them on her lips.

Norah succeeded her as landlady of the lodging-house, as well as to the "yaller sharl and bunnit." In speaking of her mistress, she declares to this day that Bet was a rale lady.

Mr. Morton was seated in his office, deeply engaged in drawing up a brief for his fair client, when the detective was announced. The astute man of law read in his features that his visitor had important intelligence to communicate.

"Have you succeeded in apprehending the rascal?" he inquired.

"Last night."

"Where is he?"

"Dead," was the laconic reply.

Mr. Morton both felt and looked disappointed.

"It was not my fault," continued the detective. "I directed an officer to remain in the cell with him. It is impossible to find brains for all the force."

"A suicide?" observed the lawyer.

"Yes."

"And the parchment?" demanded the gentleman, eagerly.

Mr. Meadows drew it from his pocket and placed it in the hands of his employer, who hastily perused it.

"As I suspected!" he exclaimed, in a joyous tone. "In the event of Sir Norman's death without male heirs, the issue of Allan Boothroyd come in for an equal share of the property. As for the ruffian's death, Meadows," he continued, "it is not likely to prove of any great consequence. A public example has been lost, that's all."

The ex-inspector observed that they were becoming rare.

"The rarer the better," replied the lawyer; "you have managed this affair capitally: shown more than tact—positive genius."

Opening his cheque-book, the speaker drew for a sum so liberal, that it astonished even Mr. Meadows.

"Are you satisfied?" demanded Morton.

"Perfectly," said the latter, pocketing the cheque. "I need not say that you may command my services day or night, in any affair on which you may require them. I am amply paid."

The lawyer once more carefully perused the codicil, which, as a matter of course, it was necessary to prove at once.

"One step more," he said, "only one, and the right of Lillian to half the Meldown estates will be as clear as the sun at noonday."

That step was the discovery of some legal proof of her father's marriage, without which all that had hitherto been done was useless.

THE brave only know how to forgive; it is the most refined and generous pitch of virtue human nature can arrive at. Cowards have done good and kind actions—cowards have fought, nay, sometimes conquered; but a coward never forgave: it is not in his nature; the power of doing it only flows from a strength and greatness of soul conscious of defending every fruitless attempt to interrupt its happiness.

TOO LATE.

She is dying—her lamp of life is flickering,
Faint is its light;
Damp are the heavy curls that cluster round
Her brow so white;
Damp with the drops which herald the approach
Of Death's cold, starless night.

Her pale lips move—she speaks—and bending low
We hear her say:
"Alas! in vain I wish to see him now,
He's far away;
In bitter anger my love from me departed,
He will not come to-day."

"Tell him his hasty words were harsh and cruel,
When last we met;
Tell him that many a weary hour I've passed,
With keen regret
For my companion—while Hope would sometimes whisper, There's joy in the future yet."

"Tell him I leave for him love and forgiveness,
And now—Good-bye."
Meekly she folds her hands—a tear-drop dims
Her darkening eye;
Then her pure, gentle spirit wings its flight,
To realms of light on high.

Hark! there are footsteps hurriedly approaching
The garden gate;
Nearer they come—her lover comes to greet her;
(Inexorable Fate!)
The white-robed form no welcome has to give him!
He comes too late—too late.

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

TO YOUNG MEN: MANNERS AND DRESS.

It is well for young men to obtain, at the very beginning of their start in life, some idea of the value of politeness. There are some to whom urbanity is natural. They are born so—they grow up so—are so, under all circumstances, to the end of their lives. They go easily, pleasantly, and agreeably through life, as though by a necessity of their nature. Every vain man is pleased with them, for their habit is that of universal compliance. They never say "No." They always agree. Contradiction is a sin of which they are never guilty.

But this is not real politeness. The genuine article is as essential to success—especially enjoyable success—as integrity, industry, or any other thing which is positively indispensable. All machinery is ruined by friction, and it is necessary to apply, very frequently, a lubricating fluid. Politeness, or civility, or urbanity—whichever you please to call it—is the oil which preserves the machinery of society from destruction. We must bend to one another; we must step aside, now and then, and allow others to pass; we must ignore this or that personal peculiarity; we must learn to speak pleasantly when irritated, and to do many things, which may be hard to do, in order to avoid collision. In a world of selfish interest and selfish pursuits, where every man is intent on his own special good, we must adapt ourselves to the circumstances in which we find ourselves placed, and nothing will facilitate this so much as civility. Young men generally would be astonished to find how much their personal happiness, popularity, prosperity, and usefulness depend on their manners.

There are many young men who imagine that the literal discharge of their duties is all that employers can require. Never do you see a smile on their faces; never do you hear a genial word from their lips; and from the manner in which their labour is performed, you would never suppose that they belonged to civilised society. Such young men—and there are hundreds of them behind our counters and in our warehouses—never become favourites with anybody with whom they are connected. Those who have business with them close it as soon as possible, and are glad to be released from their company.

Servility and civility are as opposite as the poles. One is despicable, while the other is in the highest degree desirable. A politeness, full of frankness and good nature, is the glory of every young man. It should be unobtrusive and consistent; uniform in its nature to every class of men. The young man who is overwhelming in his courtesy to a wealthy merchant, and is rude to a poor labourer, deserves to be despised. That style of manners which combines self-respect with respect for the rights and feelings of others, is a quality to be cultivated with extreme diligence.

Our topic naturally leads us to the subject of dress and personal appearance. We have faith in dress. We believe that it is the duty of all men, young and old, to make their persons, so far as practicable, agreeable to those with whom they are thrown in contact. By this, we mean that they should not offend by singularity, nor by slovenliness.

Let no man know by your appearance what trade you follow. You dress your person, not your business. Be careful to mould the fashion of the times to your own personal peculiarities. Fashion is to be your servant, not your master. Therefore never dress in the extreme of fashion. Only adopt it so far as is consistent with your face and figure. That which well becomes one man, ill becomes another; and for all exactly to follow the same model is obviously absurd. The exercise of a little judgment on your part will enable you to adopt so much of the prevailing style in your dress as to show that you are acquainted with the fashion, without sacrificing your personal appearance, for the sake of scrupulous conformity to its laws. The best possible impression you can make by your dress is to make no separate impression at all, but so to harmonise its material and shape with your own figure that it becomes part of you; and people, without recollecting how you were clothed, remember that you looked well, and were dressed becomingly.

An objection may be urged here that attention to dress is dangerous. We think not. Extravagance is dangerous, but extravagantly-dressed people are seldom dressed well. There are many people who are more finely dressed on fifteen pounds a year, than others are on thirty or forty. This is easily demonstrated. In travelling, or indeed in any ordinary business pursuits, we meet multitudes of people dressed in every imaginable style. Here is one in the best of broad-cloth and the costliest jewellery, but who looks exceedingly vulgar; here another, habited plainly, but in good taste, is gentlemanly in his appearance at half the cost. Showy and attractive clothes argue the mental poverty of the wearer. The secret of being well dressed is but the exercise of judgment and good sense—it invariably requires more care than cash; and, instead of making a young man extravagant, is a saving of half the money it would cost to clothe him in the vulgar and pretending style which so many, now-a-days, unfortunately adopt.

FRENCH LESSONS;

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH.
CHAPTER XXVII.

[TSADDY.—We make it a general rule to refer those who are puzzled about pronunciation to the instructions which we still continue to publish on pronunciation in the latter part of the French Lessons. But there is no rule without exception, and we see reason to make an exception in your favour. We are, therefore, proud to answer your question. Even doctors disagree on the subject of the liquid l. All Frenchmen do not pronounce it in the same way; many sound it as they would ll, completely destroying the sound of the l or ll. Thus the word famille they would pronounce famille. Others slightly preserve the sound of the liquid l and ll, and as the latter mode is the practice of the most refined and educated, and those belonging to the "haute volée" in French society, we advise you, in cases similar to that you have submitted to us, never entirely to drop the sound of the l.]

"Do not suppose," said George, "from my telling you in the last lesson the names of so many nice things, that I wish to make a glutton of you. I only wish you to understand all the French words you hear; and I can assure you that in our neighbours' vocabulary good fare occupies an important place. We will begin with some warm side dishes, and cold side dishes, called in French by the strange names of 'des hors d'œuvres froids,' and 'des hors d'œuvres chauds.'"

HORS D'ŒUVRES CHAUDS.

A sausage with truffles	Une saucisse truffée
A pig's foot with truffles	Un pied de cochon farci aux truffles
Fresh sardines	Des sardines fraîches
Beef with tomato sauce	Du bœuf, sauce tomate
An entlet à la maître d'hôtel	Une côtelette à la maître d'hôtel
A entlet à la jardinière	Une côtelette à la jardinière
Two broiled kidneys	Deux rognons à la brochette

HORS D'ŒUVRES FROIDS.

A dozen of oysters	Une douzaine d'huîtres
Artichokes with pepper, oil, and vinegar	Des artichauts à la poivrade
Butter	Du beurre
Radishes	Des radis
Sardines	Des sardines
Strasbourg pies	Un pâté de foie gras

"Observe," remarked the teacher, "that La cuisine Française, or French cookery, furnishes a fruitful field for idioms. We find one at the very beginning. The literal translation of cuisine Française is French kitchen; but you must bear in mind it means French cookery. You recollect that in the last lesson I told you how with, instead of being translated avec, is rendered by aux; that is, before a noun, masculine plural: for instance, 'A pigeon with peas,' 'Un pigeon aux pois.' With is also translated aux for the feminine plural, thus 'A sole with small herbs,' 'Une sole aux fines herbes.' In the sense we are now considering, the with for the masculine singular is au, for the feminine singular à la, and for a noun in the singular beginning with a vowel or an h mute à l'. Now for the examples:—'An omelet with rum,' 'Une omelette au rhum;' 'Endive with cream,' 'De la chicorée à la crème;' 'Trout with oil,' 'Une truite à l'huile.'

"I am tempted to enliven you with a little anecdote in which Miss Prig is introduced; and I am the more willing to do this because the anecdote introduces a very peculiar French idiom.

"Last night, I met Miss Prig at a small tea-party. She questioned me about your progress in French, and lamented your not having been kept for six months at the article. Then we talked of France, Paris, and, as it happened, of French cookery. I remarked I was very fond of a 'côtelette à la maître d'hôtel.' At this remark, Miss Prig seemed quite shocked; and, after a little hesitation, she expressed herself as follows:—

"Excuse me, sir, but I must put you right about the article you have just employed. Surely, you should have said 'au maître d'hôtel,' not 'à la maître d'hôtel.' You will not deny that maître, master, is masculine, and that the article must agree with the noun."

"I admit all you have stated, Miss Prig; nevertheless, I cannot own myself in error."

"By this time Miss Prig had become heated and excited. The attention of the company was directed towards us, and the mistress of the house smilingly asked what was the point at issue. On being informed, she said she did not know much of French; but it seemed to her that Miss Prig had the best of the argument. On this, the learned Miss Prig cast triumphant glances around her, and very contemptuous ones at me.

"Luckily," said our hostess, "I have a French cookery book, recently published. Let us refer to this book to decide the question."

"We agreed; and lo and behold, 'côtelette à la maître d'hôtel,' and 'maquereau (mackerel) à la maître d'hôtel,' were repeatedly mentioned in the French cookery book. It was allowed I must be right, and that the expression was idiomatic. I was asked to endeavour to explain it.

"This expression of 'à la maître,' said I, "is a contraction of 'à la mode' or 'à la façon du maître.' à la is always used where la mode, the fashion or manner, is understood. In like manner we say 'à la St. Jean,' for midsummer; meaning 'à la fête de St. Jean,' at 'the festival of St. John.' The company thanked me for the explanation, and said I had made the case perfectly clear. Miss Prig was still red with rage, and declared she should immediately withdraw, and refer to some excellent authorities, that would yet prove her to be in the right.

"Your exercise, Robert, is on the rule I explained yesterday; so now write out the list of those adjectives that acquire a different meaning according to their position, and I wish you to learn the names of these adjectives by heart. In order to give you time to do so, we can put off the 'Voyage à Paris' till next lesson."

ADJECTIVES THAT CHANGE IN MEANING ACCORDING TO THEIR POSITION.

FRENCH.	ENGLISH.
Un honnête homme	An honest man
Un homme honnête	A polite man
Un malhonnête homme	A dishonest man
Un homme malhonnête	A man of ill-breeding
Un méchant épigramme	A flat epigram
Un épigramme méchant	A wicked epigram
Un grand homme	A great man
Un homme grand	A tall man
Un petit homme	A small man
Un homme petit	A mean man
Un bon homme	A simple-minded man
Un homme bon	A good man
Un brave homme	An honest man
Un homme brave	A brave man
D'une commune voix	Unanimously
Une voix commune	A common voice
Une sage femme	A midwife
Une femme sage	A wise woman
Une grosse femme	A stout woman
Une femme grosse	A woman in the family-way
Un galant homme	A gentlemanly man
Un homme galant	A gallant man
Un gentilhomme	A nobleman
Un homme gentil	An agreeable man
De nouveau vin	Some other kind of wine
Du vin nouveau	Wine newly made
Un pauvre auteur	A poor, inferior author
Un auteur pauvre	An author poor in circumstances

EXERCISE.

PLACE OF THE ADJECTIVE.

1. Your wife is a charming woman. 2. The alarming symptoms of the protracted disease of your mother have disappeared this morning. 3. Circular saws are a modern invention. 4. Square tables are out of fashion now. 5. I saw a lady in the street, to-day, with a black dress, a white bonnet, a red scarf, yellow gloves, red shoes, and green stockings. 6. Bitter words never produce any good. (ne produisent jamais) bien.

LE CORNICE.

1. Votre femme est une femme charmante (or une charmante femme). 2. Les symptômes alarmants de la maladie prolongée de votre mère ont disparu ce matin. 3. Les scies circulaires sont une invention moderne. 4. Les tables carrées sont hors de mode à présent. 5. J'ai vu aujourd'hui dans la rue une dame qui portait (or avait) un chapeau blanc, une écharpe rouge, des gants blancs, des souliers bleus, et des bas verts. 6. Les paroles amères ne produisent jamais de bien.

OF THE SOUND an.

- This sound does not exist in English in its purity, but we hear something like it in the word an, &c. It exists in the French words antérieur, anterior, an, year, antre, cavern, &c. The sound is also produced by the several following combinations: am, ean, em, en, as in ambition, ambition, Jean, John, emploi, employment, entendre, to hear; and, in quant, when; ant, in quant; ans, in quant; without; an, in sang, blood; anc, in banc, bank; amp, in camp, camp; ems, in tems, time; emps, in temps, time; emt, in exemt; ent, in comment, how; end, in il prétend, he pretends; ens, in sens, sense; ends, in je prends, I take; aon, in paon, a peacock; aen, in Caen (the name of a city).

- Thus the sound an is produced by the following combinations: am, ean, em, en, anc, and, ant, ans, ang, amp, ems, emps, emt, ent, end, ends, aon, aen.

646. When, as in the case of the metallic rod held by a glass handle, an electrified conductor is supported by means of a non-conductor, so that the electricity cannot flow off into the ground—in what state is it said to be?—It is said to be insulated.

647. What is the electrical apparatus, called the Electric Pendulum?—It consists of a small pith ball, suspended by a silk thread, which serves to insulate it.

Fig. 44.

648. If an excited glass tube be brought near the pith ball, what will happen?—The ball will be attracted by the tube, will touch the glass, and after having touched it will be immediately repelled.

649. Suppose the attempt is made to bring the tube nearer to it?—If that be done, it will move farther off, showing that it is now repelled by the glass.

650. When the pith ball is in contact with the tube, being a good conductor, it becomes charged with electricity—what may we infer from the fact of the repulsion of the ball by the tube?—That an electrified body repels any other body that is in the same state of electrical excitement with itself.

651. How may we show that each of the two electrified bodies repels the other?—By taking two insulated pith balls, hanging side by side, and charging them both by bringing them into contact with an excited glass tube.

652. If this be done, what will be observed?—The balls will be seen to stand apart from each other, and to be both of them repelled by the glass tube.

653. Suppose that I were to touch the two balls, and thereby draw off their electricity, what would be observed?—They would fall together, and now, being in their natural state, would be attracted by the glass.

THE TWO ELECTRICAL STATES.

654. We have just seen that a pith ball, charged with electricity from a glass tube, is repelled by the tube: if I were to bring near the ball thus charged a stick of sealing-wax, excited by rubbing it with woollen cloth, would it repel the ball, just as the glass does?—On the contrary, it would attract it.

655. What must we infer from this?—That there are two different states of electrical excitement; the one is produced by rubbing glass with woollen cloth, the other by rubbing sealing wax with the same.

656. How are they explained?—There are supposed to be two electric fluids in all bodies, instead of one, called respectively Vitreous Electricity and Resinous Electricity, or Positive and Negative electricities.

657. What is supposed to be the ordinary condition of these two fluids?—They are so combined in the natural state of bodies, that they have no sensible action on surrounding bodies.

658. What is the effect of friction?—It separates the positive and negative fluids, and causes one to collect on the body rubbed, and the other on the rubber.

659. Is the rubber, then, always in the opposite electrical state from the surface rubbed?—It is; if one gives signs of positive electricity, the other, if properly insulated, will give signs of negative electricity.

660. What other explanation of the two electrical states has been devised?—Franklin supposed that there is but one electric fluid in bodies, and that the positive excitement is an excess of fluid above the natural share, and the negative a deficiency.

661. What are the supposed relations of the two fluids to one another?—They mutually attract each other; but each exerts a repulsive action on another portion of the same fluid.

662. Can the two fluids be separated in any other way than by rubbing the surfaces of two bodies together?—They can also be separated in any body by bringing another electrified body near to it.

663. Suppose we have a large brass ball on a glass support, near a brass cylinder, insulated in the same manner—if the ball were charged with positive, or vitreous electricity, what effect would it have on the cylinder?—It would separate the two electricities in the cylinder, attract the negative to the nearer, and repel the positive to the farther end.

664. If the cylinder, when in this state, were to be touched by the hand, what would be the effect?—The positive electricity would flow off into the ground, but the negative would remain.

665. Why does not the negative electricity flow off like the other?—It is held fast by the attraction of the positive electricity on the ball. In this condition it is said to be disguised.

666. Suppose the ball were to be brought nearer and nearer to the cylinder, what would take place before they came into contact?—A vivid spark of light, attended with a snapping noise, would pass from one to the other. This is called the Electric Spark.

667. Under what circumstances is it seen and heard?—Whenever a good conductor is brought very near to an electrified body: for example, if I were to touch an electrified body with my knuckle, I would receive a spark.

668. How is the electric spark supposed to be produced?—By the rushing of the two electric fluids together through the intervening air.

669. When do we see the electric spark exhibited on an enormous scale?—When a flash of lightning passes from a cloud to the earth. The slight snap of the ordinary spark is now the loud thunder.

670. What substances are good conductors of electricity?—The metals, charcoal, the ground, water and most liquids, trees and animals, vapour, flame and smoke, and many other substances, are good conductors.

671. Do they all conduct electricity equally well?—They do not; the metals are much better conductors than water, or trees, or animals.

672. Are there any absolutely perfect conductors?—There are no perfect conductors, and no perfect non-conductors; and the same body, a glass rod for example, may conduct a large charge of electricity, and completely obstruct the flow of a small charge.

673. What substances belong to the class of non-conductors?—Gum-lac, gutta-percha, resin, wax, glass, hair, wool, dry paper, baked wood, India rubber, oils, &c.

674. Is the air a conductor or a non-conductor of electricity?—Dry air is a non-conductor, but moist air is a good conductor.

675. What important consequences follows from this?—That electrical experiments do not succeed, well when the air is humid; the disengaged electricity is rapidly conducted off by the moist air.

DISTRIBUTION OF ELECTRICITY OVER THE SURFACE OF INSULATED CONDUCTORS.

676. When an insulated conductor is electrified, does the electricity pervade the whole mass of the body?—It does not; it is confined entirely to the surface.

677. How may it be shown that electricity in such cases collects on the outer surface?—By covering an electrified ball with two covers provided with insulating handles.

678. If this be done what will be the result?—The electricity will flow from the ball into the covers; on removing these carefully, they will be found to be charged, but not a trace of electricity will be found remaining on the ball.

679. Does the electric fluid diffuse itself equally over the surface of insulated conductors?—It does, when the conductor is a round ball. On the surfaces of long bodies it accumulates at the ends. It is also more intense at the corners and edges of bodies, than at other parts of their surface.

680. What is the state of the case when the surface tapers to a point?—The electricity collects in such large quantities at the point that it escapes and flows off quietly through the air to some other body, or diffuses itself in the atmosphere.

681. If a pointed metallic rod, or a needle, held in the hand, be brought within a few feet of a charged conductor, what will be the effect?—The electricity will be rapidly but silently drawn off; no spark will be seen.

682. Who first studied the effect of metallic points in discharging electrified bodies?—Franklin.

683. Did he make an important application of it?—He did, in the construction of the LIGHTNING ROD. He made the rod pointed at the top, that it might in a thunderstorm draw off silently the electricity from the charged clouds over-head.

684. For any other purpose?—To direct any inevitable discharge to the rod, and thus convey it to the ground without injury to the house.

THE WILD FLOWER.

I DWELL in the haunts of the lowly and poor,
My fragrance is borne to the cottager's door;
I gladden the heart of the barefooted child,
As transient he wanders far into the wild.

I seek not the halls of the lordly or great,
As freshly I bloom by the rude "woodland gate,"
Or under the shade of some knotty old tree,
Where the humming-bird whispers his love-tale to me.

The humming-bird loves me, I know, for so oft
He stoops his bright wing from its soaring aloft,
To sip the sweet honey from my tiny bell,
And he kisses my brow ere he bids me farewell.

The bee, too, comes often with many a tale
Of sweet-blooming flowerets all over the vale;
He sips from my cup—then away on the wing,
In the bower of some other sweet wild flower to sing.

I smile on the berry-girl, tired and torn,
I encourage the wayfarer, weary and worn;
The sin-stained and life-weary gaze upon me,
And weep as I pencil their bright infancy.

Untaught, I exhale to the zephyrs my breath;
Uncultured, I bloom by the roadside and heath;
And when I am crushed by some rude passer-by,
I yield my destroyer my fragrance—and die.

Of me learn a lesson—O mortal, forbear
Too rudely to censure the sin-crushed or poor;
And when some dread enemy injures thee sore,
Raise a prayer for his blessing—he'll love evermore.

DARKNESS AND DAWN.
A ROMANTIC INCIDENT.

SOME years ago, while making a brief sojourn in the city of Bristol, I set out one evening with a friend for a stroll through the city. We had visited several places of interest, and were on our return to our hotel, when, in passing through a dark and narrow street, a female, closely muffled in a coarse shawl—which, thrown over her head, was drawn around her face, so as to conceal all but her eyes—hurriedly crossed over from the opposite side of the way, and accosted us in accents of despair.

"Gentlemen, for the love of Heaven, give me money! My mother is dying of hunger, and I have not wherewith to purchase a morsel of food!"

We were both struck with the tone of her voice, for though agitated by a feeling of desperation, it had a peculiar sweetness, and her language was that of one both educated and refined.

"Do not think me inquisitive," said my friend, in a kindly tone, as he drew forth his purse, "if I ask what misfortune has brought you to this? for it is evident you are no common applicant for charity?"

"Oh! no, sir—no!" she said, shrinking back into herself, as it were; "I never asked for charity before; and though I have not tasted food for two long days, I would sooner perish than ask it for myself now; but I could not see her die, my only friend—oh, I could not see her die!"

"Here," said my companion, placing a sum in her hand which I immediately doubled.

She clutched the money like a miser, and for a moment or two was completely overpowered by her emotions. Then, with a choking effort, she gasped forth—

"Thanks, gentlemen! may Heaven bless you."

She turned away, and took two or three hasty steps, and then, stopping suddenly, she looked around, and added—

"You asked what misfortune brought me to this. I shall seem ungrateful if I refuse to tell."

"Never mind," said my friend; "the recital will give you pain, and therefore I pray you, consider the question unasked."

"Your noble generosity overpowers me, sir," she rejoined, in a tremulous voice, "and my pride shall give way. If you have a few minutes to spare, come with me, and you shall know all."

"Nay," said I, "do not let us intrude upon your sorrows, unless you think we can be of further assistance. You are welcome to the little we have given, which should be doubled if we had more to spare, but we have no right to claim your secret in return."

She buried her face in her shawl, and burst into tears.

"Alas!" she sobbed, "if all mankind were thus generous, how many a miserable being might now be happy! Come with me, and hear my story! I know I can trust you, and I shall rest easier by knowing I have convinced you I am no impostor."

We assured her that we did not for a moment doubt of her being the victim of some terrible misfortune; but as we might be of further service to her we would see her safely home, and she might then relate her story or not, as she should think proper.

"Follow me," she said, and set off at a quick walk down the street, we keeping at a respectful distance behind, and I, for one, feeling an unusual curiosity to know something more of her.

At the next corner of the street was an oil-lamp, which threw out a dim light; and standing near it, in a listless attitude, we observed a man in the garb of a sailor, and evidently just from sea. As our unknown guide drew near him, I noticed that she seemed much agitated; and on coming up to him, to our surprise, and apparently his, she stopped, and looked eagerly into his face for a moment; and then, with a wild cry, she suddenly threw out her arms, clasped him around the neck, and appeared to swoon upon his breast.

"See!" said my friend, making an abrupt halt; "we are duped; this is some trick; that girl is an impostor!"

"Impossible!" returned I, unwilling to believe that such grief and misery as she represented could be a base counterfeit. "Ha! see!"

As I spoke, the sailor, as if in great surprise, partly unwound the arms of the unknown from his neck, raised her head, and looked first curiously and then wildly, into her face, which we could see, even from where we stood, was pale and beautiful. The next moment he uttered a wild cry; and quickly throwing his arms around her now lifeless form, he exclaimed—

"Mary! my Mary!"

It seemed to be all that he could utter, as he fairly tottered with his fair burden, and for a few moments we stood dumb with amazement.

"What's this? what's the meaning of this?" he now demanded, looking fiercely at us.

"Well, if that is acting, it is the best I ever saw," muttered my companion, as we hastened forward and gave a hurried account of all that we knew of the matter.

"Merciful Providence! is it possible?" said the man, looking alternately at us and at the fair creature in his arms, and clasping his forehead as if to collect his scattered senses. "Mary!" he continued, at short intervals; "my wife! my dear wife! And my mother too! Starving!"

He continued to repeat these expressions like one overpowered by some terrible shock, and who knew not what he was saying; while we stood looking on, too much astonished to think of offering him any assistance.

At length, with a sort of gurgling gasp, the poor creature opened her eyes; and looking wildly and fondly into the manly face of him who supported her, she murmured:

"Charles! Charles! is this you? in life—in death—or in a dream?"

I pass over the wild, frantic, passionate-exclamations on both sides, as each began to realise the truth—the one that he had found a loving wife in the depths of misery—the other that she had regained a fond husband at the moment of all others when she most needed his aid, counsel, love, and support.

"Come," whispered my friend, touching my arm, "let us withdraw; their meeting should be sacred from the intrusion of strangers."

Though deeply curious to know something of their history, I silently acquiesced in his proposal; and quietly departing, we returned to our hotel, musing upon the uncertainties, vicissitudes, and romance of life.

Two days after, as I was sitting on the piazza of the hotel, I saw the sailor passing along the street, and curiosity prompted me to address him. The moment he saw me, he came bounding up, grasped my hand, and burst into tears.

"Heaven bless you!" he exclaimed, in a choking voice; "Heaven bless you and your friend! and so says Mary. I've been hunting for you all over the city, sir, but feared I'd never see you again. Here! let me pay you back your money; and will you be so kind, sir, as to accept these two rings for yourself and friend?"

I took the money—for I saw if I did not he would feel very much hurt; but fearing his circumstances might not justify him in making a present of so much value, I attempted to decline the rings. It was of no use—he would take no denial—and so I reluctantly accepted them, thanking him in behalf of my friend, who was absent. I then drew from him his story, which I will give in a few words.

He and his wife were both natives of a small village on the Avon, and had often played together as children. His own father was then in good circumstances, but subsequently lost his property, and died soon after, leaving himself and mother to struggle along as best they might.

Among those believed to be friends in prosperity, but who forsook them in adversity, was the father of his present wife; but though change of fortune separated the youth and maiden, it only increased an attachment which had begun in childhood.

For years, however, they did not meet; and during that time the narrator became a sailor, and acquired sufficient means to purchase a cottage for his mother, leaving a small balance on mortgage, which his next voyage was to clear off. While at home, he and his Mary again met; and conscious of a mutual passion, and knowing her parents would not consent to the union, but were most anxious to ally her to a wealthy suitor, they took advantage of an opportunity, and were privately married.

Charles Delaine, for such was his name, then took leave of his wife, and shipped for a whaling voyage, intending it should be his last cruise. While absent, his wife's parents, discovering the secret of her marriage, disowned and drove her forth, and she took refuge with his mother.

Together the widowed mother and wife struggled along, both anxiously looking for the return of their only friend; but he came not at the time expected, the mortgage was foreclosed, the property sold; and, almost penniless, they repaired to Bristol, hoping to be able to maintain themselves by the needle.

I need not prolong the story—it is an old tale. Sickness and misfortune followed them, they failed to procure sufficient work for their necessities, and on the night when the wife appealed to us, they were in a starving condition. Charles had just returned from his cruise; and at the very moment when his

Mary so unexpectedly met him, he was thinking of home, which he expected to reach the next day. He had been prudent, the voyage had been more than usually profitable, and his share, he said, would enable him to start in business.

"Come what will," he concluded, "I'll never leave my dear mother and Mary again while we live. They're happy now, thank God! and it shall be the aim of my life to keep them so."

He urged me to come and see him and his now happy family, and bring my friend; and then invoking upon us the blessing of Heaven, he wrung my hand, and turned quickly away, to conceal the emotions he cared not to display.

"Ah! such is life, in this world of selfish and unselfish humanity," mused I, as I watched his retreating footsteps, till a turn in the street concealed him from my view. We never met again.

ROBERT OF NORMANDY.

AFTER the death of William Rufus, who was killed by accident while hunting in the New Forest, and while the eldest brother and rightful heir to the throne of England and Normandy was on his way from the conquest of Jerusalem, the youngest brother ascended it without opposition, under the title of Henry I. The Norman barons confirmed his rule in general assembly, while Duke Robert tamely submitted, remaining in Sicily for nearly a year to press his suit with the rich and beautiful Sibylla, daughter of the Italian Count of Conversano. When at length he obtained his bride, ambition was rekindled in his breast, and, encouraged by the welcome he received in Normandy, he prepared for war with Henry.

The latter, fearing for his sceptre in England, found means to work upon the easy nature of Duke Robert, and a peace was speedily concluded; the terms of which were, that to Robert should be guaranteed Normandy and a pension of three thousand marks from the English exchequer, and to Henry the throne of England in full inheritance. False-hearted and crafty, the latter watched his opportunity to deprive his brother of the pension, and to declare war against him. Robert had offered a refuge to some of the rebels of England, and the occasion to quarrel came only too soon. Henry sent over an army of Anglo-Saxons, under pretence of protecting Normandy from the mal-administration of Robert, and proclaimed himself its ruler.

It was true that the duke, after the death of his bride—which took place in 1102—had returned to the irregular life which had characterised his youth; and this notwithstanding his responsibility as a parent, Sibylla having left him a son less than one year of age. Of the disorders which grew out of his conduct, Henry did not scruple to make capital for himself, and this produced a war between the two. On the twenty-eighth of September, 1106, the battle of Tinchebray was fought. Duke Robert was taken prisoner, and confined in Cardiff Castle in England.

Henry soon obtained possession also of the little son of Robert, then under five years old, and committed him to Hélie de St. Saens, a Norman noble, until he should have decided upon other plans. St. Saens, however, instead of restoring him to Henry, carried him to the French court, where Louis VI. adopted the little orphan; while his only purpose in so doing was to dispossess him of his inheritance, the dukedom of Normandy.

While the two monarchs were thus plotting the ruin of the young Prince Fitz-Robert (afterwards called William, and known too as Longue Epée—long sword), the unfortunate Robert remained at Cardiff Castle, a prisoner to his own brother. The anguish of his captivity was rendered intolerable by the memory of the long series of outrages, oppressions, and frauds which had been practised upon him by Henry, from the period of his father's death; by his persecution of his child; and by the memory, too, of his own too easy resignation of his rights at first, to the throne beneath which he was now crushed. Such thoughts as these sometimes maddened the captive, and roused every bitter and revengeful feeling which had hitherto lain dormant in his soul.

He had been confined nearly a year, when he made a bold and desperate effort to escape, which, unfortunately, resulted in a failure. The remorseless cruelty of Henry suggested a mode of punishment from which the most barbarous savage would shrink to apply to one of his own blood. A copper basin, heated red hot, was held over the eyes of the unhappy duke until the balls were destroyed, leaving him in utter darkness for the rest of his miserable life.

At this time it was reported to Henry that a conspiracy had been formed against his life by the friends of him who was lingering out his dreary existence in Castle Cardiff. Trembling for his own unworthy existence, his sleep was murdered by apprehension, and for years afterward, a sword and buckler were his pillow companions. When the dissensions at length seemed to have ceased, Louis agreed to resign the interests of the young prince, William Fitz-Robert, in favour of Henry's eldest son, William, who should be invested with the duchy of Normandy, doing homage to Louis as his suzerain.

This being decided upon, Henry prepared to return to England. On the twenty-fifth of November, 1120, he was to sail from Barfeur. The fleet was in readiness, and his family—Prince William, and Henry's son Richard, his daughter Matilda, and the Earl and Countess of Chester, the latter being the king's niece—were all assembled. Added to these were William's tutor, and one hundred and forty young Norman and English nobles, among whom were eighteen ladies of the highest rank. Just as Henry reached the beach, the commander of the Blanche Nef (White Ship) petitioned him to come on board his vessel. Henry had already made his choice of one of the fleet; but he graciously gave permission to the commander, Thomas Fitz-Stephen, to take his daughter, his two sons, and all their attendants on board the Blanche Nef. The ship which held the king set sail immediately, while the gay young party lingered.

The afternoon was wasted in drinking, both by the nobles and their attendants, who also feasted the ship's crew. Night found them still at the moorings; but when the moon rose they put out to sea, Fitz-Stephen promising to overtake the rest of the fleet. Three hundred were on board, fifty of them being accomplished oarsmen, whose services were put in requisition to increase the speed of the Blanche Nef. Fitz-Stephen himself was at the helm. All was gaiety and revelry on board, when suddenly the barque became entangled amidst some hidden rocks. It struck one of these with such force that the timbers started, and almost immediately the vessel began to fill. Far out beyond where the fleet was sailing there was heard a wild cry upon the midnight air, but none knew whence it came, nor imagined that it was the sound of mingled horror and alarm from the friends who were supposed to be close in their wake.

Fitz-Stephen hurried the prince and some of his friends into the boat, directing them to row to the shore; but William, hearing the shrieks of his sister Matilda, who had not been placed in the boat, bade them return for her. As the boat ran under the ship's sides, the people rushed towards it, destroying what little chance remained of safety. One moment of intense, agonising horror, and the Blanche Nef, and all whom she had held, were in the bosom of the deep; all, save one—and he a poor man, a native of Rouen, named Barnard, who was indebted for his preservation, on that cold November night, to the sheepskin doublet which he wore. Some fishermen found him at dawn, and carried him to England with the tidings. The king on hearing them fell down in a swoon, and it is said that he never smiled again.

"The bark that held a prince went down,
The sweeping waves rolled on;
And what was England's glorious crown
To him that mourned a son?
He lived—for life may long be borne
Ere sorrow break its chain.
Why comes not death to those who mourn?
He never smiled again!
A murmur of the restless deep
Was blent with every strain.
A voice of winds that would not sleep—
He never smiled again!"

Was there no sound in that "murmur of the restless deep" that told of the injured brother and nephew? Alas! sorrow does not half its work, if it lead not to repentance for wrong inflicted upon others.

But who can say that repentance ever followed? Henry's history gives us but little hope. Years after young William had found a watery grave, Robert remained a solitary prisoner in Cardiff Castle, and his only liberator was death.

AMONG American writers there are but few who have excited any attention in Europe; nevertheless, those whose books have been republished and circulated in England have, in most instances, established their author's celebrity. Mrs. Stowe's reputation is world-wide. Her pictures of slave life, appealing as they do to the sympathies of our common humanity, have everywhere been well received. The authoress has achieved a success, which has never been surpassed and seldom equalled. But she is not the only American writer whose works have been welcomed on this side of the Atlantic; Washington Irving, Longfellow, Hawthorne, Willis, Wetherell, and Fenimore Cooper, are favourably known to all English readers.

Cooper has with justice been called the American Walter Scott. The freshness and originality of his compositions reflect the natural grandeur of American scenery; the incidents of his fictions are full of romantic interest, and the characters he introduces are life-like and vigorous—very different from the ordinary heroes and heroines who figure in three volumes post octavo. Cooper devoted himself to the delineation of American life in all its phases; to the description of the primeval forests and inland seas of the New World; to the struggle between the pale-faced settlers and the red-skinned aborigines; to the troublous times of the revolution, when America asserted her freedom and maintained it on the field of battle; he has given us, also, many graphic sketches of sea-life, of storm and battle on the ocean wave; of naval heroes, and quaint old seamen; and these scenes, and events, and personages he has represented with consummate power and extraordinary success. When Cooper failed, it was in the beaten path of literature. When he quitted the company of the painted chief with pointed spear, or that of some honest old tar, and conducted his readers into everyday society; when he left the open prairie, or the world of waters, and turned into crowded streets and the busy haunts of trade; when he no longer gave us stirring incidents and hairbreadth 'scapes, but instead thereof presented us with political or polemical controversy, he became both dreary and uninteresting.

Cooper belonged to one of the oldest families in Pennsylvania, and was born on the 15th of September, 1789. The first years of his life were spent near the source of the Susquehanna, in the then insignificant Cooper's-town, which he describes with so much vigour in the commencement of one of his most popular fictions. He was educated at Burlington, Newhaven, and completed his studies at Yale College. In his sixteenth year he entered the navy, in which he remained till 1811. This portion of his life had much influence in giving an original character to his writings. Compelled by the state of his health to abandon his profession, he retired into private life, and married Miss de Lancey, sister of Bishop de Lancey, of the western diocese of New York. From that time he devoted himself entirely to literary pursuits, only interrupting the "even tenor of his way" by several trips to Europe, and a long stay at Lyons. He filled the office of United States consul at Lyons for several years.

His first novel was published in 1821. It was partially successful in America, but is scarcely known in Europe. It was intended to represent English life, but the young author drawing rather on the resources of what he had read than of what he had actually seen, produced a hybrid composition that gave no indication of his subsequent popularity. Profiting by this failure, he turned his thoughts to a new topic—to an unexplored region in every sense of that phrase, and produced a novel of remarkable originality. But so little was expected from the publication of this novel, that the first volume was printed several months before the author felt sufficient inducement to write a line of the second. America was indifferent to her own history or condition. She felt no interest in a novel which described the establishment of her great republic: she preferred the wonders of other lands, and would not believe that the materials for romance lay close at hand. When, however, people read the new novel by the new author, they were delighted, and rapidly overcame their old prejudice. Europe indorsed the verdict, and the reputation of James Fenimore Cooper extended far and wide. The success which he had achieved in describing American forest life attended him when he produced a story of the sea. But Cooper did not attempt nautical romance without much hesitation. He had great experience of seafaring life, but it was possible and even probable that he might blunder in technicalities. Before he gave his first sea novel to the world, he consulted an old tar—a regular old salt—who listened with considerable attention. After awhile, he became uneasy, shifted his position, made a sort of quarter-deck walk—he was evidently so carried away by the description that he forgot where he was, and cried out—"that's all very well, shipmate, but why not point the mainsail!"

The accuracy of all the accessories of a novel are exceedingly important, and in numerous cases are sadly neglected. The technicalities of a trade or profession are recklessly employed without much regard to their signification, and characters are made to give directions or suggest remedies, such as no man would give acquainted with the common rudiments of the business which the character is supposed to follow. It was not so with Fenimore Cooper or Walter Scott; at all events, their blunders in this respect were exceptional, for both writers took pains to ascertain the propriety of the technical phrases which they employed before they issued them to the world.

All Cooper's stories are distinguished by an open, frank style, and by the delicate manner in which abuses are exposed. In some of his heroines we might desire a little more animation, but there is a gentle and devoted spirit in all which makes up for what they lose in brilliancy. Of the merits of his novels no doubt can be entertained, though the preference may fairly be given to his earlier productions. Such characters as Hawk Eye, Leather Stocking, Long Tom Coffin, and Hetty Hunter are the creations of no ordinary genius.

Independently of his numerous fictions, Cooper published several other works; among them we may mention his "Letters on the United States of America," and the account of his European travels.

On his return from Europe in 1833, Cooper retired to his native place, and for many years resided in the old house which his father had built at Cooper's-town.

There he struggled manfully against disease, retaining to the last the fire and brilliancy of his youth. He died on the 14th of September, 1851, aged sixty-two.

An oration on his works and character was delivered by the poet Bryant before an assembly of all the most eminent men of America, Daniel Webster presiding.

James Fenimore Cooper is a name that will be long familiar to all who can appreciate literary ability. His works contain the elements of immortality. They are natural—they are true. Experience has had more to do with them than imagination. To all the charms of romance he has joined much valuable instruction, and has never permitted his genius to subserve any purpose but that which was virtuous and upright.

THE VITALITY OF HOPE.

I've watched the pale flower entreatingly bending
Its withering leaves to the streamlet below,
A tribute of fragrance all silently sending,
Far off with the streamlet, to sweeten its flow—
The sunlight had shone very long on its folding,
And the spray of the streamlet had nourished it not;
But still, in the cup of its delicate moulding,
There lay a rich perfume to gladden its lot.

I've stood in the forest, while darkly around me
The shadows of evening were gathering fast,—
I've stood all alone, while a something had bound me,
Which came to the present, but lived in the past—
It seemed like a spirit from out the dark shadow
Of dreams, that have slept on oblivion's sea;
And slowly it came through the valley and meadow,
To keep its sad trysting in silence with me.

But though the pale spirit had woke from its slumbers,
And thought with its magic crept into my brain,
Though many a dirge came along with its numbers,
And sorrow was living within me again—
Still, like the dark embers when fanned into glowing,
A halo was shed o'er the gloom of my life,
As darkly and swiftly the current was flowing,
Light came in the gloom, and peace lived in the strife!

The heart may grow cold in its winter of sorrow,
Or parched in the glow of a sunnier day—
The past may be dark; but the sky of to-morrow
Is never bereft of its promising ray.
Hope flits with a will-o'-the-wisp-ing before us,
Still pointing and guiding, wherever we go,
If swelling life's current—its rainbow is o'er us!
If ebbing too fast—there is hope in the flow!

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,

SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER CXII.

For when we learn to pity, how soon
We learn to love.

Yes, there, in that remote little Highland inn, Larky Grigg lay, and, all unconsciously to himself, Death's dark angel hovered over his head, and fought a fierce battle with that spirit of strong, young life which had never been impaired by excess, deadened by sloth, paralysed by the indulgence of one evil passion, or withered up by one drop of fiery alcohol.

This was poor Larky Grigg's first illness. All the ills to which infant flesh is heir he had experienced, it is true, in the shape of measles, hooping-cough, chicken-pox, &c. &c. &c., but they had passed so lightly over his hale, robust, and pure constitution, and, indeed, over those of Hope Evermore and his sister Merry, too, that he looked back upon them rather as brief seasons of holiday and dainties, than as times of sickness and suffering.

Larky Grigg and Merry Blossom were born before their father had contracted those habits of intemperance, of which the reader may remember he was so providentially cured, by the shock and terror he received, when Apple Blossom was about to be operated upon for an imaginary cancer.

It is an important fact, and one which all parents addicted to intemperance, and yet loving their children well, should ponder on, that the offspring of confirmed drunkards are generally sickly, stunted, miserable little beings, frequently victims to water on the brain, often rickety or idiotic, and that in no case is the sin of the father more surely visited upon the children than in this of intemperance.

The children born to Bob and Apple Blossom during his years of swinish sin, died early and miserably; but the resolution and total abstinence with which he endeavoured to atone for his past wickedness, so completely restored his health of mind and body, that Apple Blossom's youngest children vied in health and beauty with bold Larky and blooming Merry. And yet, in spite of his pure and robust constitution, Larky Grigg's life was more than once despaired of in this his first illness, not merely by old Janet (the canny woman), but by Tibbie M'Dougal, his landlady, and pretty Beenie, her rosy, flaxen-haired daughter and heiress.

Nothing could exceed the devoted care and attention paid to our dear Larky Grigg, by these kindly and simple people. Old Mrs. M'Dougal could scarcely believe, as Larky Grigg lay tossing about in the restless, burning agony of brain fever, on her own Jamie's little bed, that it was any other but Jamie, though his bones were whitening beneath the sun of the tropics; Jamie, still fresh in his mother's memory, with his clustering black locks, his bonnie blue een, his ruddy cheeks, white teeth, stalwart form, and the frank, loving smile that had made him the darling of his mother's heart, and the idol of many a young lassie's, had just such a head of clustering, jet-black, curly hair. Mrs. Tibbie M'Dougal had watched Larky through her tears, that positively bubbled up salt and hot from that inexhaustible fountain of such bitter waters, the deep heart of the fond mother of a duteous, affectionate son, who had lived innocently at home, and died bravely abroad.

Poor mother! she could not tear herself from her Jamie's little bed; and in the dead of the night, when she was alone in her watch, and Larky Grigg grew wild and unmanageable with the fever of his brain, she would soothe him with the old Jacobite songs she had sung beside the cradle of her own Jamie; and she would lay her thin, withered hand gently on his black locks, or pat his broad shoulders, and whisper, "Lie still there, and gang to sleep, Jamie laddie. Ye'll break yer puir mither's heart, my bonnie Jamie." And then, when he sat up in the bed, or turned restlessly round with flashing eyes and burning cheeks, and wild shrieks all about Hope, she would remember that her Jamie was no more; and she would sink on her knees in fervent prayer; prayer for patience, prayer for faith, prayer that she might see him again in a better world; and that she might "Meet him on that blissful shore, Where storms and quicksands vex the heart no more;"

and where

"Adieus and farewells are a sound unknown."
And she would rise composed, soothed, comforted, and turn to her old oak bureau, and, unlocking it, she would take from one of the little nests of drawers her Jamie's last letter—written just before the battle in which he was killed—a fond, dutiful, loving letter it was, but prophetic of his coming fate, and full of prospective comfort and true piety; and from this she would turn to the kind, but stiff and formal announcement of his death, and to the medal that he had won with his heart's blood.

Luckily for poor Larky Grigg, he was quite unconscious of his position and his whereabouts. He raved of Hope Evermore, of his mother, of people who came to tear him away from his beloved—of Gretna, of a cottage home; but he seemed always to fancy he was lying on the heather, the dark sky and bright stars above him, and Hope Evermore either coming to him or leaving his side.

The fact was that though Larky Grigg had not been daintily reared, he had always been tenderly cared for by that truly good mother, Apple Blossom, and the first real hardships he had ever known were those—so entirely unfelt at the time—which he endured during his journey on foot from London to the Highlands, more especially during the night that preceded his final interview with Hope at Burnside.

Of course, to a young man who had never slept on the cold earth before, with no canopy but the star-studded azure sky, the damps of dewy eve and early morn, were most pernicious; but he was so warm in love, so high in hope, he felt them not; but when he had seen Hope—when it was all over, and he had nobly refused the sacrifice he might have wrung from her devoted, trusting love, and she was gone, and he was again alone, with a steep up-hill path before him, and the first glow that attends self-sacrifice abated—Larky became sensible of pain in his head and limbs, chills, thirst, a sort of dread of he knew not what, and a general feeling of unutterable wretchedness and debility.

It was in this state that he arrived at Tibbie M'Dougal's; and though the fire, the tea, the kindly welcome, and the cheery manner of the old hostess and her pretty daughter, had a temporary influence in postponing his fever, yet as soon as he was in bed it stole upon him like an armed fiend on a defenceless man, and for a fortnight he never rose from that bed of fiery anguish.

But, at the end of that time, Larky Grigg, wasted almost to a skeleton, very white, wan, and weak, was pronounced by auld Janet (the canny woman) to be out of danger, and was assisted by her and by Tibbie M'Dougal to get up, wash, dress, and totter into the chimney-corner of the little inn kitchen, where he was welcomed with tears of joy by pretty Beenie, who was engaged in preparing tea and a few bannocks for the puir laddie.

Benjie had had her share of nursing, and there was something so touching, so affecting, so irresistible in the eloquent appeals of poor Larky in his delirium to the being he called "Hope," "Sweet Hope," "Darling Hope," that the tender wildness of his words awakened all the slumbering echoes of the young girl's heart.

Benjie led so secluded a life, and was so strictly reared by her mother, both on account of her beauty and her expectations, that no shadow of Cupid's wing had ever crossed the young girl's heart; still less had his shafts ever pierced her fair young bosom, until she bent, with tearful eyes and beating heart, over the couch of Larky Grigg.

Poor Beenie, as she listened to his impassioned words and most touching pleadings, wished that such were addressed by him in sober, waking earnest to herself.

Benjie knew she was an heiress, and she believed Larky Grigg was poor. She knew her mother loved her, and would not thwart her, still less break her heart willingly. She tried to believe, and tried so hard that she succeeded marvellously, that Hope was no real person but some phantom of Larky Grigg's fevered brain, and, as mixed up with his passionate invocations to Hope were groans over his poverty and plans for his advancement, poor Beenie remembered with triumph all she had in prospect, and planned a fortune of which Larky Grigg, as her husband and landlord of the little inn was the centre, which Tibbie now let because she had no man nor son to see to it, and which fortune, to be happily realised, only required that Larky Grigg should recover, and fall as easily in love with pretty Beenie as she had done with him.

And so Beenie, on this festival day of Larky's recovery (when for the first time "auld Janet" had consented to his leaving his bed), Beenie, we say, had made the most of her Highland beauty of form and face. The rich clusters of her flaxen hair were gathered up by a sky-blue snood; her sweet rosy face shone with honest joy, love sparkled in her bright blue eyes, and with neat and ready hand she arranged everything for the comfort of the invalid.

Alas! how a fortnight's illness can bring down a strong young man.

Was this Larky Grigg? His eyes were large and hollow, his temples sunk, his nose sharp, his skin of a pale primrose, his lips blue; his limbs seem shrunken, his clothes loose, his form bent, his voice trembles. He tries to thank those honest kind ones; and as they crowd round him to wish him joy of his recovery, his eyes fill with tears, and Beenie rushes into an inner room to have a regular good cry.

From this day Larky Grigg's convalescence proceeded slowly but surely. He had no relapse; and in a few days began to talk of setting out on his journey home, but this was strenuously opposed by "auld Janet" and Mrs. M'Dougal, while Beenie pleaded less with tongue than with her tearful eyes and quivering lip. All Larky could obtain was permission to write a few lines to his mother and to Hope Evermore, which letters a packman, who had to pass through the nearest post town, undertook to drop himself into the box. This done, in a way to alarm and distress as little as possible the kindest of mothers, and most devoted of loving and affianced maids, Larky Grigg gave himself up to the delicious sensations of returning health, that mark so clearly the difference between the convalescence of youth and that of later years.

He told the simple tale of his innocent young life over the peat fire, suppressing nothing but his engagement to Hope Evermore, and that he withheld out of delicacy to her. He would have been only too proud to have proclaimed that she was his affianced, had he not feared that until her father's consent was obtained, it would have been premature and unfair to do so.

Benjie listened to his simple story as Desdemona did to Othello's: she listened not merely with her ears, but her heart; and as he made no mention of a sweetheart, she trusted—poor child—he was, if not smitten with her, at least, heart-whole and fancy free.

Alas, alas! poor Beenie!

CHAPTER CXIII.

A strappin' youth, he takes the mither's een.—BURNS.

It was no wonder that Beenie, who had seldom seen any man more interesting or refined than the small farmers and highland shepherds who dropped in at Tibbie M'Dougal's to take their "drap o' whisky" or their "mug of ale," should have yielded her young heart at once to the fascination which intellect and goodness so unconsciously exercise.

Unconsciously, indeed, in Larky Grigg's case; for, had he been aware of all that was passing in poor little Beenie's simple mind, and warm, loyal, Highland heart, he would not for a moment have allowed himself to indulge in the comforts of an intimacy so dangerous to that poor, loving girl.

No knight of old was ever more chivalrous in his notions where his "lady-love" was concerned, than was Larky Grigg, the self-educated man, the son of the people,—in short, one of the million.

To have felt the most ephemeral fancy for any woman but Hope, would have seemed to him treason to love, to constancy, and to her; but he even went so far as to consider it as a sort of treachery to Hope to inspire a feeling of affection in any other female heart, or to be enshrined as an idol in any other female mind.

Larky Grigg, with all that captivates and subdues woman in every rank of life, the suaviter in modo and fortiter in re; Larky, who, though a working-man, was dignified from the purity and nobility of his soul, and the great original powers of his mind, yet gentle, graceful, and endearing, from the affectionate charity of his heart; Larky, with his love of innocent fun, his great mirth, his simple good-breeding, his fine manly person, his language and habits, which, though above his class, were only what every Christian man (gentle or simple) ought to emulate.—Larky, we say, had unconsciously and unintentionally kindled many a flame in the breasts of that sex, which, however vain and frivolous as moralists may proclaim it, always loves best where it can most admire, respect, trust, and reverence.

Many a very pretty girl, well-to-do, was single for his sake, but Larky had never looked with admiration on any female face save that of Hope. No other woman in the wide, wide world (his mother and sister excepted), was anything to brave, true Larky.

He loved Hope as firmly and as purely as Hope loved him.

He had no reason or excuse, as so many men have, for inconstancy, which is nothing but weakness and perjury; because he was of a sex which prides itself on its superior strength, nobility, and truth.

In his just mind, and to his clear and Christian perception, a perjured man was worse than a frail woman, because he is the tempter, not the tempted; and because "to whom much is given, from him shall much be required;" and more strength is given to man than to woman. Larky had no patience with those sad beings mis-named gay men, whatever their rank in life; and whenever he had an opportunity, he boldly proclaimed his disgust of the profligacy of many of his young fellow-workmen; he reformed some, and was listened to by all, because his pious life bore out his Christian precepts, and he spoke like a man, and not like a fanatic or a humbug.

Larky Grigg, as we have said, had hastened, as soon as he could sit up and hold a pen, to quiet the fears of Hope Evermore and his kind, anxious mother, Apple Blossom.

It was no fault of his that those letters, confided to a travelling pack-man, never reached their destination. The pack-man, often oblivious from whisky—prone to promise, and very slow to perform—put them in his pocket, and forgot all about them; and Hope Evermore and poor Apple Blossom were sick with anxiety, and wild with alarm; while Larky was getting very uneasy that no notice had been taken of his communications by his sweetheart or his mother.

However, Larky Grigg was no ingenious self-torturer; he loved the sunny side of everything. He had strong faith and no egotism, and for a week after Janet had pronounced him "Weel ene" to get about a bit, but na that strang to gang sooth," he had formed one of the little household of the small Highland inn.

Kind, dear Larky! he brought his old mechanical genius into play for the benefit of these kind friends. He took to pieces, cleaned, and thoroughly repaired "the decent clock that ticked behind the door," and the large silver turnip-shaped watch—once "auld Robin M'Dougal's ain"—of both of which it might, indeed, have been said, as the poet says of man—

"They were deceivers ever."

The clock, indeed, gave rise to a curious little dialogue between Mrs. M'Dougal and bare-legged, red-haired Shoozie, her only maid, a stout, freckled, giggling serving lassie of twenty-two.

"Shoozie, lassie!" Larky Grigg heard the old lady cry, in an angry tone.

"Weel, mistress, I'm a comin'."

"Shoozie, I canna think what ails the clock. Ye maun ha' been after playing some pranks with him."

"Hoot toot, mistress!" replied giggling Shoozie; "what pranks could I play along o' he?"

Larky laughed, and offered his services; and after a day and a half of cleaning, and scouring, and piecing, and contriving—Beenie helping, and Shoozie, when she could, looking on and giggling—the habitual old liar was made to speak the truth.

Nor was this all that Larky did. Every lock was useless, no door would close properly, no hinge would act, the roasting-jack was cast aside, and the meat was obliged to be baked in an oven, of which the door could not be properly closed. All these things Larky got to rights by applying science to substance, and mind to matter. He also reduced to order, and put into a form at once neat and comprehensible, all Tibbie M'Dougal's long-confused accounts, gave her a clear estimate of debts and assets—incomings and outgoings—and arrived, unintentionally, at the conclusion, that the mistress of this little out-of-the-way Highland inn had an unincumbered property on which many a Southron would live in style, keep a carriage, give parties, and make a fool and a laughing-stock of herself.

At length everything was done.

Larky's occupation, like Othello's, was gone. There was nothing more to repair, to write, or to reckon.

Larky was quite well; secretly, very anxious about the silence of Hope and his mother; tired of rest, seclusion, and doing nothing, or rather nothings. He was very anxious to get employed, to feel that he was making way, getting on, climbing the steep ascent. Larky would no longer be detained, he was resolved to go.

His whole history (save in the solitary instance of his engagement to Hope) was well known to Mrs. M'Dougal and her daughter Beenie.

The Scotch are a cautious, questioning, suspicious people; but truth sat on Larky's brow as on a throne; his spotless soul beamed in those dark eyes so full of light.

Mrs. M'Dougal knew him as well, and believed in and trusted him as entirely as if she had known him from his cradle.

Mrs. M'Dougal wished him to stay; she wished him to love and marry Beenie. She wished to retire from active life, and only give an eye to matters, and direct the young couple. She had no idea of making herself a female Lear. There is nothing of the spirit of that disowned king in the genuine Highlander, but she wished to see Beenie happy and settled before she herself was taken to a better world, as she always said; and Larky Grigg was, of all the men in the world, the one she would have chosen for a son-in-law.

It was the last evening Larky meant to spend at the little Highland inn.

The Bible, which since his convalescence he had read nightly to his hostess and her daughter, was after tea duly placed before him by Beenie—and the last chapters of Waverley were also to be finished; Beenie, of course, thinking herself Rose Bradwardine, and Larky Grigg Edward Waverley; while "Auld Janet," the canny woman, continued to take a lively interest in her patient, and to look upon him with pride and pleasure as the work of her own hands.

Poor Beenie was pale and trembling; and yet every now and then a bright blush would suffuse her brow, her cheeks, and even her neck, and a smile of hope and rapture would break like sunshine over her pretty face.

Mrs. M'Dougal had guessed her daughter's secret.

They both knew, from Larky's own lips, that he was of poor, but honest parents, and had his own way to make in the world; but then they knew that he had good and powerful friends; and the simplest shepherd in Scotland knows the value of interest, and the favour of some great "mon."

Then, too, they recognised genius in Larky Grigg. The Scotch are a well educated people, even in the humblest ranks of life, and in no country are there more brilliant examples of the power of talent and industry in raising men to wealth and power, in spite of "low birth and iron fortune."

But above all, in the mother's mind was the fact that Beenie loved Larky Grigg, and, of course, in the maid's feelings, love would still be lord of all.

Beenie had been ill, and low, and nervous for some days; though blooming as a rose, she was far from strong. Two sisters had died of consumption, and Mrs. M'Dougal's only sister, Effie, who had been crossed in love, had died at Beenie's age.

Mrs. M'Dougal, seeing that Beenie pined, and moped, and refused to eat, and wept in secret, and was restless and tremulous, questioned her kindly, but closely, and learnt her secret.

Beenie, with maiden delicacy, stipulated that it should never be revealed; the mother promised to be silent, but Mrs. M'Dougal had her own way of going to work. She got auld Janet to sound Larky Grigg, and after tea on the evening preceding his departure, she suddenly left them alone together.

Auld Janet was born a diplomatist, and was so full of hints, innuendos, and mystery, that for a long time Larky Grigg could not even guess at her meaning.

At length it flashed across his mind, and, fearing that she might, the ice once broken, go too far, and compromise the maiden delicacy of poor Beenie, he frankly told her that he was in love, nay, affianced, and that his heart and his hand would go together.

"And is it a lass wi' a tocher, my braw callant?" asked Janet, rather bitterly, for she loved Beenie, and she delighted in matchmaking; and she had gladly accepted the delicate task of bringing Larky to the point, and was both nettled and disappointed. "Is it a lass wi' a tocher, or is it pride and poverty you're about to wed yersel' to? If so, I'd ha' ye think twice; ye'd better loup o'er a linn than wed without siller on one side or the ither."

"I shall not marry," said Larky Grigg, "till there is competence at least on mine."

"Are ye hand fasted, laddie?" asked auld Janet; "if so, it would be a sin and a shame to part ye; but if not, the bonniest lass for ten miles round, and wha'll ha' siller to spare, and wha loves the very ground you tread on—"

"Hush!" said Larky Grigg; "even were there such a maiden—with a princely dower, an angel's beauty, and a heart all love and truth—she would be, she could be, nothing to me, Janet; my love and my word are both pledged, and the maid of my choice is, in my eyes, the fairest and best among women!"

"The mair's the pity," said auld Janet; and soon after she hobbled out to recount her defeat and disappointment to Mrs. M'Dougal.

The evening passed heavily away after this.

Poor Beenie guessed too readily what had happened, and, unable to keep up her spirits, pleaded a headache, and stole to her little bed.

CHAPTER CXIV.

She fell sick as he grew well;
Ha, ha, the wooing o't.—BURNS.

MRS. M'DOUGAL had all the stern sense of justice of the Highland matron; and she honoured Larky in her heart, though she felt for her poor child.

She would not accept the slightest payment from the "puir lad," as she called him; and she insisted on his trying on a knapsack, which she filled with good things, and with which, strapped on to his broad shoulders, Larky Grigg departed the next day at early dawn.

Before she went to bed herself, Mrs. M'Dougal looked into the little room in which Beenie slept.

Beenie lay with her face to the wall, weeping silently.

She tried to make her mother believe that she was asleep, but the mother knew better—she had been in love once.

"Beenie," she said, very softly—she, generally so cold and stern—"greet na sa bitterly, my bairn; a's for the best."

Beenie, without turning round, stretched out her little hand to her mother.

The mother sat down by the little bed, and said—"When I was thy age, Beenie, I loved a soldier lad. He had anither love, and I greeted sair; I was weel-nigh heart-broken; but, mark me, child, he had a winning tongue, and a bonnie face; but I'd have had a pair bargain o' him—for he deserted. He was shot as a deserter, child. Fancy one of my loyal hoose the wife of a deserter. I've lived to thank God on my bended knees night and morn, that I never ca'd a deserter my gude mon."

Beenie shook her head—she felt that brave Larky never could be a deserter; that in the battle of life he would be victorious, because he had faith, truth, and courage on his side.

But she murmured, "I'll try not to greet, mither; but it's hard to bear." And so the mother blessed her, and stole away.

Larky Grigg was off betimes; so early, indeed, that not even Shoozie was stirring; but he found a jug of milk and a loaf put ready for him, and he guessed that Beenie had slipped down to pay him this last attention.

It was not without deep emotion, and a feeling of holy gratitude and affectionate regret, that Larky Grigg took his leave of the little Highland inn. It was a lovely morning late in the autumn. The mountains were wreathed with a soft mist, which the rising sun was dispelling.

The heather was purple and fragrant, and a light morning breeze stirred the green plumes of the fern, which seemed to bow as he passed.

There was one mountain pass, which looked down on the whole valley, and commanded a view of the road Larky Grigg was to travel, for many a long and weary mile. After Larky had proceeded some quarter of a mile on his journey, he turned round to look at the quiet nook where he had been so tenderly nursed and cared for, and casting his eyes up to the mountain pass, he saw the delicate form of Beenie on her knees, her plaid fluttering around her delicate young form, her arms crossed over her bosom. She seemed to be in prayer.

For one moment Larky thought of turning back, and climbing the pass to bid her farewell, but the next he remarked that she had not seen him, and evidently had not wished or intended that he should do so.

He therefore contented himself with a silent prayer for her peace and welfare, and strode resolutely on, resolved to make a good day's journey before that bright morning sun, now rising in the east, sank to rest behind his canopy of crimson and gold in the west.

For several days Larky went his way with no adventures worthy of note.

Sometimes he got a lift in a cart, sometimes a short journey in a steamer.

He always took care to be housed by night. His solitary experience of the heather for his couch and the sky for his canopy, when watching for Hope at Burnside, ending as it had done in his first fever, had made him fear exposure to the night air.

At length we find him at Sunderland, about to take his passage in a steamer for London.

He entered a small public-house late in the evening, to get tea and a bed; and was shown into an inn parlour, where sailors and their sweethearts were dancing to the bagpipe played by a blind old Scotchman.

Suddenly, he found himself seized and held fast in the rude hug of a broad-faced, jolly sailor, with whom was a very gaudily-dressed, red-haired, freckled young woman, whom he called "Meg."

LAHORE.

Both seemed wild with joy at seeing Larky, who, as soon as he recognised them, heartily returned their greeting; and learned that Stunning Steenie—the sailor in question—had that day taken to wife Meg Grimes, alias Carrotty Meg, alias Potato-heels.

CHAPTER CXV.

Suld auld acquaintance be forgot,
And never brought to mind?
Suld auld acquaintance be forgot,
And days o' lang syne?
For auld lang syne, my dear,
For auld lang syne;
We'll tak a cup o' kindness yet,
For auld lang syne!—BURNS.

Yes; it was, indeed, Stunning Steenie! And not much altered since the dear old ragged school days, which his broad, good-humoured, stolid, and yet cunning face, brought so vividly to Larky Grigg's mind, that his eyes filled with tears, and a soft sadness stole over his spirit.

Of course Stunning Steenie, though less changed than any of his contemporaries by the hand of Time, had ripened, or rather hardened, from boyhood into manhood. The nearer we approximate to the Inanimate,—wood, or stone, or iron,—the less are the traces of the hand of the Destroyer to be seen; and so it was with Stunning Steenie. He was not much grown in height, but he was become very square, and of a singularly heavy build. He had still the same stubble head of straw-coloured hair; but his high cheek bones and square (rather brutal) chin now boasted whiskers to match—of similar colour, thick and bushy. He was bronzed by the sun, and had been weatherbeaten in every zone.

Stunning Steenie was now a sailor, and a very good one too. His straw-coloured eyelashes still gave a curious expression to the very light blue eyes, in which was a sort of dogged craftiness and sly humour. And though the expression of his large mouth was vulpine, yet with the ferocity was a something of that resolution and firmness which are such great elements of courage.

The waistcoat to which he owed his nickname of Stunning Steenie, and which had served him so well in so many capacities (until he was fitted out at her Majesty's expense in good sailor toggery), had found its way, after many vicissitudes, to Rag Fair, where, though in the sere and yellow leaf, it was the admired of all beholders, and was ultimately purchased as a wedding waistcoat by old Blarney, the dog-stealer, when at seventy he took to himself a third wife of twenty, (luckily for her) blind, and not quite right in the head. But the early love of finery had never forsaken Steenie, and he was a perfect peacock on his wedding day. "None are all evil," and even Stunning Steenie had a corner in his hard, narrow heart, where were stowed away some dear old faces, some good precepts, a few texts of scripture (those that adorned the ragged school walls), a few old saws and modern instances; a memory, half love, half reverence, of Mr. Stephens; an image with golden hair, upturned blue eyes, and raised forefinger, round which was the halo painters give to their saints; and the bright, good, clever face of fun-loving, yet God-fearing, Larky Grigg.

It was, therefore, with awkward, yet hearty joy, that Stunning Steenie shook Larky Grigg's hand, and introduced Meg Grimes, alias Potato Heels, alias Carrotty Meg, as his bride.

Carrotty Meg was all blushes, giggle, and white satin ribbons. She seemed desperately fond of her husband, whom she kept pulling by the ears or the whiskers, till she brought the water into his eyes, and the frown to his low brow, and who excused her to Larky Grigg by saying,

"Meg wor allys a rum un, as thee knows, Larky. They says time works wonders. It hain't worked none on she. She be just the same mischievous gal as you used to find it so unkinmon hard to lick at ragged school."

"He never did lick me!" laughed Meg, showing her white tusk-like teeth, which the sealing-wax red of her gums and lips rendered like those of some wild beast. "And the best man as ever wore a head, Steenie, had better not try that on, for he'll find it no go. Two can play at that game, Steenie!"

"Yes," grinned Steenie, "but only one can beat."

"And you ain't that one!" retorted Meg.

"You must only try now," said Larky, "to beat each other in kindness, love, and attention. Stunning Steenie will show the world that a working man—brought up at a ragged school—knows what is due to the woman who forsakes all to follow him; and my old friend Meg will find her best delights in making her husband happy, and his home pleasant to him. It is not because people are born humble, and kept poor, that they should be rude, unkind, and savage to each other. Wedded love may be as pure and gentle in a back garret as in a palace, Meg. And I hope Steenie and Meg will be living proofs of this."

"Larky speaks like a printed book. Don't he, now?" said Meg.

"Larky wor allys a cut above I," said Steenie; "but there ain't a better chap going. So let's take a glass together, Larky. I'll stand treat."

LAHORE.

It is a well-known fact that the Hindoos and Mohammedans never repair either their private houses or public monuments. They leave their walls to the tender mercies of Old Time, by whom they are gradually crumbled into ruin, and are transformed from mosques, and temples, and palaces into heaps of rubbish. The man who finds his house out of repair, too unsafe or uncomfortable to dwell in—and both the Mohammedan and Hindoo can stand, without complaint, a vast amount of danger and inconvenience—quits it and builds another. This practice produces a singular effect in the geography of India. Cities change their places; they, like their citizens, shift their quarters, and in course of time their original site is left altogether. But while the ordinary dwelling-houses completely disappear, the mosques, temples, tombs, palaces, triumphal arches, and other public monuments, fall into ruin. They are built of more durable material than the ordinary dwellings of the common people, and consequently retain for a longer period vestiges of their original grandeur. The traveller in India is surprised to find the remains of great public works far away from the city to which they formerly belonged. There they are, alone in the desert, while the town or city which they once adorned has moved two or three miles away.

It is so in the neighbourhood of Lahore, of Delhi, of Agra, and of nearly all the principal cities of Hindostan.

For a distance of several miles round Lahore are the remains of remarkable buildings. They are isolated from the city and from each other, and are evidently the work of different ages. Amongst others, there is the Tchar Bardjia, the chief entrance-gate to a garden or park, and connected with an ancient mosque (represented in our second engraving), now transformed into an English church. Since the English occupation of this part of India, a number of bungalows have been run up about these old ruins, and their site now forms the nucleus of the officers' quarters. To the left of the mosque is seen the house of General Ventura, a French officer who served in the Sikh army under Runjeet Singh. When the English first entered on the occupation of the Punjab, the Residency was established in this building.

The city of Lahore is uninhabitable for Europeans. A few hours is as long as its inconveniences could be endured by English nostrils or lungs, and a bungalow in the officers' quarter, or a tent in the open country, becomes inevitable. Surrounded by walls and towers, Lahore is a compact mass of lofty houses, rapidly falling into decay, and harbouring so much infection, that it is in reality an asylum for disease. As the traveller passes through the streets, he expects every moment to be crushed by the fall of one or all of the ruinous tenements which surround him. Every house is of brick; every house is repulsive, especially those where "refreshments" are to be had. The people are as unprepossessing as their town. Some of them are suggestive of the witches who met Macbeth; there are hideous eunuchs; fakirs with their faces grotesquely painted, and their bodies swathed in the skins of wild beasts; there are merchants of all sorts, and in all descriptions of costume, and there are scores of people in no costume at all. The streets are crowded to an extent unequalled in any other Indian city. They are narrow and inconvenient, and this is aggravated by platforms in front of the shops, and by the projecting pent-houses of straw. Through the centre of the street there runs an open drain, the smell of which is most offensive, but which is unfortunately strictly in keeping with the general odour of the town.

Lahore, in the reign of Runjeet Singh, was the capital of his dominions. It was captured by Sultan Baber in 1520, and was for some time the seat of the Mogul government in India. It was for awhile in the possession of the Afghans, and was repeatedly sacked by Shah Zemaun, ex-king of Cabul. The city is said to have been formerly nineteen miles in circumference. Whatever, indeed, may have been its actual extent, it is clear, from the remains of the buildings beyond the walls, that it must have been a very different place from what it now is. There are several monuments of the Mogul dynasty which bear testimony to the former magnificence of this place.

The wall which surrounds Lahore is about thirty feet in height, and extends for about seven miles. The fort in which the rajah resided is surrounded by a wall of no great strength, pierced for musketry. A branch of the Raree washes its northern side, but it has no moat. The palace within this inclosure is of many stories, and entirely faced with a kind of porcelain enamel, on which processions and combats of men and animals are depicted. Many of these are as perfect as when first placed in the wall. Several of the old buildings are in ruins, others are entire, and throw into the shade the meaner structures of more modern date. Runjeet Singh cleared away some of the rubbish, and repaired or refitted some of the ruined buildings of Shah Jehan. But his restorations were not always made in good taste, and several of the old structures have suffered more from the hands of man than from the lapse of time. Runjeet Singh converted the great squares and buildings of the principal mosques into a place of exercise for his troops. He also stripped the cupola of the tomb of Asaf Jah of its white marbles, and used them for the decoration of some magnificent buildings in the garden court of his mosque.

The "Shah Dura," the tomb of the Emperor Jehangire, is very remarkable and interesting. It is a quadrangular building, with a minaret at each corner, rising to the height of seventy feet. It is built chiefly of marble and redstone, which are alternately interlaid in all parts of the structure. The sepulchre is exceedingly chaste, with its inscriptions and ornaments arranged in beautiful mosaic. Even the tints of some roses and other flowers are preserved by the different colours of the stone. Two lines of black letters on a ground of white marble announce the name and title of the conqueror of the world—Jehangire; and about a hundred different words in Arabic and Persian, with the single signification of God, are distributed on various parts of the tomb. The building is paved with mosaic.

Another splendid memorial of the Moguls is the garden of Shah Jehan. It is about half a mile in length, and has three terraces, each rising above the other. It is intersected by a canal brought from a considerable distance, and is ornamented and refreshed with a number of fountains.

But while these remains strikingly contrast with the miserable aspect of the modern city, Lahore may still rise to a far higher description of civilisation than that with which it was acquainted in its palmiest days. Under English rule, a visible improvement has already taken place, and we may confidently anticipate a bright future for this important city of the Punjab.

THE MERMAID'S MESSAGE.

UNDER the ocean waves afar,
Beyond the light of sun or star,
A mermaid spied from her coral cell
The telegraph cable as it fell.

Skirting the jagged ledges it came,
Dropping down like a thread of flame,
Breaking the branches off the trees
That grow in groves down under the seas.

She looked, and wondered what could be Dropping so strangely into the sea;
Then gliding forth from her coral cell
To where the sensitive cable fell.

She touched it with inquisitive hand—
Instant her heart-beat throbbed through the land,
Baffling awhile the sages' means—
The mermaid's message preceded the Queen's.

The Matron.

NO. XLIV.

To make money and to save money should be the watchwords of all those who wish to be in comfortable pecuniary circumstances. Those who are already pretty well off may only care about saving money, and they will probably avail themselves of my hints and directions about dressmaking (or any other art applicable for use or ornament) merely as pleasant occupation, or for the advantage of themselves and families; others may be glad to listen to instructions respecting arts, by means of which they may earn a livelihood.

It will be remembered that dressmaking was the subject I was discussing.

I suppose that you have procured your material, and that your work-basket is furnished with all the necessary articles and utensils—viz., a yard measure, sewing silk, and reels of cotton of the colour of your dress, pins, and good sharp cutting-out scissors.

With regard to your material, you will have done better to provide too much than too little. Of French merino, or any other stuff of that width, six yards will be found sufficient for a plain dress. Ten yards of any material eighteen inches wide, is enough for a person of middle size, but this does not allow for flounces.

When you take to the scissors, the first thing to do is to cut off the breadths for the skirts, and the body and sleeves will take up the remainder.

Patterns can often be bought ready cut, that is, in towns, at certain dressmakers', or at bazaars. But supposing you have no paper patterns, unpick half an old body that fits you, and make this serve as a pattern.

For lining your body, mind you do not select stout calico or linen. A stout lining prevents the dress from giving or yielding to the figure. Sleeve linings should also be made of thin stuff. Two yards of lining is an ample quantity for a body with a jacket.

But to return to the cutting out. Lay your new lining for the body on the table or cutting-board, put the old body, of which we have already spoken, on the lining, tack both together, after having stretched them well, and cut the new stuff carefully. The lining first and then the gown material.

A good precaution is to damp and iron out the old garment picked to pieces, and meant to serve as a pattern. This makes it easier for you to cut from it exactly.

And now for the skirt; if you line it, remember to run the seams of your skirt and the seams of your lining on the table; place the skirt on the top and tack its seams to the lining. Beginning at the first seam, gradually go on to the last, which should always be cut them straight, and to hem them simply and neatly. Cording and piping are less in favour than they used to be, and in dresses made in Paris the flounces are sewn on to the skirt without the intervention of covered braid or heading. For flounces cut straight, the allowance is two widths more than the skirt. Thus, for a skirt of five widths put seven widths for the flounces.

A striking difference between dresses of the present day and those of some years ago, is to be remarked in the sleeve, the amplitude of which is now very great, and certainly this fashion is becoming to the figure, and shows off a slight waist to great advantage. In proof of this I direct attention to my illustration (No. 1). It offers, also, an excellent model for a well-fitting dress. The fashionable "bouillonné" sleeve adds very much to the beauty of the costume.

In Nos. 2 and 3 I give illustrations (apart) of these becoming sleeves.

For these sleeves the material may be plain net, lace, or muslin. A few directions for making them will, I doubt not, be welcome to some of my readers.

For depth, cut about half a yard of any suitable material, and allow a yard for the width. At the top plait it into a narrow band, to the size of the arm without sloping; but, towards the wrist, slope it a little at each end, before plaiting it into the wrist-band. With regard to the ornaments for these sleeves, an embroidered cuff (as seen in the plate) and coloured ribbon bow at the wrist look remarkably well; but very fanciful trimmings have been worn with the "bouillonné" sleeve this season. They may be studded over with small satin or sarsenet bows, or finished off with narrow Valenciennes lace, in vandykes towards the elbow and the wrist; but one very pretty fashion is that of putting ribbon of about an inch wide in three puffs of net, and placing them perpendicularly from the top to the wrist of the sleeves; thus dividing it into three equal puffs, the finishing off of which should be concealed by a corresponding puff at the wrist end.

felled over. Then follows the hem at the bottom, and if this is not tacked, it will probably be all awry. Never omit putting a braid or a cord on the bottom hem, this prevents its cutting. In colour and material it should correspond with the stuff of the dress, and, to look well, it should be put on very easy, that is, rather full. By not attending to these directions you risk spoiling the effect of the skirt.

If instead of a plain skirt you wish to make a full flounced one, mind you put on the flounces before you gather or gauge the skirt at the waist, and while the skirt is on the table tack a line all round to indicate where the flounce is to come, and mind you do this with white thread, and with the assistance of measuring, in order to keep constantly at equal distances from the bottom hem. Flounces used to be cut on the bias; it is now a more general practice to Chemical Experiments.

No. 3.

A SOLID GENERATED BY THE CONTACT OF TWO FLUIDS.

AMONGST the sudden changes of the consistency of a body which surprise chemical beginners, the conversion of certain fluids into solids is not the least remarkable case.

I shall describe a very curious instance of the change in question, and, with the view of impressing it more definitely on your mind, I will teach you how to make one of your ingredients:—Take about an ounce of chalk, put it into a large wash-hand basin, and pour upon it a sufficiency of spirit of salt, mixed with about thrice its bulk, to dissolve the chalk completely, leaving only such little impurities as may happen to be contained in the chalk. During the process of solution violent effervescence takes place, wherefore the necessity of performing the operation in a large basin.

After solution has taken place, allow all impurities to deposit, decanting the clear liquor from it into a pipkin, and evaporate so much water away that the body held in solution becomes solid. If the operation be carefully performed crystals are produced during solidification, but crystals are by no means necessary to the result which we have in view. The substance thus generated should be placed aside in a well-corked bottle, and labelled "Muriate of Lime." The term is not quite correct; "Chloride of Calcium" is the designation now employed by chemists. I fear, however, if a learner were to employ the term, he would be apt to confuse the body in question with another body called "Chloride of Lime," which has not only a different composition, but altogether a different nature.

It is necessary to protect the muriate of lime when prepared, by corking it up accurately in bottles, in order to preserve it from atmospheric moisture, of which it is more greedy than almost any other body. Indeed, muriate of lime is employed extensively by analytical chemists for the purpose of separating water from bodies with which water is combined.

Supposing our muriate of lime to be prepared as described, and stored away in a bottle, proceed as follows:—Take some common washing soda, and throw as much into about a quarter of a pint of boiling water as the water is capable of dissolving. Next dissolve in another quarter of a pint of water (cold) as much muriate of lime as it will readily take up. Both solutions will be colourless, yet no sooner are they mingled and stirred together, than a solid mass results. I have mentioned washing soda, because it is a substance so commonly known and readily procurable, but pearlash would have given a still more solid result, and would have therefore been still more effective.

If to some of the solid white powder just produced aquafortis be added, the whole will be dissolved into a colourless liquor.

It may not be amiss to indicate here that the solid white powder generated in the course of the last experiment is chalk.

LEAD GOT FROM A SOURCE WHERE ONE WOULD NOT EXPECT TO FIND IT.

Most persons must have remarked the exceeding weight of glazed visiting cards: that weight is dependent upon the heavy material with which they are glazed, that material being ceruse, or carbonate of lead. The fact is not generally known that the manufacture of these glazed visiting cards involves processes which are exceedingly injurious to health.

Take one of these glazed cards and burn it in the flame of a candle; after a time small globules of metallic lead will be seen to be developed, and will fall. The reason of what takes place is as follows:—White lead (ceruse) when heated in contact with charcoal, is reduced or brought back to the original metallic state.

EARTH OUT OF ALUM.

The well-known substance alum is a compound of an earth called alumina in union with potash and oil of vitriol. The earth itself is the rust of a very beautiful and extraordinary metal, in respect of which a great deal has been said and written of late. Aluminium—for such is the name of the metal got out of alumina—is not, as many suppose, a newly-discovered metal. It has been known for about forty years; though not until the last three or four years has a method been discovered of preparing it in quantity. But with regard to the earth alumina, it may be prepared as follows:—Take a strong solution of alum, add to it solution of ammonia (hartshorn), which done, the white alumina falls down in a condition very much resembling jelly. If the jelly-like

CASTLES IN THE AIR.

I MUSED upon a summer's night
Within my window all alone:
The moon was shining clear and bright,
And all the heat of day had gone.
As gentle breezes stirred the air,
I felt a spell of quiet there
I had not known since, when a boy,
I slept 'mid dreams of rosy joy.

I mused, and then before mine eyes
Came fairy forms that once I knew;
I started back in mute surprise—
They seemed so real, but were not true.
I thought I saw a castle's halls,
Whose gorgeous dome and massive walls,
With turrets reaching far above,
Contained the lady of my love.

But still I mused, my steps to trace
Down mossy path by gurgling streams,
The spot of every earthly place
To realise a poet's dreams.
The violet there so modest grew,
Decked in its robe of azure hue,
That gaudy flowers had curious grown,
And left the violet there alone.

'Twas in a cot, 'mid verdant trees,
Alone a rustic maiden dwelt;
Her hair was floating on the breeze.
Her bonnie eyes my heart did melt,
And there, within the shady grove,
I told her of my constant love;
When, smiling through her falling tears,
She gave her heart with many fears.

Again I mused and smiled again
Upon the mansion's glittering dome,
And thought that splendour has its pain,
But joy does choose a rustic home:
For gilded show is but to hide
The misery of "pomp and pride;"
While love and faith together twine
Their simple wreath around the vine.

material be collected and heated, it contracts and assumes the appearance of burned clay. In point of fact, the earth alumina, which we have just separated from alum, may be termed the matter of pure clay, and consequently is the basis or foundation of every sort of brick and pottery.

So much for alumina itself. To extract from it the metal of aluminium would be totally beyond the readers' competence. Specimens of the metal, however, may now be procured at a moderate expense. It is white, brilliant, of a steely lustre, and does not readily tarnish by exposure to the air.

The earth alumina has the curious property of combining with many animal and vegetable colouring matters, and forming the solid, coloured materials known as lakes. To illustrate the formation of a lake, a decoction of cochineal may be added to a solution of alum, and hartsborn thrown in. Alumina will deposit as in the previous case, but, unlike them, it will be in combination with a colouring matter, thus constituting a lake.

HOW ELEPHANTS CROSS BRIDGES.

WHEN I lived in a country town in Shropshire, about twelve years ago (said a man of my acquaintance), I had the charge of the bridges, and I told people the Old Bridge was not safe, for I had examined it. There was one spot that I pointed out in particular. They paid no attention to me. It was Hough's duty to repair it; and when I found he would not do it, I took an axe and knocked down his toll-gate. He didn't like it; and said the bridge was strong enough for anything. Very soon afterwards, in good time for me, some men came along with wild beasts, and amongst them was an elephant, and it was wonderful to see how the old fellow proceeded. I never saw anything like it in my life. When he came to the bridge, he stopped, and put one foot forward on the first planks, and pressed them, and then shoved a little this way and then that. Then he brought his weight gradually on to that foot, and put out the other, and did the same with that. So he went slowly on—mighty cautious, taking his time. He got on some distance, till he came to the very spot which I had told them was unsafe. There he stuck out his foot, and the planks shook. Then he drew it back, and began to swing his trunk a little. Then he raised his trunk, and gave a grunt and a kind of a squeal after it, three times over. "See that!" said his master. "Push him! Drive him," cried some of the bystanders (I think there were about fifty standing round). "Make him go!" said Hough. "Make him go?" repeated the showman. "I'll give you five pounds if you'll get him to cross this bridge. If I should attempt to force him over, I believe he would kill me. All these men couldn't get him across. Come," added he, addressing the sagacious brute, "I think we'll go back!"

The elephant immediately turned round, and walked behind his master; and they went along up the bank of the river to the New Bridge—all the people going behind to see what he would do. It was about a mile; and, when he got there, he began just as cautiously as before; but, after making a few more experiments with his forefoot, he began to move on with some confidence, and, after a few more paces, took up his customary gait, and walked straight and safe across the bridge.

"There," said I, "Hough, he knows more than you do." It was a great triumph for me, I can tell you.

Small Change.

A LADY advertising for a husband, is very particular to have it understood that "none need apply who are under six feet." That female is strongly in favour of hy-men!

EVERY thought and feeling is a painting stroke, in the darkness, of our likeness that is to be; and our whole life is but a chamber, which we are frescoing with colours that do not appear while being laid on wet, but which will shine forth afterwards, when finished and dry.

How should a miller address his lady-love?—In the language of flours, to be sure.

MANY works succeed because the mediocrity of the author's ideas exactly corresponds with the mediocrity of ideas on the part of the public.

A GIRL at school would like to have two birthdays in a year. When she grows up to a woman she objects to having even one.

IN great cities, men are more callous both to the happiness and the misery of others, than in the country; for they are constantly in the habit of seeing both extremes.

A GOOD RETORT.—"You are very stupid, John," said a country teacher to a little boy eight years old. "You are like a donkey; and what do they do to cure him of his stupidity?"—"Why, they feed him more, and kick him less," said the urchin.

TRUE beauty is but virtue made visible in outward grace. Beauty and vice are disjointed by nature herself.

WHAT is the difference between a young girl and an old hat?—Merely one of time: one has feeling, and the other has felt.

WISDOM is the olive which springs from the heart, blooms on the tongue, and bears fruit in the actions.

A GIDDY student having got his skull fractured, was told by the doctor that the brain was visible; on which he remarked, "Do write to tell father, for he always said I had none."

It seems a great pity for some writers that they cannot steal genius as well as its productions.

It must at least be confessed in behalf of the ladies, that they never before so completely filled the eye.

WHEN flowers are full of heaven-descended dews, they always hang their heads; but men hold theirs higher the more they receive, getting proud as they get full.

A ROGUE slyly took a fish in the market-house, and slipped it under his vest. The tail hanging down so as to be seen, the first man he met suggested to him that he should either wear a longer jacket or steal a shorter fish.

WHEN you receive a kindness, remember it; when you do one, forget it.

A MODEL young lady, just graduated from a certain distant academy, remarked the other day, "I cannot deceive how the young gentlemen can drink to such a recess, when they know it is so conjurious to their institutions."

INSTINCT OF ANIMALS.—No horse ever found a mare's nest. That discovery can only be made by a donkey.

WASHINGTON visiting a lady in his neighbourhood, on leaving the house a little girl was directed to open the door. He turned to the child and said, "I am sorry, my little dear, to give you so much trouble." "I wish, sir," she replied, "it was to let you in."

Two companies are wrangling about the line of a railroad. They have thrown dirt enough at each other to make the embankments.

MANY a writer seems to think that he is never either profound or practical except when he can't understand his own meaning.

WHEN the colour begins to desert a woman's face, she often takes to painting; and then she never deserts her colours.

A PLOUGHMAN'S APPETITE.—A Scotchman having hired himself to a farmer, had a cheese set down before him that he might help himself. The master said to him, "Sandy, you take a long time to breakfast." "In troth, master," answered he, "a cheese o' this size is nae sae soon eaten as ye may think."

THOSE orators who give us much noise and many words, but little argument and less wit, and who are most loud when they are the least lucid, should take a lesson from the great volume of nature; she often gives us the lightning even without the thunder, but never the thunder without the lightning.

GIVE substantial aid if you can: tears are but drops of water—what good can they do?

THERE are some pretended Christians who would frighten us from the joys of this world in order to have them all to themselves.

WHEN does a cow become real estate? When turned into a field.

THE moral cement of society is virtue; it unites and preserves, while vice separates and destroys. The good may well be termed the salt of the earth. For where there is no integrity, there can be no confidence; and where there is no confidence, there can be no unanimity.

AFFLICTIONS sent by Providence melt the constancy of the noble minded, but confirm the obduracy of the vile. The same furnace that hardens clay, liquefies gold; and in the strong manifestations of Divine power Pharaoh found his punishment, but David his pardon.

A MAN in a state of hot-brain nervousness is burning up. He is like a candle in a hot candlestick, which burns off at one end and melts down at the other.

WHAT we call wisdom is the result, not the residuum, of all the wisdom of past ages. Our best institutions are like young trees growing upon the roots of old trunks that have crumbled away.

SELWYN (Macclesfield).—You are quite correct in your analysis of the position to which you refer.

ALLAN GLENCALN.—What is to prevent Black from playing K to K B 7 at the third move, if White play as you suggest in Problem No. 71? We shall always be glad to answer your inquiries.

T. SIMPSON.—Thanks for the Problem. Do you not overlook the move of K to Q 5 in answer to the second move of your variation in the solution of Problem No. 73?

D. T.—The late Mr. Williams won a considerable majority of the games in his match with the gentlemen to whom you refer. Mr. W. gave the odds of the Q Kt.

J. PALMER.—Your first move in Problem No. 53 can be effectually met by Black's reply of R to K 5.

NOW READY, PRICE SIXPENCE,
CASSELL'S
ILLUSTRATED ALMANACK
For 1859.

This Beautifully Illustrated and Instructive Almanack, which has now obtained celebrity wherever the English language is spoken, will this year be found to surpass, if possible, its previous attractiveness. It will contain upwards of Thirty Engravings, the subjects as follow:—Twelve engravings representing the modes of Repast in various Nations and Periods;—Twelve engravings representing important events of the year 1858, including the Capture of Delhi—Storming of Lucknow—Bombardment of Canton—Earthquake in Naples—Burial of the Queen of Oude—the Leviathan off Deptford—Inauguration of the Boulevard de Sebastopol—Arrival of the Queen at Cherbourg—Launch of the Ville de Nantes—Fort Napoleon in Kabylia—Her Majesty's arrival at the Town Hall, Leeds—Removal of the decorations, fountain, &c., in the Place du Châtelet. Four emblematical designs of the Seasons;—Astronomical illustrations, &c., &c. The Literary matter, in addition to explanations of the above Engravings, consists of the Calendar, richly stored with historical remembrances; Chronology; Obituary; Abstracts of Acts of Parliament; Important Statistics; Postal Regulations; Stamps and Taxes; Gardening Calendar; the Government; Royal Family; Houses of Lords and Commons, and other matters, interesting to all branches of the community.

N. B. Orders should be given at once to the nearest Bookseller, as delays, consequent upon the large circulation, have unavoidably occurred in the delivery of the two last years' issues.

ONE ASHAMED OF HIS IGNORANCE.—You need not be so particularly ashamed of your ignorance respecting Donati and the comet that has recently excited so much admiration and curiosity. There are scientific men who, if they spoke the truth, would own that this time last year they had never heard of Donati or of his comet either. We are now enabled to enlighten you a little on both subjects. On June the 2nd of the present year, M. Donati, an astronomer of Florence, discovered this comet when it was very faint indeed. It was soon found to be an original discovery, and that it was entirely unlike a comet seen in America a few weeks previously in the same part of the sky. M. Donati foretold its brilliancy at the latter end of September. It was soon evident that it was situated at a great distance from the earth, from its slow movement across the heavens. On October the 2nd it was sixty-two millions of miles from us, and on October the 10th, when it was nearest, it was still fifty-one millions of miles away. On October the 19th, it was as far off as on October the 2nd. When, on September the 30th, it was at fifty-five millions of miles from the sun, it was nearest that luminary.

LADY GLENLONELY.—We must frankly confess we cannot tell you when the new Westminster Bridge will be completed and opened to the public. You must bear in mind that "patience is a virtue," and that, as the French say, "tout vient pour celui qui sait attendre." We hope after so many "French Lessons" you can understand this proverb without our translating it. When at length we do get the new Westminster Bridge, it will be worth having. Its total length, from extreme of abutment to abutment, will be 1,166 feet; its width 85 feet; giving 15 feet for each path, and no less than 50 feet for the roadway. The greatest height of the centre arch will be 20 feet above high water mark. The depth of the foundation is no less than 30 feet below low water mark, or more than 20 feet into the London clay. The rise in the whole bridge is to be only 5 feet 3½ inches—infinitely less than the rise of the old bridge, since it joins the roadway at a much lower level. In the new bridge there are to be seven arches. The centre arch will have a span of 120 feet; the two next on each side, 115 feet; the two next, 104 feet 6 inches; and the two shore arches at Surrey and Middlesex, 94 feet 9 inches each.

A PATRIOT.—England can lose nothing by acknowledging the power of her enemies, and we cannot agree with you when you undervalue the military prowess of Napoleon I. What lessons he teaches modern generals. He gained decisive victories whilst others were dreaming. "It is always these quarters of an hour that decide the fate of a battle," said Napoleon, when at Montebello, Kellerman, with only 800 horse, separated 6,000 Hungarians, before the very eyes of the Austrians, who wanted a quarter of an hour to reach the field. Napoleon fought sixty battles, but never acquired power enough to satisfy his ambition, although his dominions extended over half Europe, which he desolated and ravaged in the hope of satisfying his lust of conquest. "My power would fail were I not to support it by new achievements. Conquest has made me what I am, and conquest alone can maintain me." This was his confession, and a true one. Hence it was that he drained his country of its very life blood. He literally exhausted it by his conquests. He was as heartless a sovereign as he was a matchless general.

DORA.—"DORA" wishes us to tell her something about the Rajah of Sarawak. She knows that rajah is an eastern name for a king, but she has no idea where Sarawak is situated, and she cannot make out how Brooke, an Englishman, should be a rajah. In satisfying "Dora's" curiosity, we begin by begging her to take her atlas and find out the map of the East Indian Islands, and having done this, to examine the equinoctial line, and between longitudes 110 and 120 east from Greenwich, she will find the island of Borneo, of which island Sarawak forms no inconsiderable part. And now for Rajah Brooke. He was originally an officer in the late East India Company's service, but taking offence at some proceedings of the company, he quitted without leave, and became a daring adventurer in the seas of the Indian Archipelago. So successful was he in his exploits against pirates, that the inhabitants of Sarawak, in whose service his prowess was displayed, chose him as their sovereign, and such he has continued to be for a great many years. He has vastly improved his kingdom, and introduced civilisation and regular government among his subjects. The rajah is now willing to resign his sovereignty, and to allow Sarawak to become a dependency of the British crown, supposing he is indemnified for his expenses in improving the country. We do not think government will accept of the proposal; our colonies are already too extensive. Nevertheless, we sincerely wish well to the enterprising English rajah, whose moderation equals his valour.

T. BLORE.—The name of the new Lord Mayor is D. W. Wirc. He is a solicitor, and a man of energy and intelligence.

AMELIA.—We rejoice with you in the cordial friendship now existing between England and America. A pleasing instance of this feeling was given at New York during the rejoicings that followed the laying of the Atlantic cable. After the national anthem had been sung, the company rapturously joined in "God save the Queen," with the following additional verse, written for the occasion:—

"God keep us all in peace;
Let truth and love increase
Both realms between.
Long may the iron hand
Stretch forth from strand to strand;
God bless our fatherland,
God save the Queen."

In reply to your question about the present state of the cable, the apparent success of which caused such delight, we cannot give you a very favourable report. But you may rely upon it the energy and perseverance of the two nations are undaunted. If the old cable cannot be made available, a new one will be prepared. From what we read, scientific men have now come to the conclusion that the cable that has failed had not been sufficiently seasoned, and that previous to its laying down it should have been immersed in water for a considerable period.

CAUTION.—You will try in vain to get the boy into the school by means of "spoiled postage stamps." How can any person in his right senses suppose such a thing possible? ADA.—You should apply to some leader of evening concerts. The payment varies very greatly: from half-a-crown to twenty guineas for a single song. ZETA.—Yours is a very intricate case; you must take the opinion of a good Chancery barrister. S. F.—We know of no means by which the original colour of flowers can be retained after they are dried for preservation. MARY, W. RIXON, and A. THAMIS.—Two new tales will be commenced in the first number of Vol. III. Further announcements will be made. A HUNTER (Carlavero).—Mails for the Cape of Good Hope are made up on the 5th of each month. T. ATKINSON.—Indentures of apprenticeship, if not signed by yourself, are not binding. G. WALKER.—You can have the Part containing the map of India on sending seven penny postage stamps to Messrs. Petter and Galpin. The lines "On Death," "I Want not Riches," &c.; "The Dying Mother," are respectfully declined. The lines "On Visiting Braemar" possess considerable merit, but are much too long for our journal; try us with something shorter. The same remarks will apply to "Wakened Memories." BEN.—No "harm" may be done by your sending a present to a young lady; but it is quite natural that she should inquire why you have sent it, and she is at liberty to decline accepting it, if she thinks proper.

GROOM.—Wash your saddles first with a sponge and clean water, slightly warm; then rub them with a sponge dipped in the following mixture: one pint of skimmed milk, half an ounce of spirits of salts, a quarter of an ounce of spirits of red lavender, one ounce of gum arabic, and the juice of two lemons. When dry, polish with a soft brush or a piece of soft flannel. If you wish the saddles to be very pale, omit the red lavender. You may add to the above, for the sake of preserving the leather soft, a little neat's-foot oil; but then you will not be able to effect a good polish.

SANDY.—You say you have searched twice, and cannot find the letter d in the lines in No. 38, page 191. Look again, and especially in the following line:—

"And tax his fancy's might."

A STUDENT.—The first Polyglot Bible, termed "The Complutensian Polyglot," in 6 volumes, folio, was printed A. D. 1514-17. The first edition was at the expense of the celebrated Cardinal Ximenes. The fourth Polyglot was printed in London by Bryan Walton, in 6 volumes, folio, 1657. Various editions have since been published.

INSPECTOR.—Touch your warts and corns daily with aquafortis. The corns should first be cut as closely as they can with safety.

TYRO.—The staining of glass is far too difficult and expensive a process to be undertaken except professionally; it would require the erection of furnaces, and a good knowledge of chemistry. Coloured panes of glass for windows may now be purchased at a cheap rate.

HUGH L. FRASER.—The work will be absolutely completed in six volumes. For a mutual improvement society nothing can be better adapted than "John Cassell's Educational Course." And for young men who desire to have a general knowledge of various sciences, nothing can answer the purpose better than the first volume of the course, entitled "Science Popularly Explained." The whole of the 4,000 questions proposed are answered clearly and accurately. Though the volume contains 566 pages, domy octavo, the price is only 3s. 6d. The other five volumes contain—The English Language, its history and forms; Outlines of Botany; Astronomy; Mathematical Science, its logic and utility; and Elements of Political Economy. In reply to your question, as to what branches of learning ought to be studied by a man engaged in commercial life, we recommend arithmetic, algebra, and English grammar; and for bleaching works, chemistry; but we know of no works on that subject published in numbers. To improve your handwriting, we strongly recommend the "Model Copy Books," published by Ward and Lock, which you can study with success without the aid of a master.

JESSIE C.—On Hallow E'en, or Allhallow Eve, October 31, young people in the north of England dive for apples, or catch at them when stuck at one end of a kind of hanging beam, at the other extremity of which is a lighted candle. In Ireland, also, the same ceremonies, with the roasting and eating plentifully of apples, are observed. Omens and charms are connected with these customs. Apples, it is said, are chosen because the next day, November 1, was dedicated to the angel presiding over fruits, &c.

FALKLAND.—F. M. the Duke of Wellington had two legitimate sons, the Marquis of Douro, now Duke of Wellington, and Lord Charles Wellesley, recently deceased. The eldest son of the latter is heir presumptive to the dukedom, as the present duke is childless. "The Photographic News" will form, as it progresses, a complete manual of the science.

DONATI.—The mistake of which you complain was rectified long before your correction came, namely, in May last. See No. 25, page 400.

A CONSTANT READER (Stockport).—If any one has "bewitched" you, it is the woman who has assured you that you are bewitched, and who has persuaded you to give her "different sums of money," pretending that by "looking through a glass, praying over slips of paper which are to be placed in your bosom, reading a certain chapter every day, &c.," she can cure you, after you have consulted medical men in vain. Repudiate these follies, and act more like a rational man.

BRO BRO.—The orange blossom is selected as a suitable ornament to be worn at a wedding because it is a beautiful and delicate emblem of fertility—the orange tree exhibiting at the same time blossom, fruit newly formed, fruit ripening, and fruit in full maturity.

T. BLAKE.—You ought to have been more careful in handling such a handsome volume as "Cassell's Family Paper," bound, and containing all the numbers that have appeared during the first six months of the new series. However, do not despair. We think we can direct you how to take the grease out of the leaves. Fold up in two small bags made of muslin some calcined hartshorn, which is always ready prepared at the shops of the druggists. Lay the bags of muslin containing the powder one on each side of the greasy leaf, and having heated a pair of hair-dressers' pinching tongs, of a moderate warmth, press with them the two bags against the greasy spot, and hold them in that situation until the grease is removed. If you do not succeed in the first attempt, repeat the process.

Z. Z.—We will endeavour to comply with your request—viz., that we should give you "such an account of the electric telegraph that you, who know no scientific terms, may be able to understand it." In explaining to you how news is sent by means of electricity, we must, of course, endeavour to give you a good idea of the apparatus used. To assist your comprehension, we shall write in italics all the parts of the apparatus. Well, then, this apparatus is called the manipulator, and a receiver receives the message. A copper electrified wire establishes the communication between the two apparatuses, so as to produce on the dial of the receiver the movements which the operator, or person sending the message, imparts to the hand of the manipulator. The operator makes the hand turn and stop successively on each letter of the word he wishes to send. The hand of the receiver, by repeating this movement, reproduces exactly the same word. In reply to your question as to the inventor of the electric telegraph, we believe that the first electrician who brought the electric telegraph into general use was Mr. Wheatstone; but Mr. Morse has introduced great improvements, and he originated sending printed messages by electric telegraph. According to Mr. Wheatstone, the speed with which the electric fluid passes along a brass wire is at the rate of 115,000 leagues a second. This is a speed that baffles comprehension. In fact, the swiftness of the electric current is greater than that of light.

ARLINGTON.—We should prefer dumb bells for the purpose you name. Bring them to touch each other in front of your body, and then throw your arms back and make them touch behind; slowly at first, increasing by degrees to a rapid motion. Practice this for about ten minutes every forenoon. You can purchase dumb bells at any surgical apparatus maker's.

AN OLD GOLD DIGGER.—Sovereigns coined in Australia are not a legal tender in Great Britain, and are only worth their weight as gold.

A YOUNG SUBSCRIBER.—Dr. Livingstone's latest communication is dated from Zambesi.

J. S.—Footscray is in the county of Kent, about twelve miles from London, and in the S.E. district of the London post delivery. Your writing and spelling will both admit of considerable improvement.

A Junior Clerk, Thomas, Maria F., W. D. H., need the advice of skillful medical practitioners.—G. T. Atkinson, Lord Wellington, and C. W.: Abstemiousness and cold bathing, especially of the parts affected.—Annie S. H.: It is not enough that the practice is not injurious; it is necessary or useful? Is it not troublesome and expensive?—Marquis of Doune, Mary H., A. Lad: Wash the hair with yellow soap and water at least twice a week, and brush smartly with a stiff brush, the hairs of which are of irregular lengths.—Constance Brown: The practice you inquire about is healthful, and it is likely to promote sound and refreshing sleep, and may, most likely will, improve your complexion. Try it regularly night and morning.—Anxious Inquirer: We fear your scars and contractions are irremovable, but consult a surgeon.—Venator: We hope your poor animal has recovered before this, if not, give him twenty-five grains of jalap powder, and five grains of calomel, made into a pill with a little gum water; and wash the nostrils twice a day, if necessary, with a lotion made of half an ounce of sugar of lead to a pint of water.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARTLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER CV.

Such a strange sordid cunningness! the rainbow,
When she hangs bent in heaven, sheds not her colours
Quicker and more various than this deceitful woman
Weaves in her dyes of wickedness.

BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER.

In the multitude of counsellors we are told there is safety. If legal counsellors are meant, we at once demur to the truth of the proverb, and our experience ought to have some weight, seeing how dearly we are once paid for it. Lady Boothroyd, however, had not arrived at the same conclusion; a circumstance scarcely to be wondered at, perhaps, considering that it was, as the playbills express it, her ladyship's first appearance in the court of chancery. On being served with a copy of the bill, filed in the name of Lieutenant Marsh, as next of kin, and natural guardian to Lillian, she at once consulted a formidable array of the most eminent members of the bar, and secured as many opinions, as what rich client will not, favourable to her case.

It is a little extraordinary, that no two lawyers, unless engaged on the same side, ever see the same case in the same light; then their unanimity of opinion is equally remarkable. Far be it from us to hint that this singular divarication arises from any mental obliquity of vision; no doubt, it is one of the idiosyncrasies of the legal profession, which the legal mind alone can explain; never intended to be understood by the uninitiated, and what is more, it never will be.

On one point the learned gentlemen laid great stress; the plaintiff had not stated in his petition to the court, where the marriage of Allan Boothroyd and the mother of his niece had been celebrated; any hitch, discrepancy, or doubt in that respect, and the case would be at an end—not a leg to stand upon.

"After all," observed Serjeant Kite, "the residue undisposed of by will, appears to have been exceedingly small."

"Under twelve thousand pounds," added Counsellor Flaw, referring to the accounts rendered by the executors.

"The residue is not the real object," replied her ladyship; who, as usual, was present at the consultation.

The three gentlemen learned in the law had long since suspected that such was the case. The observation had been intended as a feeler.

"It is an unprincipled attempt," continued the speaker, "to introduce the daughter of a common soldier, Barney Gee—a fellow who, had he lived, would have been tried for poaching on the Meldown estate—into my family, to give her a name and position in society. As the widow of the late Sir Norman," she added, "and the guardian of his only child, I feel bound to resist it."

THE MEETING IN KENSINGTON GARDENS

"Very natural!" "Highly proper!" and "Commendable spirit!" were the ejaculations with which the declaration of their client was received. Still, somehow her advisers did not feel quite satisfied; better judges could not be found perhaps of the distinction between the reason and the pretext.

"It is a little to be regretted, Lady Boothroyd," said Mr. Twine, the well-known queen's counsel, in his blandest tone, "that you commenced your operations to guard the honour of your family against a spurious claimant to bear its name quite so soon; in fact, before any stir had been made by her abettors. The abduction of the child," he added, "was rather a strong measure; and my learned brothers and myself wish to be in a position to explain it to the court, as the very most will doubtless be made of it on the opposite side."

"Nothing can be easier," answered the lady, coolly.

The learned counsel had all along been convinced that such was the case, and were delighted to hear the assertion from her own lips.

"On the very night the father and child arrived in the village," continued the artful woman, "the former was shot in an affray with Sir Norman's keepers; in fact, it was to avoid prosecution for a similar offence—he was a determined poacher—that Barney Gee enlisted for a soldier."

"This is important," observed Kite, making a note. Flaw nodded approvingly.

"The death of the wretched man," resumed her ladyship, "naturally created a certain amount of sympathy amongst the inhabitants of the village, all more or less addicted to the same pursuit; and not sympathy only, but a bitter feeling of hostility against my late husband, who a few nights afterwards was shot at in his carriage."

"By whom?"

"That we never could discover. As a wife, I naturally felt anxious and terrified, more especially as one of our keepers had been murdered on the night when the father of this young impostor met his death. It was impossible after such an outrage we should remain at Meldown."

Again the note-books and pens went to work.

The case really began to turn out much better than they imagined. A baronet shot at by a gang of poachers!—sure to enlist the feelings of the chancellor, a keen sportsman, on their side; a noble family driven from their home—great scope for eloquence.

"And the abduction?" quietly insinuated Mr. Twine.

"I am coming to it," said his client. "Woman-like, I naturally pitied the orphan left entirely dependent upon her relatives, an old weaver and his wife, and offered to place her in my school."

"Very generous!"

"Noble! forgiving!"

"My offer, however, was refused," added Lady Boothroyd, without heeding these complimentary ejaculations; "and, seeing that the presence of the child only served to keep up dangerous, irritating feelings, I certainly did cause her to be removed from St. Faith's. I have not the slightest hesitation in making this admission to you, gentlemen; but, if you consider it important, can easily prevent my share in the transaction ever being proved in a court of law."

"By what means?" inquired Serjeant Kite.

"By hanging the agent I employed," answered her ladyship, firmly.

The counsel exchanged looks with each other: evidently they began to suspect that their client was no ordinary person.

"I have no wish to do so," continued the speaker; "but, if necessary, I can produce proofs that the man, Mark Rayner, whose name you will find in the plaintiff's bill, is the murderer of my late husband's gamekeeper, Springthorp."

"Proofs!" repeated the three gentlemen learned in the law.

"Irrefragable ones," was the reply.

After this statement, the legal advisers of Lady Boothroyd, who, we need scarcely observe, was the real defendant in the suit, instituted pro forma against the executors, came to the conclusion that the ugly affair of the abduction now appeared in quite another light; that it could be explained, or, at the worst, palliated, by the strong influence of feelings which even the law respects, and perhaps got rid of altogether by a little dexterous tact.

Tact! what a sharp, ringing sound the word has; and how useful the thing itself is. There is scarcely a purpose or relation in life to which it may not be applied.

After all, what is tact? In nine cases out of ten, a wedge to split a moral difficulty, not solve it; a cloak hiding the threadbare garment beneath—giving the wearer the false credit of being a well-dressed man; a varnish which distracts attention from the mediocrity of the painting; a lie implied, not uttered, and all the more dangerous from bearing a specious resemblance to truth.

And yet, how many persons feel proud of possessing this dangerous quality; on the same principle, no doubt, which induces vulgar pretence to trick itself out with pinchbeck, when unable to wear gold.

As Chancery barristers, the eminent counsel consulted by Lady Boothroyd could not possibly undertake the conduct of a criminal case. It would have been against all professional etiquette—infra dig.; so they advised her to have recourse to the services of Mr. Gringle. The affair they considered quite in his way—the gentleman being as remarkable for expedients as he was known to be unscrupulous in the employment of them. With his assistance, they doubted not but on the day of hearing, one important witness would be absent—a practical illustration of what is generally understood by tact.

The morning on which the consultation between the widow of Sir Norman and the lawyers took place was the one appointed for the meeting in Kensington-gardens, to which spot Lillian and Lady Bell, attended by our hero and William Thornton, repaired. There was no occasion to introduce the cousins, each recognised the other by the likeness to herself. Their appearing together in a court of justice must, as the lover of Alice observed, convince the most sceptical of the tie of blood between them.

"It is not my fault, dearest Lillian," observed Alice, "that your home has been amongst strangers—your claims disputed; my heart, from the first moment I heard of your existence, acknowledged them; for I had not forgotten the poor little prisoner in the old pavilion at Meldown Park, or the words she uttered, and have frequently been reproved for asking questions on the subject."

"I am sure it is not," answered our heroine, her eyes filling with tears of pleasure; "but my home for years has been a happy one; so happy," she added, "that a sister's love alone could have increased its felicity."

Lady Bell and our hero were introduced to the heiress. Her ladyship, although prepared by the description she had received, could not avoid expressing her surprise at the singular resemblance between the two fair girls. Richard, of course, did not feel so much astonished; the portrait at Meldown Park had long since made him familiar with it.

As Alice drew from her pocket the chain and locket, to present to her cousin, she could scarcely avoid smiling at the expression of William Thornton's countenance; it was almost reproachful. Doubtless, he expected her—although she no longer believed it to have been his gift—to wear it till the moment of parting with it. But lovers are such exacting creatures.

This stolen interview proved a happy one for all; not excepting even William, who felt, perhaps, a little disappointed when Lady Bell took his arm—she had already secured that of our hero—an arrangement which enabled the cousins to enjoy undisturbed the few brief hours of intimacy permitted them.

"No doubt you think me very cruel," observed her ladyship; "but, as Hamlet, says, 'I must be cruel only to be kind.' It is my earnest wish," she added, speaking in a more serious tone, "that Lillian and Alice should love each other."

"Your precaution is scarcely a necessary one," replied the gentleman; "they cannot fail to love each other, both being as good as they are beautiful."

"Very pretty, and true as pretty, no doubt," answered the kind-hearted woman, with a smile. "Take example from your friend here; see how patiently he bears it."

"And well he may!" exclaimed the lover, with a slight, only a very slight tone of impatience. "Richard is a happy suitor, has no hostile influences to contend against, can see Lillian daily; it would be unreasonable indeed were he to complain. My position is a widely different one. Lady Boothroyd hates me—nay, carried her treachery so far as to intercept the letter in which I declared my passion, and answer it in her daughter's name; who, ignorant, or doubtful of my feelings, yielded to the selfish entreaties of her father on his deathbed, and promised to become the wife of Ilston."

Lady Bell looked serious; a promise made to a parent, under such circumstances, in her clear judgment, appeared a binding one; sacred as an oath, it never entered into her imagination that it could be broken.

"I pity you," she observed, "pity you both; but Alice will keep her word."

Poor William began to look very miserable. His fears had suggested the same thing.

"There is but one hope," added the speaker, "if I judge the character of her you love aright—the rejection of her hand by Ilston."

"He has already been appealed to."

"By you?"

"By his victim," answered the lover, bitterly.

"Then he is an unmanly, spiritless fellow," exclaimed her ladyship, with womanly scorn of the noble viscount's selfishness; "and were I a—; but, no, no," she added, suddenly checking herself, "it would be wrong, very wrong to counsel that."

Whether the speaker, in her indignation, had been on the point of recommending William Thornton to adopt hostile proceedings against his rival, is a problem we confess our inability to solve, further than by observing that such a supposition is by no means improbable when we consider the excitable, high-spirited character of Lady Bell; who, as the wife of a soldier, had naturally adopted some of the opinions and feelings of the circle by which she had been so long surrounded.

Here, for a few minutes, we must digress; promising, however, not to exact too much from the patience of our readers. It is simply to remark that pictures of life, to be faithful ones, must portray its lights and shadows, virtues, vices, weaknesses, and errors; and that it would be unjust to blame the fidelity of the artist.

The author of "Smiles and Tears" is no advocate or even apologist of duelling. He considers it an act religion and reason alike condemn, and which, thank Heaven, in the present age common sense has all but succeeded in rendering ridiculous.

To judge from the glances which the two gentlemen exchanged, they, unfortunately, did not think so.

When the cousins rejoined their friends, it was observed that the eyes of both were suffused with tears. Their adieus were sadly spoken, and the heart of the lover sank within him as Alice silently took his arm; he remembered the words of Lady Bell.

"William," said the unhappy girl, as soon as they had separated from their friends, "I am about to inflict pain; and I cannot tell you how sorrowful the reflection makes me. We must meet no more. Do not censure me, pray do not, before you have heard my reasons. I dare not break my word to my dead father. I know all that you would urge. I have urged it to my own heart and reason; but in vain. Grant that my promise was extorted—reluctantly given; still, it was given, and must be kept; unless," she added, bursting into a passionate flood of tears, "the grave should mercifully receive me before Ilston can claim its fulfilment."

This was a sad blow to William Thornton, who, for the last few days, had been indulging in visions of a happy future. Disappointment, however, did not render him unjust. The noble resolution of the sorrowing girl to adhere to the promise so solemnly given, increased his admiration of her character, although he tried every means a lover's eloquence could suggest to shake it.

"You may convince my heart," replied Alice, mournfully, "for it is weak, and you possess too powerful an advocate there already, but not my reason, which tells me that happiness would not result from our marriage; the memory of my broken vow would glide like a spectre between us, poisoning our short-lived bliss. You might still continue to love me, but respect, without which love is but a worthless passion, would become extinct. Better die broken-hearted," she added, "than survive the loss of that."

"You wrong yourself and me!" exclaimed her lover, passionately. "What, blame the bird because it has escaped the fowler's snare! censure the innocent lamb for flying from the wolf's embrace! never, never! Your father had no right to extort such a promise from you, to offer you a sacrifice at the shrine of his ambition, to tyrannise over you, even from his grave; the act was monstrous, unnatural, and—"

"Hush!" said Alice, seriously; "deeply as I regret his conduct, I dare not blame it: the child must never judge the parent. And now, William, it is better that we say farewell. It is a sad trial to us both; I feel that I am acting rightly, and the conviction will sustain me to the end. It was selfish of me, very selfish, ever to confess my love; forgive me that, and struggle to forget me."

"Forget you!" repeated the youth; "how easy to advise, how difficult to accomplish."

"Not so," replied his companion; "you have energies, talents, which must not be wasted in idle, useless sorrow. The world has a claim upon them—aces distinctions within your reach, such as good prize; in the achievement of these, in diffusing good around you, the sad past and the poor girl who loved you will be forgotten, and in time, William, you may find another—"

"You drive me mad!" interrupted William Thornton. "You cannot think me the heartless, astic thing your words describe, and deem that a w short years spent in the pursuit of honours I spise can blot from memory's cell that past whose collections commence with boyhood's dreams. Shall tell you," he continued, "when, and when only, our image will be effaced from the shrine in which has so long been worshipped?—when death shall all the pulses that now beat for you, and the last ckering breath hang trembling upon my lips. Life and my love for Alice Boothroyd will fade together." Alice could only answer this passionate vindication the constancy of his affection by her tears.

"But all is not lost," resumed her lover, in a more cheerful tone. "Heaven will not permit the sacrifice our heart can never sanction. I will see Illston. If by your wealth he covets, my father will cheerfully lay down the value of the Meldown estates to release you from this cruel bondage. Your cousin is needy, most gamblers are; nay, think not I would degrade myself by slandering my rival! I speak on certain knowledge. The claims of Lillian may easily affect your fortune. I am not hopeless yet." The poor girl recollected the words and looks of a viscount when he declared that, were she a ggar, he would still claim her hand, but could not bring herself to dash aside the hopes of her lover by peating or describing them.

As the speakers were about to quit the gardens ey encountered a gentleman with a military air, no evidently recognised the lady; there was thing, however, sufficiently marked or offensive the glance he gave to justify its being noticed her companion, and yet he felt his blood boil at a piece of well-bred impertinence.

"Are you acquainted with that person?" he quired.

"I have seen him in society," replied Alice; "but the moment cannot remember where. Yet stay—recollect, it is Captain Chester; I met him at the ball at Lord Carlington's."

This incident, trifling in itself, led to more serious suits than either of the lovers suspected; who parated after a fond and lingering adieu, yet not thout hope, at least in the heart of one of them, at the seemingly insurmountable barrier opposed their union, might yet fall before the efforts of his lomitabie will.

The next day Lady Boothroyd was informed by r lawyer, that he had been served with a notice, at plaintiff was about to move the court of ancery to decree probate to a recently discovered licil to the will, under which her late husband, r Norman, had enjoyed the Meldown estates. It n scarcely be said that the intelligence took her by rprise, for she had long since been aware of its appearance on the night of the murder of the ward at the Home Farm.

Some, even of what is termed the stronger sex, ght have felt their courage fail before the fresh uss of evidence daily brought to light, to confound r deep-laid schemes; but not so with the un-nciplled woman, who, having but one object in e, clung to it with a tenacity of purpose that ould have done honour to a better cause. Her ergies rose with the difficulties that surrounded her, d, after coolly dismissing Mr. Flint—the affair s too important to be entrusted to a country ctitioner like Marshall—she set forth to hold ther consultation with the gentlemen of the long e, and by a caprice which Alice could only explain he supposition that her meeting with William or r cousin in Kensington Gardens had been betrayed, isted upon her daughter accompanying her.

For three long hours the tired girl sat listening to ggestions, opinions, and plans, that made her feel ck at heart. If any of our readers—and who can say what mis-une may overtake the most prudent?—should ever engaged in a chancery suit, we advise them, even ough they may have both moral and legal right on their side, never to take any being whose esteem ey value with them when they go to consult their wyers; for if there is any speck in their nature, y littleness of character, vice in heart or mind, ey are sure to be brought out. A chancery suit is severe test to frail humanity.

More than once during the morning Alice had ocasion to blush at the duplicity and worldliness of her mother.

Probably Lady Boothroyd felt this; for she certainly appeared in anything but an amiable humour as she stepped into her carriage, where her daughter was already seated.

"Home!" she exclaimed, in a sharp, angry tone, to the old domestic, Joseph, as he was about to close the door.

"I beg your pardon, but is your name Boothroyd?" demanded a well-dressed youth, whose incipient moustache, affected lisp, and confident air, gave promise of more than the average amount of puppyism in future years.

Her ladyship replied only by a well-bred stare.

"Alice Boothroyd?" added the speaker, coolly raising his eye-glass to observe, as he afterwards described it to his fellow clerks, the irate mamma. Even vulgarisms have their day, and perient has become obsolete.

"My name is Alice," answered the young lady, with difficulty recovering from her surprise; "what would you with me?"

"Only to serve you with this subpoena," said the youth, placing a paper in her hand, "to appear and give evidence in the High Court of Chancery—Boothroyd versus Boothroyd."

Alice received it passively.

"Insolent!" exclaimed her mother, angrily; "throw it into the street; pull up the glass. How dare you," she added, turning to the footman, "permit such an impertinence?"

"You may toss it where you please, old lady," observed the clerk, "only remember she is served. We know that you are slippery as an eel, but I have witnessed."

He pointed as he spoke to two respectable-looking men who were standing near, highly amused, no doubt, with the scene.

During their ride home Lady Boothroyd maintained an ominous silence; she was evidently revolving in her mind what circumstances could account for the step the guardians of Lillian had taken. There was but one—Alice must have spoken of the scene in the pavilion.

"Unnatural girl!" she said, as soon as they entered her dressing-room, "you for whose welfare I am toiling night and day, to turn against me, to betray me."

"It is a sad thing, mother, when the child can betray the parent," was the reply, "for it implies something the conscience fain would hide."

"I am not to be taught the duty I owe to my family and your father's wishes by you," observed the imperious woman. "I insist upon knowing the extent of your folly; tell me everything."

"You have but to ask," answered her daughter, respectfully.

"You have seen this pretended cousin?"

"Yes."

"And informed her of—"

"All that I witnessed in the old pavilion in Mel-down Park, mother; restored to her the locket and chain which William Thornton found and sent to me believing it to be mine."

"Fool! you have risked the loss of half your fortune."

"It has long ceased to be of value to me," replied the heiress, mournfully.

"Romantic stuff! the folly of a love-sick girl," interrupted her ladyship, scornfully. "I have long known that you were weak and childish; now I have discovered that you can be dangerous, and shall take my measures accordingly. Retire to your room," she added, "and do not attempt to quit it without my permission."

From that day Alice Boothroyd was a prisoner.

CHAPTER CVI.

O, he is the courageous captain of compliments. He fights as you sing prick-song, keeps time, distance, and proportion; rests me his minian rest, one, two, and the third in your bosom: the very butcher of a silk button, a duellist, a duellist; a gentleman of the very first house—of the first and second cause. Ah, the immortal passado! the punto reverso! the hay!—SHAKESPEARE.

CAPTAIN CHESTER, the gentleman who so inopportunately encountered the lovers in Kensington Gardens, was an exceedingly popular man, and is well worthy of a special introduction to our readers, as a specimen of a class who, without the recommendation of commanding talents, genius, fortune, or high birth, contrive to make their way into society—in it, but scarcely of it.

Few bachelors' parties in his own set were considered complete without him, and at the country houses of some of the first of our nobility he was ever a welcome guest. A few prudent mothers, with richly-portioned daughters, might look upon him with alarm; they have an instinctive dread of younger sons—mistrust is a part of their nature; but with the rest of the sex he was a universal favourite. In fact, it would be difficult to describe a more agreeable person: he sang an excellent second, danced a d rode well, told such capital anecdotes, was a first-rate shot, an admirable judge of a horse, and not even suspected of being a gambler; true, he frequently played, but never for large sums, alleging as a reason that his means did not permit him. No man of his acquaintance could say that he had ever lost heavily to Harry Chester, and but few boast they had ever won from him, his good luck being as proverbial as his moderation.

It was no wonder that fathers considered him a safe companion for their sons.

Many persons, ill-natured ones, second-caste men of course, wondered how Captain Chester contrived to belong to one of the best clubs, visit with the best families, drive a magnificent horse, and dress in the most irreproachable style upon five hundred a year; perhaps the gentleman might have felt puzzled to explain it himself, certain it is that no one ever ventured to ask him to do so; for, in addition to his other qualifications, the ex-dragoon had the reputation of being a successful duellist. Some such affair, it was supposed, had caused him to quit the army. We say supposed, for the reasons were not generally known, even to military men.

The captain had just returned from deer-stalking in the Highlands, and was en route to the Holms, the seat of the Carlingtons, near Eton. To his intense disgust he found himself with a day upon his hands in London, and London out of town. To kill time he had tried the club; the ladies regarded him with a cold, sickly smile; the partners were in the establishment; the rooms were empty—emptiness everywhere; so, as a last resource, he tried Kensington Gardens, there, at least, he reckoned upon finding fresh air and agreeable recollections of last year's flirtations.

"By-the-bye, Illston," he observed, whilst shooting in the home cover, the morning after his arrival, "I made a discovery, whilst in town, that may rather interest you. You have a rival."

"Pooh!" said his lordship, raising his gun, "I have divined that for some time."

"A favoured one."

Although he affected to laugh at the information, the viscount missed his bird.

"I met Miss Boothroyd walking with that fellow Thornton," added the speaker; "you once pointed him out to me, and you know I never forget a face I have once seen. By-the-bye, I think you told me your cousin and he were playfellows when children."

His companion felt too much annoyed to reply, and the gallant captain still further increased his irritation by humming the first few bars of "Love's Young Dream."

"Missed again!" he exclaimed, as his friend fired a second time with the same result.

The unlucky sportsman muttered something about having taken too much wine the night before, and his hand being unsteady.

"Suppose," he suggested, "that we leave our guns, and return to the house. I should prefer a quiet game of billiards."

The proposal was at once accepted, and the speaker quitted the cover. At billiards his lordship handled his cue as nervously as he had previously done his Joe Manton. Every stroke was a failure. Evidently he was out of sorts. Nothing less than a cigar and brandy-and-water could restore him; and they adjourned to his dressing-room.

"No doubt," he observed, after they were comfortably seated, and the air redolent with the first dozen puffs of the genuine weed, "you think me exceedingly weak; but, the fact is, I have long suspected that presuming puppy, Thornton, had a design on the fortune of my cousin. I detected it even when we were boys together at Eton, and can him."

"Of course," was the quiet commentary.

"It is not pleasant to be jockeyed in the affection of the girl you like by a parvenu."

"Decidedly unpleasant," replied his visitor, who already discerned that the conversation was but the prelude to a still more interesting confidence; "and, were I in your position, I should most certainly resent it."

"Can't."

The captain shrugged his shoulders.

"Dare not," added his lordship; "and that is the provoking part of the affair. Nothing on earth could afford me greater pleasure than shooting him; but then Alice would hate me—all hope of ever winning her love would be lost."

His hearer did not smile—a fact which said more for his command of feature than a page of description would have done, seeing that he was perfectly aware that, whatever other qualities the noble viscount might be distinguished for, courage was not one of them.

"Had I a friend to interfere," added the speaker, fixing his eyes upon his guest, "not ostensibly on the ground of offence to me, of course."

The hint was a broad one; but the captain did not choose to take it, the position not being yet sufficiently defined.

"By-the-bye," he observed, "is there any truth in the rumour that on your marriage your lordship is to be called to the upper house, during the lifetime of the earl?"

"A settled thing."

"Who succeeds you in the family borough of Quitpenny?"

"That is not settled yet," replied the viscount. And here the conversation was permitted to drop. A word more on the subject would have been de trop, for the gentlemen perfectly understood each other—the duellist, the service he was expected to render, and his honourable friend, the price he must pay for it.

That same evening Lord Carlington drew his visitor aside to indulge in a little private chat.

"Had not the slightest idea, Chester," he observed, "that you had any thoughts of a political career; wonder you never mentioned the subject before. Illston tells me that, in the event of a vacancy, you would like to stand for Quitpenny. Your views, I presume are—?"

"Decidedly those of the party of which your lordship is so distinguished a leader," said the captain.

"In that case," answered the peer, shaking him by the hand, "you have my best wishes."

We by no means intend it to be implied that the noble owner of the Holms was aware of the motives which induced his son so strongly to recommend the captain as his successor in the family borough; still less, that he was a party to the tacit convention existing between them. He had assented to the arrangement to please the viscount; it being a matter of perfect indifference to him who filled the seat, provided he commanded the vote.

Three days afterwards Captain Chester found himself under the necessity of abridging his visit. Unexpected business—a family affair—compelled him to leave for London.

"Do you remain at the Holms?" he inquired of his friend as he shook hands with him on the morning of his departure.

"For another fortnight, at least," said Illston. "Of course you will write; a letter from you will be quite a godsend in a dull country house."

"Certainly."

A nod of mutual intelligence followed, and the friends, every way so worthy of each other, separated, with the hope, almost the certainty, of speedily meeting again.

This may be thought, perhaps, an exaggerated picture, but we beg leave to assure our readers that it is nothing of the kind. We have met with many Harry Chesters in our time, men too proud to stoop to labour, parasites of fortune, ever ready to devote their energies to a patron's caprices, and too often a patron's vices.

The captain proved himself a man of his word. Three days after his departure the noble viscount received the following letter:—

"Dear Illston,—I detest asking favours, but positively you are the only fellow within reach to whom I can apply. I have been insulted by an impertinent puppy of the name of Thornton. I trust the fellow will see the necessity of an apology; if not, nous verrons."

"Come directly, as I wish to have the affair off my mind. You will find me at my old quarters."

The letter was carefully worded, and by the allusion to an apology, would, in the event of its being produced in a court of justice, go far to prove that the writer felt desirous, rather than otherwise, for an accommodation.

His lordship caught up his pen, and, with an air of intense satisfaction, wrote the address of the captain, and "by the next train," on a sheet of paper, then rung for his valet.

"To the Telegraph Office," he said, "without an instant's delay, and be ready in an hour to accompany me to London."

"I have him; he is in the net and can't escape!" muttered the titled coward, as the servant quitted the room. "I hated him even in boyhood, and the pleasure of spiting him has been one motive for holding Alice to her foolish promise. Chester never yet failed to hit his man," he added; "how well he has divined my feelings in asking me to second him. It will be glorious," he added, "to be the messenger of death to Thornton, to arrange the preliminaries, measure the ground, see him fall, and watch his last look of agony. There will be no occasion to tell him whose hand directed the weapon: he will divine it."

With these feelings, his lordship started for London, and on his arrival drove to the chambers of his friend, who shook hands with him and welcomed him, as if he were the party obliged.

Even by themselves, they continued to wear the mask of deceit, which habit, perhaps, had rendered second nature to both.

"Singular, by Jove," observed the captain, "is it not, that so soon after our conversation I should have occasion to solicit your services in an affair with Thornton?"

"Very," said his visitor; "but tell me how did it occur."

"Simplest thing in the world," replied the duellist. "I was walking last evening with Barton—you recollect him, the fellow who got so cruelly plucked on the St. Leger—when we encountered your rival close, by-the-bye, to your aunt's house. I knew that I had seen the fellow before, but for the instant could not remember where; his recollection, it seems, was better; my companion noticed the manner in which we regarded each other, and very naturally inquired his name."

"And you replied?"

"That he was one of Miss Boothroyd's numerous admirers. At this," continued the captain, "the fiery gentleman took offence, as eagerly as gudgeons snap at bait; and, as a climax to his absurdity, demanded an apology."

"Exquisitely ridiculous!" said the viscount.

"I need not say that his modest request was refused," continued the narrator, "in the most courteous terms, for I never lose my temper. He added something 'about my being a spy upon his conduct, upon which I demanded his card, and there the matter rests."

"How do you intend to act?" demanded his noble friend.

"I have but one resource," answered the captain.

"I think so."

"Call the fellow out and shoot him," added the duellist, "unless he makes the amende honorable."

"You will accept an apology?" exclaimed his lordship, in a tone of disappointment.

"You forget, my dear fellow," observed his friend, "that I have nothing to do with it; the affair is in your hands. If Thornton sends me a written apology, such as you dictate to him, of course the matter ends."

This was indeed exquisite, the very refinement of revenge, to be himself the bearer of the hostile message; to insult—safely insult—the man he hated by proposing abject, humiliating terms, which he knew would be refused; to read, as he anticipated, in the eyes beneath whose glance his own had so often quailed, the agony of fear. Illston must have been an epicure in hate, indeed, if such a banquet did not satisfy him. No wonder that he felt impatient to enjoy it.

"These things are better off one's mind," he said.

The future member for Quitpenny was of the same opinion.

"I had better see the parvenu at once," added the viscount.

Chester nodded approvingly.

"Where shall we dine?"

"At the club."

Left to his own reflections, the duellist felt no remorse at the part he had undertaken; and yet he was annoyed at it. Shooting a man because you happen to disagree with him is no longer the mode, and nothing less than the bait so cleverly held out could have tempted him to chance the ridicule, to say nothing of the unenviable notoriety, such an act must attach to his name—one of the things it had been the study of years with him to avoid.

By way of passing the time till the return of his friend, Captain Chester took up the army list and began carefully to examine the columns. Once or twice his brows involuntarily contracted, as certain names attracted his attention and he flung the book from him with an air of impatience and disappointment.

Although William Thornton felt dreadfully annoyed at the quarrel so cleverly forced upon him, he was far from suspecting that it had been a planned thing: in the manliness of his own nature, such an idea never struck him; and it was not till Illston's card was brought him that the truth flashed upon his mind. Still he received him with that quiet self-possession which marks not only the man of high resolve, but Nature's gentleman.

"The proceedings your friend has thought proper to adopt," he observed, after listening to the captain's message, "are unusual."

"In the city, no doubt they are so," replied his lordship, with a sneer.

"I thought duelling had been exploded?"

"Am I to understand that your error on that point explains your offensive conduct to my friend?" inquired the viscount. "If such is the case," he added, "and you prefer writing an apology such as I will dictate, perhaps the affair may be arranged."

"How considerate!"

"Well, yes! it is rather considerate. Chester feels, after all, that there will be a certain amount of ridicule in meeting you."

William Thornton felt the blood boiling in his veins at the sneering, mocking tone in which these insulting words were delivered. He saw at once through the snare, but not the means to avoid it.

"Am I to be favoured with the name of your friend?" added the messenger.

"As you just observed," replied the lover of Alice, "the affair may be arranged without, as far as the captain is concerned."

"Indeed!" said Illston, with a provoking smile. "I told Chester that I thought it would be."

"On one condition."

"Condition!"

"That you take your friend's place!"

"I! I! I have no quarrel with you," faltered the messenger.

"Yes, you have, my lord," answered the former, in a tone that caused the heart of his old enemy to beat with violence; "and one of long standing, dating from our school days. If you have forgotten it," he added, "and I know that you have a most convenient memory, this may serve as the basis of a new one."

With a gesture of profound contempt, he tossed the card of the noble viscount in his face.

"This is most unusual," stammered his lordship, looking exceedingly uncomfortable.

"Is it more unusual," demanded William, ironically, "than for a coward to seek the life of the man he fears by the vicarious arm of another? You see, my lord, I know you; read your very heart; its littleness, its despicable cunning. Was the price of my blood to be paid in money or patronage to your honourable friend? You may well turn pale," he added. "I know not what restrains me from treating you as you so richly merit; from trampling on you; spitting on you, white-livered assassin!"

"The judgment of the world on such an outrage," replied Illston, struggling for firmness.

"You are right," answered the indignant youth, after a severe struggle to repress the natural impulse of his scorn. "Well, then, write the apology in any terms your malice can suggest, and I will sign it. I can reopen my quarrel with your friend at any time, but the condition must be kept—a meeting with your lordship."

"No apology will be accepted," answered the coward.

"Ah! I thought not," exclaimed his rival. "You friend, no doubt, is a duellist of the first water. You would not trust your courage and safety to inexperienced hands. But I have known the most experienced fail. Should Captain Chester do so, look to yourself. I will follow you like your shadow. There is not an outrage or insult I will not heap upon you. I will make your name a public scorn, an infamy, should you refuse to meet me."

"You are not the husband of Alice Boothroyd yet," he added.

"The name of your friend, sir?" demanded his lordship, trembling with fear and passion.

William Thornton referred him to Richard Markham; true, they had not been long acquainted, but he felt assured that our hero would not fail him in his present emergency.

It was a considerable relief to the messenger of Captain Chester when he found himself once more in the street, safe from the anger, and what was even more painful to endure, the withering glances of the man he sought to destroy; but even there his fear did not abandon him. The words, the most experienced fail, rang in his ears and sounded like death doom.

Bitterly did he blame the rash imprudence which had led him to take an active part in the approaching encounter. In the blindness of his hate, he had compromised himself—lifted the veil already transparent.

"Have you seen the fellow?" demanded his obliging friend, when they met again at the club.

"Yes."

"And the result?"

"You must fight," answered his lordship.

The captain had anticipated as much.

"And shoot him," continued the speaker. "It is the most unreasonable cur I ever met with. Would you believe it," he added, with an affected laugh, "he pretends to believe that I have set you on to quarrel with him."

"Ah!"

"That I had bought your services."

"Ah!"

"Wanted me to take your place," added Illston, "as if you could be induced to accept the vicarious arm of another to punish his impertinence."

"You are quite right," observed the captain, calmly; "I must shoot the fellow—there is no remedy for it."

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

THE WOMAN FOR A WIFE.

In most of the letters addressed to young men, there is a great deal said about the elevating influence of female society. Sentimental young men affect this kind of reading, and if anywhere in it they can find countenance for the policy of early marriages, they are particularly gratified. Now, while we are the last to deny the advantages which any young man of sense experiences from the society of a woman of pure and elevated taste, we do deny that there is anything in indiscriminate devotion to female society which makes a man better or purer.

In seeking female society as an agency for the elevation of your taste, the cultivation of your morals, and the improvement of your mind, seek that which is above you. Do not treat with rudeness or studied neglect such inferior female society as you are obliged to come in contact with; on the contrary, you owe to such society a duty; you should stimulate it, infuse new vitality into it, and endeavour to do for it what you would have superior female society do for yourself.

The endeavour to find female society above yourself should be carried still further. Never content yourself with the idea of having a commonplace wife. You want one who will urge you forward; who will excite within your breast a laudable ambition; who will sympathise with all your trials, enter into all your perplexities, animate you with fresh zeal and new hopes; and who will, in very truth, be unto you a better half.

The apprehensions of women are finer and quicker than those of men. With equal early advantages the woman is more of a woman at eighteen than a man is at twenty-one. After marriage, as a general rule, the woman ceases to acquire. We do not say this is necessary, or that it should be the case; we simply state a fact. The woman is absorbed in family cares. They consume her time, and, to a considerable extent, deprive her of intellectual culture. In the meantime the man is engaged in business. He comes in daily contact with minds sharper and stronger than his own. He grows and matures, and within ten years from the date of his marriage, becomes in reality a new man. Now, if he was foolish enough to marry a woman because her face was pretty or her figure attractive, or her dowry handsomer than either figure or face, he will find that he has left his wife far behind in the intellectual progress which he has made, and that she is really no more of a companion for him than a child would be. There are few sadder sights in this world than that of mates whom the passage of years has mismated—people who are married but not matched.

In every young man's mind there exists the expectation of marriage. When a young man pretends he has no wish to marry, we may pretty safely infer one of two things—either that he is himself deceived, or that he is endeavouring to deceive others.

"When I said I would die a bachelor, I did not think I should live to be married."

How shall a good wife be won? Men naturally shrink from the attempt to obtain a companion superior to themselves, but they will find that really intelligent women are uniformly modest, and hold their charms in moderate estimation. What such women most admire in men is politeness, courage, devotion, and decision. Such qualities are essential if you would win a woman worthy of your love.

But do not be in a hurry about the matter; do not give way to a feverish longing for marriage, and do not imagine that any disappointment in love, which takes place before you are twenty-one years of age, will materially affect your future happiness. The more of a man you become, the more manliness you will become capable of exhibiting in your associations with women, the more you will be esteemed, and the better wife you will be able to obtain.

Go into female society if you can find that which will improve you, but not otherwise. You can better spend your time in the society of sensible men, which is often more accessible to you than the other, and it is through that, mostly, that you find your way to good female society.

One thing more—the last, but not the least, in this paper. No woman without piety in her heart is fit to become the companion of any man. You may obtain in your wife beauty, amiability, sprightliness, wit, accomplishments, wealth, and learning, but if that wife has no higher love than herself or yourself, she is no fit companion for life. She cannot lead you to look above mean aims and objects; she cannot properly educate her children; she cannot, in hours of adversity, sustain and comfort you; she cannot bear with patience your petulance, produced by the cares and vexations of business; and she will never be safe against the seductive allurements of the world.

FRENCH LESSONS;

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

"SHALL I add some more nice things to my vocabulary to-day?" asked Robert of his kind preceptor.

"Yes," replied George, for by so doing you will learn the names of various birds, fishes, &c., besides getting an insight into many familiar idioms. Take your pen and ink, and let us begin with poultry."

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.
Poultry.	La volaille.
A capon	Un chapon
Pigeon with peas	Un pigeon aux petits pois
A fowl in salad	Un poulet en salade
A leg of fowl in paper	Une cuisse de poulet en papillote
Game.	Gibier.
Partridge with cabbage	Une perdrix aux choux
Partridge with truffles	Une perdrix aux truffes
Quail "à la financière"	Une caille à la financière
Wild duck	Un canard sauvage
Croquettes of game	Des croquettes de gibier
Pastry.	Pâtisserie.
Vol-au-vent "à la financière"	Un vol-au-vent à la financière
Vol-au-vent of fowls	Un vol-au-vent de volaille
Vol-au-vent of salmon	Un vol-au-vent de saumon
Hot vegetable pie	Un pâté chaud de légumes
Sweet dishes.	Entremets.
Plum-pudding	Un plum-pudding
Croquettes of rice	Des croquettes de riz
Apple fritters	Des beignets de pommes
Apricot fritters	Des beignets d'abricots
"Charlotte Russe"	Une Charlotte Russe
Stewed prunes	Des pruneaux

Red currant jelly	De la gelée de groseilles
Marmalade of apricots	Une marmalade d'abricots
Meringue with cream	Une meringue à la crème
Meringue with jam	Une meringue aux confitures

"Particularly remark, Robert," said George, "the expression, 'Une cuisse de poulet,' literally translated this would be, 'A thigh of fowl.' It is not a very elegant expression in English, but 'cuisse,' for 'the leg,' relating to a fowl, is quite correct in French, and 'Jambe de poulet,' for 'A leg of fowl,' would be as absurd as 'Jambe de mouton,' for 'A leg of mutton.'"

"Un vol-au-vent," resumed George, "must strike you as an odd name for a dish of any kind. Now, a 'vol-au-vent,' is a 'very nice, savoury pie,' generally containing birds, but, as you see in your vocabulary, it may be made of fish."

"You may remember my telling you how the French have imported some of our words bodily. 'Plum-pudding' is one of these importations. The French are very fond of our national pudding, although they laugh at its ponderosity, and sometimes call it 'Pudding de plomb,' 'Pudding of lead,' instead of 'Pudding of plums.'"

"Beignets," for 'fritters,' is a word you must carefully impress upon your memory, as it is very unlike any corresponding English word."

"I could see, as you were writing down the word, 'Charlotte Russe,' that you very curious to know what sort of thing it could be. It is very much like one of our pancakes."

"Observe the difference between 'compote' and 'confiture.' Recollect that one consists of fruit stewed, the other of fruit made into jam or preserved for the winter. I need not say much about 'Une meringue.' Dropping the accent, we call it by the same name. I know you are very fond of meringues, and I can tell you, on my mother's authority, that they are principally composed of white of egg, sugar, and cream."

"By the manner in which you write to-day's exercise, I shall see if you have learnt the lesson I gave you sufficiently well to apply it. I allude to the list of adjectives which vary in signification as they vary in place."

"Suppose now we return to the travellers, and see how they arrange about the apartments."

OF THE SOUND én.

This sound does not exist in English in its purity, but we may have an idea of it from the English word anchor, in which an has nearly the same sound as in in French.

1797

It is found in the French words impoli, impolite,

17 17 17 17 0
fin, end; pain, pain; bread, peintre, painter.
 It is also represented by the following combinations:
 17 17 17 17 0
ing, in the word ing, five, when placed before a word beginning with a consonant or h aspirated; ins, in 5 17 17 17 17

dessins, drawings; int, in il vint, he came; aims, in 17 17 17 17 17
daime, deer; ains, in je crains, I fear; aint, in il craint, 17 17 17 17 17
 he fears; cing, in scing, sign; ens, in seins, bosoms;
 17 17 17 17 17
eint, in ceint, girdled; en, in bien, well; in any word ending in en or iens, and in all the tenses of the verb tenir and its derivatives, whether they are ending in 7-17 7-17
iens, or ient, as je tiens, il tient; also in the word

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON XXVII.

ELECTRICAL MACHINE.

685. What is an electrical machine?—A machine employed for developing electricity in large quantities. Fig. 45 represents one form of electrical machine.

Fig. 45

686. Of what does it consist?—A circular plate of thick glass turned by a winch, two pairs of rubbers, an insulated conductor, called the PRIME CONDUCTOR, and a framed support.

687. What are the rubbers?—Each of the rubbers is a small cushion covered with leather, over which is spread a layer of an amalgam of zinc and quicksilver; this greatly augments the exciting effect of the rubber.

688. Where may the two pairs of rubbers be seen in the figure?—At the top and bottom of the plate; the rubbers in each pair are so arranged as to press against both surfaces of the plate.

689. Where is the prime conductor shown?—At c c; it is insulated by the glass supports.

690. How is the electricity that is excited by the friction of the amalgam on the surface of the glass plate drawn off on to the prime conductor?—By means of metallic points that extend out toward the glass on both sides.

691. How may a body be charged with electricity from the prime conductor?—By extending a metallic rod, or chain, from it to the prime conductor.

LEYDEN JAR.

692. When there is occasion to accumulate a much larger quantity of electricity than can be obtained at once from the prime conductor of an electrical machine, what piece of electrical apparatus is employed?—The Leyden jar.

693. What is its construction?—A Leyden jar is a large glass jar, coated, both on the inside and outside, to within a few inches of the top, with tin foil. The mouth is closed with a stopper of baked wood, and a brass rod, terminating in a knob, and connected with the inside coating, passes through the stopper.

694. Can electricity pass from the inside to the outside coating?—It cannot.

695. How is the jar charged?—The outside is connected with the ground by touching it with the hand or in some other way, and a metallic rod or chain is extended from the knob to the prime conductor of an electrical machine.

696. On turning the electrical machine, what will take place?—The positive electricity will flow in a continuous stream from the prime conductor into the jar, until it becomes fully charged. Positive electricity will, at the same time, flow steadily from the outside coating into the ground.

697. Why should the electricity continue to flow into the jar for some time?—Because it is attracted by the negative electricity that is retained on the outside of the jar. The reaction of this negative electricity renders insensible a large quantity of positive electricity on the inside.

698. How is the jar discharged?—By bringing the outside and inside into conducting connection with each other; the two electricities rush together along this connection.

699. What is a common method of discharging the jar?—By means of the discharging rod. It consists of two curved brass rods terminating in knobs, and having a common joint at the end of an insulating glass handle.

700. How is it used?—One of the knobs is first brought into contact with the outside coating, and then the other is made to touch the knob of the jar.

701. What takes place just as the two knobs are brought together?—The jar is discharged, with a loud report and a vivid flash of light.

702. Suppose a person were to touch the outside of the jar with one hand and the knob with the other?—The discharge would take place through his arms and chest, and he would experience a sudden convulsive shock, called the electric shock.

703. Can several persons receive the electric shock at the same time?—They can: by taking hold of hands, and the person at one end of the line touching the outside of the jar, and the one at the other end touching the knob.

704. What have you to say of the electric battery?—A much larger quantity of electricity can be accumulated with it, and much greater effects produced, than can be obtained with a single jar.

705. Illustrate by a remarkable example.—An electric battery of enormous size was constructed, to be used with a great electrical machine at Haarlem; it consisted of 100 jars, each 18 inches in diameter, and 2 feet high. The discharge of this battery would rend the hardest wood to pieces, and would kill a dog instantly if passed through the head and spine.

VARIOUS EFFECTS OF ELECTRICITY.

ATTRACTION AND REPULSION.

706. How may electrical attraction and repulsion be illustrated in an interesting manner?—By the apparatus called the electric bells.

707. Describe it.—Three small bells are suspended from a brass rod, the two outer ones by brass chains, and the middle one by a silk thread; between the bells are hung, by silk threads, two metallic clappers.

708. How are the bells made to ring?—The middle bell is connected with the floor by a brass chain, and the rod from which they are all suspended is brought into connection with the prime conductor of the electrical machine.

709. What follows on turning the machine?—The electricity flows into the two outer bells; these attract the little clappers, which become charged as soon as they strike against them, and are then repelled off, strike against the middle bell, and become discharged.

710. What happens then?—The clappers are attracted again by the outer bells. In this way a constant ringing is kept up while the machine is turned. In a similar way little puppets, made of elder pith, may be made to dance by placing them between two metallic plates.

711. How must the plates be arranged?—The lower plate must communicate with the ground, and the other with the prime conductor of an electrical machine in action.

712. What will be the action of the plates on the puppets placed between them?—The figures will be attracted by the upper plate, then repelled from it, then discharged by the lower plate, then attracted by the upper plate, &c.

"CAN'T AFFORD IT."

"CAN'T afford it, Maria."

"But you might if you would only think so, Walter," pleaded the young wife.

"I can't do it," the husband returned, very emphatically. "It would cost ten or twelve shillings, at the very lowest, to put up such a gate, and the old bars will answer every purpose."

"No, they won't, Walter. The neighbours' children very often leave the bars down, and then stray cattle come into the garden. We may lose more than the price of a gate in one hour, if a cow should happen to get in when I am away."

"I should like to know who leaves the bars down," said Walter, very threateningly. "The same children might leave a gate open."

"But we can have a gate made to close of its own accord, with a weight or a spring," suggested the wife. "John Niles has had a gate put up in his yard."

"But I ain't John Niles, my dear," Walter wished his wife to remember.

"But his family is as large as yours, and his wages are not so high."

"Never mind about that. I tell you I can't afford it—at any rate, not at present." And with this Walter started off for his work.

Walter Gray was a young man, about thirty; an industrious mechanic; had been married some eight years; and had an interesting family. He meant to provide well for those who depended upon him, and in a measure he did so. But there were many little comforts of which he felt obliged to deprive them,—comforts which at times they really needed, and which, in the end, might have proved a source of saving. And more, too; it might have added to his own happiness had he felt able to grant these little requests. But he couldn't afford it; at least, so he thought, and whether he thought so with sound judgment the sequel will prove.

The gate which his wife had been so anxious to have put up was needed at the entrance to the garden back of the house, where there was only a pair of short bars. The children often came through there, and sometimes left the way open behind them. In short, there were many ways in which those bars were apt to be left down, and Maria Gray had very often to leave her work to drive out cattle that had got in. It was only by extreme watchfulness on her part that the garden was preserved. She had spoken several times to her husband about it, but he felt that he couldn't afford it. She must keep her eyes upon the spot, and see that the bars were kept shut.

Only a few days after this, Mrs. Gray asked her husband if he was going to hire a pew in the church for the following year, and he told her that he did not think he should.

"But you can hire half of one. We can have half of Mr. Niles's pew for a guinea."

"I can't afford it," was Walter's reply. "I should get no great good from the services any way."

"Don't say so, husband. Suppose everybody should feel like that. You certainly wouldn't wish to live, and bring up your children, where there was no religious influence. And if you reap the benefits of good Christian institutions, you certainly ought to feel willing to help to support them."

"So I would be willing, if I could afford it; but I can't."

Mrs. Gray looked very serious, and seemed to hesitate, as though there were a subject upon her mind, which she felt delicate about broaching; but it had occupied her thoughts too long, and she determined to let it out.

"Walter," she said, a little tremulously, but still resolutely, "you have two pounds a week."

"Yes."

"And how much of that does it take to feed us?"

"I don't know, I'm sure. I only know that it takes it all to feed and clothe us, and pay up the interest on the house."

"I haven't had a new dress since last autumn; and I was reckoning up yesterday how much we had spent for the children, and I found it to be only three pounds for the last ten months. I have worked over some of cousin John's clothes for Charles, and Lucinda jumps into Mary's dresses as the latter outgrows them."

"That's all very well," replied Walter, a little testily. "I understand my own business, and I know just what I can afford and what I can't. While I have the payments to make on my house I must economise—I must economise," he repeated, very decidedly.

"And I would have you economise," returned the wife; "but do not forget that all is not economy which many call so. I think that to hire half of John Niles's pew would be a great source of economy in comfort and lasting good. It would be a guinea laid out to good advantage—sure to return a heavy interest to us and our children. And I think it might be a source of great saving to put a good gate up at the back—"

"Stop!" interrupted Walter, with a nervous motion. "You've said enough about this. I know my means."

"Let me say one word," urged Maria. There was an earnestness in her tone which caused her husband to stop and listen. "If you will give me a guinea a week I will agree to furnish all the provisions for the household, and clothe myself and children. I will do this for one year. That will leave you seventy pounds with which to clothe yourself and make your payment on the house. On the house you have only to pay twenty pounds, with interest for two years, which will leave you twenty-nine pounds for your clothes and—other expenses."

Walter was upon the point of denying this result of the case, but he saw, upon a moment's reflection, that, from his wife's statement, the deduction was correct, so he denied the statement.

"You cannot furnish the food, and clothe yourself and children, for the sum you have named," he said.

Thereupon Maria sat down and made known a few facts to him that had been hidden within the mysteries of her own housekeeping. She was not long in proving to him that, during the past year, the items of expenditure within said limits had not averaged a guinea per week. Walter said "Pooh!" and then he added—"Nonsense!" and then he left the house.

"There must be some mistake," he said to himself, after he had got away from the house; and he really believed there was a mistake.

"Have a glass of soda, Bill? Come, Tom—have a glass."

"Don't care if I do," said Tom and Bill.

"Have some, Ned?"

And Ned said yes. So the clerk prepared four glasses of soda, for which Walter Gray paid two shillings.

"Let's have a game of 'seven-up' for the oysters," said Bill, after the day's work was done.

The game was played, and Walter lost, so he paid five shillings for four oyster suppers—suppers which none of them needed, and which did them more hurt than good.

"Have a cigar, Walter?" asked Tom.

Walter said yes, and in return paid for four glasses of ale.

One evening they met, after work, and Ned proposed that they should "toss up" to see who should pay for the grog.

"Come, John—won't you come in?" he said, addressing John Niles, who stood by.

"No—think not," was John's reply.

"You'd better. It's only for the grog—for five, if you come in."

"I can't."

"It's of no use to ask him," spoke Walter, in a rather sarcastic tone. "He don't spend his money in that way."

John's face flushed, and his lips trembled; but he restrained the biting words which were struggling upon his tongue, and turned and left the shop.

"He's a mean fellow," cried Tom, loud enough for Niles to hear.

"Tight as the bark of a tree," added Walter, in a tone equally loud.

John Niles heard the remarks, but he did not come back.

The four remaining men "tossed up," and the lot fell upon Walter and Tom. Then they "tossed it off," and it fell upon Walter, who paid four shillings for the grog.

Walter started for home about nine o'clock, and on the way he was overtaken by Niles.

"Walter," said the latter, in a kind but earnest tone. "I want to speak with you. You have wronged me this evening, and I wish you to understand me. For the opinions of Bill Smith or Ned Francis I care not, but I do not wish you to misapprehend me. We live too near together, and I would not lose your good opinion."

"Well—go ahead," returned Walter, who was sensible of the fact that his companion was one of the best and kindest neighbours in the world.

"You said I was mean."

"No, no; 'twas not I who said that."

"Well! you said I was 'tight as the bark of a tree!'"

Walter could not deny this, so John proceeded—

"I refused to join you in your little game for three reasons, either one of which should have been sufficient to deter me: first, I had resolved not to engage in any such games of hazard; second, I did not want any grog; and third, I could not have afforded to pay for five extra suppers, if the lot had fallen upon me."

"Couldn't have afforded it?" repeated Walter, with a slight tinge of unbelief in his tone.

"No," returned the other; "I could not. I used to be always ready for any such game, and I thought 'twould be mean to refuse; but I have learned better. Let me tell you how I first came to see the folly of being afraid to spend my money for nothing. Shall I tell you?"

"Certainly," returned Walter, who already began to see something.

"Well," pursued Niles, "one noon, as I was going away from home, my wife asked me for five shillings. She wanted it to buy some cloth with. I asked her if she could not get along without it. I had only fifteen shillings with me, and I hated to let one of them go. She said she really needed the cloth, but if I hadn't got the money to spare, she could wait. I knew she was disappointed, but I thought she could get along, and I went away. That evening I went into the saloon, and we had a fine social time. It cost me just seven-and-sixpence. I paid the money willingly—without even a thought of objection—and then I went home. When I entered the hall I heard my wife trying to pacify our eldest child. The little thing had expected a new dress, which had been promised her, and she felt badly because she had not got it."

"Wait," urged my wife, as the child sobbed in her disappointment. 'Papa hasn't got the money now; but he'll have some by-and-by, and then you shall have a pretty dress. Poor papa has to work hard.'

"The words smote me to the heart. I could not afford five shillings to dress my little child, but I could afford any amount for the useless entertainment of others! The crown which my needy wife could not get when she asked for it, I paid away almost twice-told for nothing. But it taught me a lesson. I opened my eyes, and I have kept them open. On the very next morning I afforded my wife the crown, but I could not afford any more for the beer-man. I had not dreamed how much I was wasting; but when I stopped up that leak, and allowed my funds to flow into their proper channel, I soon found that I could afford every reasonable comfort my wife and children needed. So I stick to the principle which has proved so beneficial to myself and family. Ah! what's that? There's an animal in your garden, Walter."

They had reached the garden fence, and, by the dim starlight, Walter could see a horned beast trampling amongst his sweet corn. The bars had been either left down, or hooked down, and a stray cow had got in. They drove her out, and then Niles went home. Walter saw that the beast had done considerable damage, but he was not angry, for he had something of more importance to think of. He went and sat down beneath an apple-tree, and pondered.

"Bless me, if he hasn't put the case down about square!" he said to himself, at the end of some minutes of meditation. "Let me see," he pursued—"There's five shillings for spirit—four and twopence for ale—four and twopence for soda. And that's within the last three days. Thirteen and fourpence! Is it possible? Over twenty-five pounds a year! And yet I can't afford ten shillings for a gate, nor a guinea that my family may receive religious instruction for a year! Walter Gray—I think you had better turn over a new leaf!"

And Walter Gray did turn over a new leaf. On the very next day he did two things, thereby astonishing two parties. He had a new gate made for the entrance to the garden, and thereby astonished his wife; and he refused to "toss up" for the ale, and thereby astonished a crowd of expectant thirsty ones. For a month he pursued this course, and by the expiration of that time he could fully appreciate the new blessings that were dawning upon him. He discovered that he could afford everything which the comfort of his family demanded; and in arriving at this result he had only to relinquish those things which he really could not afford. It was a wonder to him how he could have been so foolish. When at the end of the year he had paid his note, and had twenty pounds left, he felt at first as though there must be some mistake; but when his wife went over their household expenditure with him, and showed him that all they had needed had been bought and paid for, he saw just how it was. He saw that for years he had been wasting his substance, and depriving himself and loved ones of the comforts they needed—not intentionally, but through the strange mistake that leads thousands in the same course. But he did so no more.

Sometimes, even now, Walter Gray says—"Can't afford it," and he says it very emphatically, too. But it is not when his wife or children ask for comfort and joy, nor yet when the needy poor ask for help and charity—for he can well afford all that; but it is when the wild speculator or the loose companion ask him to engage in some game of hazard which may rob himself and family of their substance. Then he says—and he repeats it if need be—"CAN'T AFFORD IT!"

HYMN TO THE LATE AUTUMN.

I know that thou art beautiful,
Late Autumn! with thy plumes
Of crimson, purple, green, and gold,
Amid the thickening glooms;
I know there is a music sweet
From thy soft western breeze,
That like a thoughtful minstrel moves
Among the answering trees;
But still a sadness and unrest
When thou dost come, will take my breast.

How drearily then the withered leaves
Will rustle to my tread,
And I must think of those within
The City of the Dead;
The eloquent music of the wind
Will but a requiem seem
Along the painted forest aisles,
And by the darkling stream;
The purple leaf, the hectic flower,
Seem chosen for a burial hour.

The very sky, though glowing still
With yonder glorious sun,
Or stars that proudly guard the moon
When she his realm hath won;
The very sky will have a hue
That wakens solemn thought,
And all the clouds appear to me
For some great sorrow brought—
Some sorrow I cannot divine,
Yet shadowing vale and mountain shroud.

And yonder Ocean, on whose strand
I've walked in summer-time,
And heard, with light, exultant soul,
The everlasting chime—
That Ocean—ah! what mournful notes
Will then arise to me,
Speaking of faded Life, and Death,
And veiled Eternity;
I can but lay me down and moan
In unison with every tone.

I know there are some souls whose mould
Is such that they can ne'er
This weird, sad feeling understand,
When comes the fading year;
But it is mine! and oh! how oft
I have in vain essayed
To call a happier aspect up,
And wave away the shade;
Then, till the sad, dark scenes pass by
To other regions let me fly!

No! shrinking spirit, no! perchance
This gloom but brings to thee
A blessing bright, and broad, and deep
In its great mystery;
Not from the touch of Joy alone
The soul perfected stands;
A sober, lasting majesty
Must come from Sorrow's hands
Oh, this the lesson Autumn speaks
On withering gleus and shadowed peaks!

CAPTAIN HARRISON, COMMANDER OF THE LEVIATHAN.

LEVIATHAN STEAM-SHIP.

THE LEVIATHAN.

ENGLISHMEN are justly proud of their maritime supremacy. Our insular position has rendered this supremacy of the highest importance to us; on it has depended our very existence as a nation; and there is, therefore, singular propriety in our speaking of our ships as "wooden walls," and as "bulwarks of the deep." Our naval history is replete with great victories, and lustrous with the names of great naval heroes. Our ancestors asserted their hereditary right to the sovereignty of the seas, and that claim was completely established by our naval achievements. In the time of war, our fleets have been unrivalled; they have guarded our own shores from invasion, and blockaded the ports of our enemies; they have extended our empire, and consolidated our power. In time of peace, our merchant navy has been equally serviceable: enabling us to establish commercial relations with all nations; to lay the foundation of flourishing colonies; to open up new marts for commerce; and to increase our trade beyond all precedent.

The progress which we have made in our naval affairs is seen in tracing the development of our naval architecture. Our Saxon forefathers were proud of their ships, and Alfred the Great constructed vessels on an entirely new plan; the Anglo-Normans made considerable improvement on the Saxon vessels, and their fleet of "stout" ships, which bore Richard and the Crusaders to the Holy Land, excited universal admiration. Henry V. maintained our national supremacy on the sea, and humbled all the maritime powers of Europe. Henry VII. built the largest vessel which had ever carried English colours, and called it the Great Harry. But the fleets of those days were, as to size and tonnage, utterly insignificant when compared with those of our own times. The whole of the vessels in the fleet of Queen Elizabeth amounted to 197, and their united tonnage was but 29,744. Sir Walter Raleigh considered that 100 feet in length, and 35 in width was a good proportion for "a great ship."

The protracted and disastrous European wars of modern days have certainly exercised a beneficial influence on our navy. We had powerful foes to contend with, foes whose resources were ample, whose fleets were well manned and skilfully commanded. We were compelled to improve the build of our ships, and the vessels which we captured served as models for some of our men-of-war, and suggested improvements and alterations in the work of our naval architects; and, while our line-of-battle ships maintained our supremacy on the sea, the increase of our commercial relations, and the establishment of distant colonies, rendered a safe and expeditious transport absolutely necessary. Great as were the improvements made in our sailing vessels, they were eclipsed by the introduction of steam navigation, and the fastest clipper that ever weathered a storm sank into insignificance when compared with a vessel propelled by the screw or the paddle-wheel.

The first lines of steamers were established between England and Ireland, and England and France. The trips were soon extended, and in 1836 the New York and Liverpool packet ships were eclipsed by a magnificent steam fleet. Steam navigation once introduced was rapidly improved. The dimensions of the vessels were increased; the screw-propeller was applied; scientific investigation triumphed over numerous difficulties which, at the beginning, appeared insurmountable. Gigantic vessels, propelled by steam, vessels commodious and elegant in all their compartments, vessels carrying large numbers of passengers and valuable cargoes, have now ridden over almost all the waters of the world. The black funnel, instead of the white sail, is the sign of our naval power. Again and again capital and enterprise have been employed in some important alteration or some startling novelty in our steam fleets. Wooden walls have been changed to walls of iron, and ships hitherto accounted monsters of the deep have dwindled into insignificance by the launch of some new ocean giant.

Off Deptford floats the last specimen of our modern naval architecture. Ships of all rigs are about her. There is a forest of masts in the pool, masts of goodly vessels; there are steamers of handsome proportions passing and re-passing continually; there are shipyards and docks near at hand, and quite a maritime population; and there, amongst them all, is the huge black hull, stretching along for nearly 700 feet, and rising to about forty or fifty; looking like some natural phenomenon—a monster that had entered our river, and was unable to find its way back to the sea.

The Leviathan steam-ship is no ordinary vessel. She is the child of steam. No carpenter laid her keel, nor raised her ribs; an engineer was her architect; brawny smiths were her builders; the potent arm of steam welded her iron shafts, shaped, and planed, and punched her iron plates; 3,000,000 iron bolts, driven in at a white heat by sturdy Vulcans, have fastened her together; and thus, unlike the shipping round about her, the iron monster awaits completion—awaits the hour when she shall begin her marvellous, and, we trust, prosperous career.

No doubt, many of our readers have paid a visit to the Leviathan. She has attracted thousands. Her dimensions alone are sufficient to excite astonishment. No other steam-ship admits of a comparison with her. The Persia, the largest paddle steamer ever built, was 390 feet in length; the Himalaya, the largest screw ever built, was 370 feet in length; the Leviathan is 696. Her breadth across the paddle-boxes is 118 feet; her depth from deck to keel 58; she has four decks, six masts, is capable of carrying more than 6,000 square yards of canvas; she has 10 anchors, 20 boats; her paddle-wheels are 56 feet in diameter, and weigh 185 tons; her paddle-engines are of 1,000 horse power; she has 4 boilers with 10 furnaces to each; each boiler is about 17 feet long, 17 wide, and 14 in height, and contains a weight of 40 tons of water; she has a screw 24 feet in diameter, having a nominal horse-power of 1,600, and performing 50 revolutions in a minute; the screw has 6 boilers, with 12 furnaces to each; and the vessel is altogether 22,500 tons burden. She will contain 30,000 plates of wrought iron, measuring 60,000 feet, and weighing 8,000 tons.

With machinery so enormous, one might imagine that but little room would remain for passengers; but so far from this being the case, the accommodation is ample. Irrespective of the officers and crew there is room and to spare for 4,000 passengers, and 6,000 tons of cargo. The Leviathan would contain bodily the chief hotels in London, including the Great Western at Paddington and the Great Northern at King's-cross. She would carry a town; transport a good-sized settlement; form a floating kingdom; so that the responsibility of command is very great, and it is well to know that so able and experienced an officer as Captain Harrison is intrusted with that important position. He has seen much service, and is eminently qualified for command. He has closely watched over the building of the gigantic vessel which is to be intrusted to him; he has seen her extend her noble proportions; has seen her slowly leave her building ground and take to the water. No man knows more about her, or is better able to command her, than Captain Harrison.

But when is the vessel to take her farewell of the Thames?—when are her saloons and berths to be fitted up, and passengers induced to undertake the trial trip? Some fatality seems to hang over the gigantic ship. Her construction was suggested by certain disadvantages belonging to all steamers previously built. The plans proposed were obviously based on strictly practical principles, and the Great Eastern Steam Navigation Company was formed for carrying out the project. The capital of the company is £1,200,000, in shares of £26 each, with power to increase to £2,000,000, of which £500,000 was called up and expended in the construction of the vessel; totally irrespective of the internal fittings, which are not yet in existence. Mr. Scott Russell was, at the very outset, chosen as the builder. He undertook to construct her on what is called the "wave" principle, and is, as he himself remarks, "responsible for her merits or defects as a piece of naval architecture." Mr. Brunel was the engineer.* A plot of ground adjoining Scott Russell's works at Millwall was leased by the company; and every preparation being made in the erection of foundries, forges, rolling-mills, &c., the building commenced on the 1st of May, 1854. On Tuesday, November 3rd, 1857, the first attempt was made to launch the vessel. A large proportion of the Londoners turned out to see the Leviathan make her first plunge, and were vastly disappointed by the monster of the deep remaining fast, and refusing to take to the water. The attempt was renewed on the 19th of November; but with very little success, and with the destruction of the apparatus employed in the launch. On the 28th of November the vessel moved some five-and-twenty feet, and it was evident that the launch was merely a work of time. The completion of the long-deferred launch was at length accomplished on the 31st of January. The mighty ship, as soon as she was fairly in the water, glided, smoothly as a swan, to her moorings. But the immense cost of that protracted launch was an item of expenditure on which the Great Eastern Steam Company had never calculated. Now that the vessel is afloat, the question arises, What is to be done with her? Will the company complete their gigantic undertaking? Is there any possibility of another company being formed for the purpose of employing this enormous steam ship? or, is it likely that the government will come to the rescue, and, by the purchase of the Leviathan, add to our magnificent steam navy this last and noblest triumph of engineering skill? The answer to such queries is plain and satisfactory. English enterprise and English capital are inexhaustible, and whether the present company retain possession of their noble vessel, or whether some more adventurous capitalists purchase of them the proprietorship, it is quite certain that the latest and greatest triumph of the shipwrights' art will soon be applied to the useful purposes for which she was originally designed, and that she will carry to the remotest corner of the world the palpable evidence of our genius, energy, and power.

SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER CXVI.

"The days when we went gipsying, a long time ago."
OLD SONG.

LARKY GRIGG thought Steenie had already had a glass too much. As for himself, nothing fermented or distilled ever passed his lips. "Now, then, mate," said Steenie, "I'll stand treat."

"No," said Larky. "The cup that cheers, but not inebriates, for me, Steenie. If Meg and you will pour me out a cup of tea, we'll have a good talk over old times."

Meg had been sobered down by Larky Grigg's remarks, and her only evidence of fondness now was the sitting with her hand in Steenie's. She gladly assented to Larky's proposition.

A little round table in the inn parlour was quickly got ready for them. Meg, her freckled face shining with delight, yellow soap, and pride, her cap flaunting with white satin ribbons, in a light print dress and a bright yellow shawl, presided over the tea-table.

Hot muffins, buttered toast, and cold beef, formed the bridal banquet.

They were very merry, and very happy, with their mutual reminiscences of the Green Fields ragged school, and their subsequent adventures in life.

And Larky was glad and proud to trace the hallowing influence of Mr. Stephen and the ragged school, even in the career of the once hardened victim of prison discipline and private whippings—Stunning Steenie.

"Afore I went to sea," said Steenie, with a flush of honest pride, "I manes arter I left ragged school, and wor turned out by them, I won't run down, 'cos of 'Honour thy feather and thy mother, and thy days shall be long in the land;' afore I went to sea, as I may say, and wor without no kind o' berth, run aground, turned adrift, and well-nigh done. I've known hunger and thirst, mate; I've been three blessed—I'd a' most said, cussed days, without a bite or a sup; I've had to lie all night under them 'Delphi arches; I've had good safe easy jobs offered to me by my old pals, Friggling Peter and the Fox, and I've turned away sick and giddy, and light w' hunger, and prayed a bit, with the rats a-watching me with their bright, calculating eyes, as reck'ning how long I'd be like to last, and, when I'd all but gived in, I've had a kind of a vision of ragged school, and Mr. Stephen, and Jem Goodman, and blessed little Hope Evermore, and you, Larky Grigg; and I've seen dancing before my eyes, 'Thou shalt not steal,' and have said in my sick heart, 'Deliver me from evil,' and then I cried, 'No, no, get thee behind me, Satan;' and at these words them old pals took huff and left me, and I fell asleep among them hungry rats, and the very next day the first thing I sees, when I wakes, is 'Wanted some strong young men for her Majesty's Royal Navy,' and I went and offered myself, and got the bounty money, and was clothed and fed, and provided for quite providential-like, and all this luck I owes to ragged school: I not only wor tached not to steal, but twor there I learnt to read, which wor the pedigree of the whole thing, mate, for if I could not have read that 'ere notice, I'd never have knowed sich a chap as I wor wanted; then I'd have gone wrong, most-like I'd never have been a sailor; if I'd never have been no sailor, I'd never have been to the 'Jolly Tar,' at Deal, where Meg there wor barmaid; we'd never have kept company, nor got spliced, and there'd have been a precious go!"

In such innocent, frank-hearted converse they whiled away the whole evening; indeed, it was very late before they parted, and when Larky was left alone, he found that a new set of ideas had been planted in his mind by remarks made at random by Stunning Steenie.

Larky Grigg was, as we have said, out of work.

He had no immediate prospect of employment, and yet the wish to be doing, earning, getting on, making a name and a fortune, was strong in his loving, aspiring heart.

Stunning Steenie had spoken of lands where a good mechanic could command high wages, time and opportunity for improvement, and many great and invaluable advantages.

Larky was a good mechanic; in spite of Mr. Nailer's selfish and cruel injustice in keeping him down, and wasting his genius and time at shovel-making, he had, in his leisure hours—hours snatched, as the self-educated man is always obliged to snatch them, from the brief seasons of rest, recreation, and meals—mastered the principles of mechanics, and had perfected himself in the practical parts also.

He was then worth his weight in gold in the colonies.

It was an open field—labourers were actually wanted—there was room to advance.

He might wait long for some poor situation in England. He was sure of a very lucrative one the moment he set foot on the great world of Australia.

But if he decided on this, he must not go home. His mother dreaded the sea, which she had never beheld, as we all dread the invisible, the unknown, the vast, the incomprehensible.

She would not ask him with her tongue not to go, but she would compel him with her tears to stay by her side. Bold Larky could not resist the smallest tear in that dear mother's large, loving eye.

No, if he went (and he had almost made up his mind to go), he must not expose himself to the unnerving process of an interview with his mother, nor must Hope know of his intention until he had put it into execution; then, of course, both those dear ones would make up their minds, or rather their hearts, to the inevitable, and look forward with hope to his return, and, with a sort of joy and comfort, to brighter days to come.

When Larky met Stunning Steenie and his bride, Carrot Meg, the next morning, he consulted the bridegroom, who had a good practical experience in such matters, and who introduced Larky Grigg to a boat-swain, and to two or three sailors older and more intelligent than himself, who soon suggested how Larky Grigg might work his passage out to Australia, and, once there, find himself on the high road to fortune.

It seemed Larky's best chance of a berth was to travel to Deal, where one of the sailors prophesied he would, being a strong, likely hand, get his passage out to Sydney for his labour.

Larky, who had no idea that his mother and Hope had never received his letters written after his illness at Mrs. M'Dougal's, felt no uneasiness on that score.

Being rather short of money, he did not refuse a sovereign which Stunning Steenie forced on him as a loan, and very good-naturedly filled his knapsack with things to eat, drink, and wear; and, high in hope, Larky Grigg set out on foot, having taken a very affectionate leave of Stunning Steenie and his bride.

Larky Grigg, quite restored to health and strength, and, though town-bred, loving the country, and delighting to visit places of which he had read and thought much but had never expected to see, enjoyed the idea of this walking tour through the garden-land of England.

In high spirits, then, he set off for Deal, and while he is footing it merrily along, "whistling as he went," but not for want of thought, nor, for that matter, deep, earnest thought, he traversed highways and by-ways, passed through sweet lanes and across green commons, halting at little quiet inns, or, failing them, humble cottages, never forgetting to rest on the Sabbath and offer up his prayers in some little village church for his Hope and his parents, and that a blessing might rest on his earnest endeavour to earn a name and a fortune worthy of his beloved one.

His kindly, honest, and brightly intellectual countenance was a letter of recommendation whenever he needed one. No one refused him a lift by day, or a shelter at night. Many an old woman blessed his handsome, honest face, many a young maid looked after him with a tear and a sigh, and found some clown who courted her all the more clownish, and the less welcome, for this meeting with our Larky.

CHAPTER CXVII.

Oh, now I see Queen Mab hath been with you.

SHAKESPEARE.

I had a dream which was not all a dream.—BYRON.

LARKY GRIGG had made his way from the extreme north of England to the south-east.

He had seen much, felt much, and thought much during this walking tour.

All appearance of pallor and delicacy was gone from his fine bright face.

A glow of health and a warm tint of sunburn covered all his honest features except his brow.

The broad straw hat he wore protected that, and the consequence was that it was smooth and white as marble.

It was a fine evening when Larky Grigg entered Deal.

The sun was setting intensely red, and very large and round in the west, while the moon, pale, wan, and haggard, like an actress by daylight, might be seen looking at a sky almost as pale as herself.

However, the shadows were deepening, the light was fading away, and as sky and sea assumed a darker azure, the ripples of the waves became opal and pale gold, and the queen of the night resumed her empire, and gave, in her right royal bounty, a silver token to every leaf of the trees, every tile on the roofs, every curl of the waves, and undulation of the sands.

Larky Grigg entered Deal on foot, sore, tired, and rather dispirited.

He had been troubled (as he took his mid-day rest under a hay stack) with a dream so vivid, that he could not shake off its influence.

He dreamt that he saw his mother Apple Blossom and his darling Hope, the one dying on her well-remembered bed, the other an angel hovering over her with radiant hair, seraphic countenance, and snowy wings.

Three times he distinctly saw this bright, but to him most painful, vision; it haunted him throughout the day.

It made him ponder on the fact that he had not heard from either his mother or his bride elect—the former since he had left her in London, the latter since he had met her at Burnside, and clasped her to his heart, beneath the cold stars and gnome-like tree, on the wild purple heather.

Larky Grigg could not drive from his mind the thought that there might be something amiss.

Lovers are always ingenious self-tormentors; he could not tear his mind from the contemplation of "chimeras dire."

However, Larky Grigg resolved not to give way to enervating and groundless fears; but he determined to write to his mother and his sweet Hope before he stretched his weary, aching limbs on a bed that night.

Before he sought out the Jolly Tar, an inn to which he had been strongly recommended by Stunning

* For biographical sketch and portrait of this eminent engineer, see page 247.

Steenie and his Meg—he went into a small stationer's, and purchased paper, envelopes, pens, ink, wax, and a little seal representing two willows whose green tresses mingled, although a stream flowed between their roots; the motto of this seal was "Destiny severs, but inclination unites us." This seemed to Larky exactly applicable to himself and Hope. The shopwoman did up the stationery Larky had bought in a piece of an old newspaper. He paid her for her goods, and he thanked her for her kindness, and having learnt from her where the True Briton was, and heard it was on the quay, he hastily repaired thither.

Sailors were drinking and singing in the large public room; but, on Larky's explaining to the landlady (a kind, motherly woman) that he wanted a quiet tea and the opportunity of writing a couple of letters, she invited him to her own tea-table, and, after he had refreshed himself with excellent tea, ham, eggs, and buttered toast, he told her, in reply to her questions, something of his object in coming to Deal. He named the men to whom Stanning Steenie had recommended him—Tom Piper and Bill Bullhead.

Mrs. Grogg knew them well, she knew Steenie, too, and Meg had been her barmaid. She was a very lively, zealous, energetic little woman—a widow—and she assured Larky Grigg that if he would listen to her, she would advise him better how to act than any one else could.

She assured him that she had interest to get him his passage out, if he were not above working; and hearing he wished to work his way out above all things, she left him to go in search of some marine potentate, and Larky Grigg, having had her permission to sit down at her work-table, took out his little parcel of stationery, and prepared to write to his mother.

Just as had taken the pen in hand, his eye was attracted by the words "Larky Grigg," in large letters, heading an advertisement on the scrap of the Times in which the stationery had been wrapped.

Larky seized the piece of paper, and, with eyes distended, lips apart, alternately hot and cold, and his hair on end, read—

LARKY GRIGG.—Should this meet the eyes of Gregory Blossom, commonly called Larky Grigg, he is earnestly implored to return to his disconsolate family. His mother keeps her bed from illness and anxiety about him, and H. E. is distracted at his long silence.—L. G. has not been seen or heard of, since he parted from H. at B—e. If he values his mother's life, he will return at once to dispel her fears.

The paper dropped from Larky's nerveless hand. A cold perspiration broke out over his face, an icy electric eel seemed to crawl up his spine, tears, hot tears, gushed to his eyes, and he clasped his hands as he murmured, involuntarily—

"My mother! my poor, darling, kindest mother! ill, in dread suspense and terror about me! sick, perhaps dying! I cannot go till I have seen her; dear, kind, blessed mother! and oh, if I should arrive too late! I have but six shillings left, how shall I get to her in time? Were all the wealth of the diggings offered me to go to Sydney now, I would not do it without her leave and blessing!"

When the landlady returned he showed the scrap of paper. She guessed the cause of his agitation, when he said—

"I am Larky Grigg! my mother is ill through my folly. I cannot go—I must be off to town at once; nothing shall keep me now, nothing!"

Kindly the landlady got at the truth of the case, and gently—being a motherly and very good woman, a publican but no sinner—she won from him all the state of his finances, and the agony of his mind.

She agreed with him that there was no time to be lost, and she most generously forced upon him a small loan, but quite sufficient to take him to town by the mail train.

In half an hour Larky Grigg found himself seated in a second-class carriage on his way to London. While he is gliding along the shining rails, let us inquire what has become of his Hope, our Hope, and (may we say it?) the reader's Hope.

CHAPTER CXVIII.

"Though yet unweid.

That love was pure, and far above disguise
Had stood the test of mortal enemies."—Byron.

WE left Hope Evermore on the eve of her seven-teenth birthday.

She had parted with her lover because duty was the guiding principle of both young hearts; and he, though he loved her so fondly, would not exact a sacrifice which she, in her womanly and loving reverence, would have made had he required it.

The eve of this birthday was the most eventful day of Hope's young and innocent life. She had not only seen her lover so unexpectedly, and seen him for the first time carried away by the intensity and vehemence of a passion it was his delicate pride, in a general way, to hide in the depths of his manly heart; but she had heard from his lips that her father was living, was at hand, was about to claim her as his child, to instal and introduce her as his daughter. That this father was a gentleman, and that all hopes of a union with her beloved, her affianced Larky Grigg, were, for the present, at an end; but then there was a long bright future opening to the man of genius, the powerful-minded, resolute, untiring, energetic, self-educated man.

He, who had already so greatly distinguished himself among his mates of the workshop by his genius in the application of mind to matter, and science to substance, he had only to persevere, to think, to study, and to experimentalise, to become in time as great as Stephenson, Watt, Faraday, or any other son of the people, who had risen by the force of unaided genius and industry to be a magnate among men.

Often had Hope listened, with beating heart and sympathetic ambition, to Larky Grigg's prophecies of future triumphs.

He had, as genius always has, an inward sense of power; and she had, as love always has, a boundless faith in its object.

Therefore, as she was resolved to be true to the only love and choice of her heart, and he had vowed eternal constancy to her, and had never had one wish or thought of change, Hope looked upon her happiness as only deferred.

She was determined never to marry any man but Larky Grigg; and she felt such a strong and vivid confidence in the genius that was to make Larky one day great and wealthy, that she yielded her young heart to its passionate devotion, and looked with steady eye to a future in which, without any disgrace to her father's name, opposition to his wishes, or sacrifice of her position as a lady, she would wed her beloved in the face of her friends and of the whole world!

But in addition to Larky's unexpected and most agitating visit, and the interview that awakened all the passionate though long-slumbering echoes of her maiden heart, had succeeded the dreadful tidings of the death of the son of her benefactors—of that Walter, Lord Eaglescliffe, of whom his mother spoke so constantly and so devotedly, and on whose beauty, in the picture that represented him in his happy boyhood, Hope herself was wont to gaze with a mysterious interest and yearning tenderness for which she could not account, even to herself.

Yes, Hope! unselfish, loving, grateful Hope! her own woes shrank into nothing before the long despair of the bereaved and frantic mother.

CHAPTER CXIX.

"Time flies on, but there is sorrow
Which escapes not on its wings;
There is grief to which the morrow
Never consolation brings."—Æsop.

WHEN the medical man, whom Captain Greville went to seek, at length arrived, he at once ordered that Lady Glenlonely should retire to bed.

This the poor distraught creature opposed and resisted.

She found no comfort but in walking with rapid strides from one end of the room to the other, now stopping to drop on her knees in vain attempts at prayer, now beating her breast, or tearing her hair, or flinging her arms wildly aloft, as some scorpion fancy or maddening reminiscence goaded sorrow to despair.

Every argument was tried to induce her to go to bed. Lord Glenlonely was summoned from prayer and solitude to try his influence. He came, his eyes swollen and red with weeping, his late smooth brow furrowed, his cheeks ghastly pale.

He looked many years older than he had done before he heard of his son's death. It was unutterably piteous to hear the mother's answers to the entreaties that she would go to bed.

"To bed!" she cried, fixing her eyes wildly on her husband. "To bed! what bed has he? my Walter, my Eaglescliffe, my only boy, my love, my hope, my pride! Perhaps they have torn the beautiful rich auburn curls from his noble head; perhaps they have stripped the soft fair skin from his beautiful limbs, his dear breast, his lovely face. Perhaps at this very moment that you think I can find comfort in a bed of down, he lies broken by torture, racked by anguish—beauty, humanity obliterated, bleeding, ghastly, dead; scoffed at, outraged, insulted in death. And but for me, for my pride, my ambition, my implacable cruelty, he might now be with us here. He might be in a warm bed, his bride by his side, blessing and being blest. Oh, my Walter! my Eaglescliffe! my darling! how can I sleep? No, no, no, I can never sleep again."

With these and similar wild and passionate wallings, the wretched mother kept up her own despair, and rent the hearts of her hearers. At length, Lord Doun bethought him, that when she wildly asked for water, the medical man, whose chief object in getting her to bed was to administer a powerful sedative, should convey, in the beverage she drank so eagerly, a powerful dose of morphia. This hint having been acted upon, the room gradually darkened, and every one silent save the bereaved and agonised mother, she, in the course of an hour, began to feel the stupifying effect of this most timely opiate.

To images of death, of torture, and of horror succeeded soft visions of green fields, bright waterfalls, silver lakes—her Walter, her Eaglescliffe was still the central figure of the picture; but this opiate, when taken for the first time (as in this case it was), had the power of changing purgatory to Paradise.

Lady Glenlonely sank on the floor murmuring of her boy, his pony, his dogs, all that used to delight his happy boyhood. She was with him in the wood at Pemberton, and praising his graceful and bold horsemanship, as her head sank on her arm, and a deep sleep locked up her senses.

Then the doctor, with the aid of the Marquis of Doun and Captain Greville, gently lifted her up, and carried her to her bed, where they left her to Hope and the female servants.

Lord Glenlonely had retired to his room, overpowered by the anguish of his spirit, and the vivid recollections of happier days and his noble boy which had been conjured up by Lady Glenlonely in her opium-prompted dreams.

The first strong sedative administered to a human being is as powerful a remedy as bleeding for the first time,—it often saves a reason or a life; but each successive time its good influence wanes, while its evil one increases; and what at first saves, at last destroys life.

The Marquis of Doun and Captain Greville lingered on and on, in the expectation that Hope Evermore would come down to tell them how Lady Glenlonely was, and give them her, to them, enchanting company for half an hour; but Hope, her thoughts full of her poor lady, and wandering from the contemplation of the mother's anguish to him—to Larky Grigg—in his lonely wanderings and disappointed hopes, forgot all about those gentlemen, who were so important in their own eyes, and in those of all the female world beside.

But if Hope gave no thought to the most noble the marquis and most captivating captain, it was far otherwise with Nessy Fitz-Darrell. She fitted to and fro, and made excuses for consultations with Captain Greville, and persuaded them to come to a table on which she had ordered tea to be served; and she exerted herself to please, and talked eloquently, and looked very interesting; but all in vain. A pre-occupied heart is perfectly inaccessible; and even Nessy found it wearisome work to try to please two beings so full of another; and after awhile Greville went to his room, and the marquis drove off to the castle. Hope, meanwhile, sat watching the uneasy slumbers of the poor mother whose waking hour would be so terrible to bear and to witness.

The well-preserved beauty of the countess seemed to have vanished as by magic. Her features looked pale and sharp, her temples sunken, her cheeks hollow, her jaw dropped, dark hollows round her eyes, and a bluish shade about her pinched nose and mouth. Yet there was a ghastly smile upon her face as she slept, for she was dreaming still of her Walter's happy boyhood. Hope rose and stole to a room separated from her lady's only by a dressing-closet.

There, at a table, his Bible before him, but his head hidden on his arms, and the pages of The Book blistered with tears, was Lord Glenlonely. His hair looked very white in the bright light of the lamp, and by the convulsive movement of his chest, Hope knew that he was weeping.

She gently drew near, and dropping on her knees by his side, said, "May Heaven support and comfort you, my lord; and may the Saviour be with you in this hour!"

Gently the earl laid his hand on that fair young head bowed before him, and gently he said, "Thank you, and bless you, my child!"

Hope kissed his hand and quietly withdrew.

And then, as Lady Glenlonely still slept, she took a lamp and went in search of her mother's journal; and having drawn the bed curtains so as to exclude the light, Hope, with trembling awe, unclasped the book, and prepared to read her mother's history.

THE INDIAN GAME OF HAND.

THERE is in all games of chance a certain wild fascination, which seizes upon the mind, and holds it by a spell against which nothing can prevail. Reason, conscience, friendship, love—all intellect, all intuition, all ennobling virtues—are set aside by this demon of infatuation, which has enthroned itself within the highest and holiest sanctuary of the human temple.

This it is which makes the vice of gambling so fearfully hideous in the sight of the reasoning and pure of heart; for they know that it maddens, and that there is no evil excess of which the madman may not be guilty. Go where you will among the gamblers, of any and every description and grade, and you will find men reckless of every moral and religious principle—reckless of money, of honour, and of life. Once drawn within the dread vortex of gaming—within that vile circle where the wildest passions seethe and whirl without restraint—and the man is as surely lost as the vessel in the maelstrom.

But great and detestable as this monster vice is, it prevails among all kindreds, nations, and tongues throughout the world—alike in the rude wigwam of the savage and the palatial salon of the Parisian roué. No station, as a station, however exalted or however humble, is exempt from it, and its effects are alike baneful and destructive to all.

Among Christian nations the victim stakes his all—the all, perhaps, of those dependent upon him—and then adds the crowning crime of murder, by sending his own soul untimely into the presence of his Maker. Among barbarous nations, the victim, having lost his all, wagers a hand, an arm, a leg, a scalp, and sometimes his life, against a trifling stake—and, losing still, submits to the horrid mutilation without demur.

And what to a disinterested spectator would seem the strangest fact of all is, the simplicity of many of the most fearful games—the mere turn of a card or die, or the changing from one hand to another of a fruit-stone, deciding the forfeiture of money, limbs, and life. But whether it be complicated or the reverse—the fascinating Faro and Roulette of civilised fashion, or the simple game of Hand of the border savage—the effect is the same—blasting, blighting, destructive.

The most simple of all games, and one which might hardly be thought worthy to amuse a child, is the Game of Hand, as played by the savages of the Far West. It consists in one party shaking a plum or cherry-stone between his concave palms, closing both hands suddenly, and leaving the other party to guess which hand contains the stone—the latter either winning or losing his stake, whatever it may be, according as he names the right hand or the wrong. And yet, simple and nonsensical as this game may appear to the reason, it becomes one of most intense and terrible interest to the forest native, who will spend hours, and even days, in contest with an opponent, and only end in being the winner of all the other possesses, or the loser of all he can call his own, perhaps even his scalp and life.

Away out in the deep wilderness of that vast region of the Far West over which the foot of the white man has seldom passed, there bubbles up, with a hissing, purring sound, a spring of such clear, delicious water, that he who quenches his thirst thereat has only to regret that he can drink no more. This particular spring, like many of its kind, is impregnated with medicinal minerals, and pours its sparkling waters over the purest of white sand, through the sweetest of romantic valleys, and is held sacred as "great medicine" by all the different tribes who know of its locality.

Toward this spring one day, some several hundred moons ago, when the red man of this far-off region only had his quarrel with a foeman of his race, a young Sioux chief, in all the pride of paint and arms, was bending his steps, in eager haste, to quench his thirst and resume his journey, for he was alone upon the war path of the hated Crows, and had sworn to his Indian love to bring her the scalp of a foe as a bridal present ere the filling moon should wane.

But as, with the quick, light, and proud step of a skilful and daring brave, he came in sight of the sacred spring, what should his eyes behold but the person of a hated Crow, bending over and slaking his thirst with the sparkling, bubbling, life-renewing waters! Here was the very chance he was seeking; and quickly fitting an arrow to his bow, he threw his right foot gracefully back, drew the arrow to the head, and was just springing his arms for the fatal twang, when, like a blinding flash, the truth burst over him, that this was holy ground, and ground of peace, and that the Great Spirit would be angry with whomsoever should take vengeance upon a foe within its hallowed precincts. With this remembrance the arrow was again clasped peacefully; and, advancing straight to his recumbent foe, the Sioux chief proudly spoke:

"Shangasgah's eyes are keen, and he sees his foes afar; but within the hallowed light of Manitou the red deer might gambol undisturbed, though the young chief of the Sioux were dying of starvation."

At the first sounds of these words the Crow looked up; and then, rising with dignity, made answer when the Sioux had done:—"The Sioux, though a foeman, speaks with the reverence of a friend of this sacred place, and Kandarrah would never have shut his eyes and ears on other ground. The eyes of Kandarrah see clearly where other eyes fail, and the faintest sound is as thunder to his ears. But come! we will smoke the pipe of peace by the spring of Manitou, and when each is again upon his war-path, it shall be proved who is the greatest warrior of the two."

With this the two warriors approached and shook hands as friends; and the Crow, producing his pipe, filled with kinnik-kinnik (a substitute for tobacco among the western tribes), he lit it, and puffing four whiffs to the four points of the compass, he handed it to the Sioux, who followed his example. The Sioux then drank his fill at the spring; after which he proposed, as they were on sacred ground, where they could not fight, that both should sit down together, and peacefully pass the day in the fascinating game of Hand.

Accordingly, seating themselves near the spring, the fruit-stone was produced, and the game was begun with all the zest of two professional gamblers, each alternately hiding and guessing in the manner previously described. An arrow against an arrow was the first stake of each; and the very arrow which Shangasgah, the Sioux, had pointed with deadly intent at Kandarrah, the Crow, was the first stake lost and won.

This seemed a precursor of the fortune of the day; and arrow after arrow was staked by the Sioux, and won by the Crow, till the sheaf of Shangasgah was empty. Next his bow was staked and lost; then his club, his tomahawk, his blanket, and lastly his only remaining garments; all were staked in turn, and all were lost; and as the Sioux rose to his feet, entirely naked, with nothing but what nature gave him, and without a weapon for defence, he said, with the dignity becoming the younger chief of a powerful tribe:—

"Fortune has proved fickle to Shangasgah, who is now as the Great Spirit made him, and his many losses will bring joy to the lodge of Kandarrah; but Shangasgah has one stake yet to offer against what he has lost—a stake which, if won by Kandarrah, will bring him great honour among his nation: he offers to play his scalp against the winnings of his foe!"

The black eyes of the Crow gleamed with fierce delight as he accepted the challenge, and the game was played for the stake which both prized more than all the rest.

Fortune, however, still frowned upon the Sioux, and the game was won by his enemy. Without a murmur the loser now bent his head to the grasp of the winner, who, seizing the scalp-lock with one hand, and whirling the glittering knife around with the other, tore off the bloody trophy, and shook it aloft in triumph.

The young Sioux chief, having no more then to offer, said he would go back to his tribe, re-clothe and re-arm himself, and at a certain day in the future, which he named, he would again meet the Crow if he dared, and again venture his all upon the game which had for the time ruined him. Kandarrah promptly accepted the challenge, and the two warriors separated—the one to return to his home in triumph, and the other in gloom and disgrace.

True to their appointments, some several days after the events we have described, these two daring warriors again met alone, within the hallowed precincts of the sacred spring, and the game was again renewed with an eagerness never surpassed by two skilful gamblers in civilised life.

But fortune, ever fickle in games of chance, had now changed. This day the star of the Sioux was in the ascendant. All his former losings were won back, one at a time, until all were again in his possession. And still the exciting game went on, and still the Crow lost, till he at last stood naked as his foe had done before him.

"Kandarrah still owns his scalp," he exclaimed, somewhat fiercely; "and the scalp of a Crow is worth more than the scalp of a Sioux, with all his fortune added; but Kandarrah is great and generous—he stoops not to the small traffic of a squaw—and he will play his scalp against even the winnings of Shangasgah."

"The scalp of a Crow is better than the skin of a wolf," returned the other, with an ironical smile; "and though not the worth of what Kandarrah has lost, Shangasgah will suffer the game to proceed. Let the Crow name the hand which shall give him his winnings or Shangasgah his scalp."

As he spoke he shook the fruit-stone between the concave palms, closed both hands suddenly, and held them forward to the other; who, after a single moment's hesitation, put his right finger upon the left hand of the Sioux.

"The scalp of the Crow shall bring joy to the lodge of the brave Sioux chief!" exclaimed Shangasgah, with a grim smile of triumph, as he unclosed his fingers and showed an empty palm.

With a sullen and mortified look, the Crow silently bent his head to the knife of his foe, and a moment later his gory scalp was dangling before his eyes in the grasp of his enemy.

And now it was that, urged to desperation by his situation, the Crow hesitated not a moment to offer his life as a stake against the other's winnings. The wager was instantly accepted; and this time the Crow hid the fruit-stone, and his opponent named the hand.

But fate had doomed Kandarrah; and the hand which Shangasgah touched instantly opened, only to disclose the prize.

"Manitou has hid the light of his face from Kandarrah!" were the words which issued in a solemn, mournful tone from the lips of the doomed savage, as he slowly lifted his eyes towards the heavens. "Yes," he added, "the face of Manitou is behind the cloud, and the breast of Kandarrah shall be a sheath to the knife of Shangasgah. Strike! the war-brave of the great Crow nation knows no fear!"

These were the last words which ever passed the lips of the fated Crow—for scarcely were they uttered, ere, to the very haft, the knife of Shangasgah was plunged through his heart.

He fell without a groan, and died by the pure waters of the sacred spring, and the wolves came and devoured his body.

Shangasgah returned in triumph to his Indian love; and thenceforth, to the day of his death, he wore his own and his enemy's scalp suspended from his ears, in accordance with his barbarous ideas of honour and of glory.

THE STREET-PREACHER.

["ARCHBISHOP LEIGHTON, returning home one morning, was asked by his sister, 'Have you been hearing a sermon?' 'I've met a sermon,' was the answer. The sermon he had met was a corpse on its way to the grave; the preacher was Death. Greatest of street-preachers!"]

HAVE you seen the street-preacher,

That all times of year
Is busy proclaiming

His message of fear,
Which some time or other
All people must hear?

His foes are ten thousand;
But such is his might—
Were each a Goliath,

He knoweth the sleight
Whereby with a pebble
To put them to flight.

His speech is too lowly
An echo to wake,
As he comes to the threshold

His errand to make;
Yet never a preacher
So eloquent spake.

With look of assurance
Right fearful to see,
He finds out his victims

Wherever they be;
But never seems seeking
For you or for me!

He cometh at midnight,
And cometh at morn;
Of the mother he claimeth

Her baby new-born—
The bride of her bridegroom
He leaveth, forlorn.

When spring is the sweetest,
He blights the green grass,
And kills the young rose-buds,

And sighs of "alas!"
Are heard in the gardens
Through which he doth pass.

No need hath he ever
Of bread or of meat,
No need of wild honey

Or locusts to eat—
Room only he asks for
To preach in the street.

Shrink, hide from his presence,
However you may,
Hand to hand, face to face,

You will meet him some day
And turn and go with him
His terrible way.

PETER THE GREAT AND LOUIS XV.

PICTURES FROM HISTORY.

PETER THE GREAT AND LOUIS XV.

DESPOTIC, irresponsible power is at all times a dangerous, sometimes a fatal thing. Man is too weak and imperfect a creature to be trusted with unlimited authority over the lives and destinies of any number of his fellow-mortals; and thus it happens, that in the career of even the best among the despots who have made their mark in the book of the world's history, there are dark blots, evidences of times when passion and pride have overcome the sense of justice and equity, when the power to punish or to revenge has unhappily co-existed with some hasty sense of insult or wrong; and emperors and kings have done, perhaps, by a single command, or with a single pen-stroke, more injury to their own fair fame, and the happiness of their subjects, than the labour of a score years could undo; and all because there was nothing to restrain them, no power to delay, even for one instant, the execution of their sovereign will. Thus we have Charlemagne's Saxon wars, with all their accompanying horrors; Louis the Fourteenth's proceedings in the Palatinate, when peaceful villagers, by hundreds of thousands, were turned out of their homes to starve on the highroads in the depth of winter; Charles the Twelfth's murder of the patriot Patkul; Napoleon's murder of the Duke D'Enghien, with numerous others, "which now to enumerate," as the old classic has it, "would be tedious." There is hardly a despotic ruler of any note in whose career this fact is not exemplified.

But even despotism is not unmixed with good. God never allows a permanent existence to anything that is absolutely and unmixedly evil. In certain countries, and under particular circumstances, despotism is the only form of government possible, and liberalism would be at once misunderstood and despised. The warriors who followed Clovis into Gaul, respected him for slaying with his battle-axe the soldier who had insulted him, while they would have despised their chief for invoking the protection of the law. The Turkish cavaliers of Muley Ismael covered in slavish submission when their master rushed among them, dealing blows around him with his drawn scimitar, but they would not have remained quiet a day under a monarch who sought to rule by constitutional principles.

Now, if there was ever a people who required the stimulant of a despotic will to make them follow in the course of progress which all Europe was pursuing, while they lagged hopelessly in the rear, the Russians, at the end of the seventeenth century, were that people. An old Elizabethan writer, describing the "manners and customs of the Russes" in his time, had humorously wound up his remarks by observing that "manners they had none at all," and that "their customs were filthy;" and to the end of the seventeenth century the people thus described, had certainly made no great change for the better either by gain of "manners" or loss of "filthiness." One of the rules laid down, at a later date, by the Czarina, for observance at evening assemblies given by the first courtiers in the empire, will serve as an index to their refinement. "No gentleman," said the printed table of regulations, "was to be drunk before nine o'clock at night; and the ladies were not to get drunk at all." And this was polished Russian society, after it had been regenerated; of its probable state before that process, it is not difficult to judge. "Scrape the Russian," said Napoleon Bonaparte, "and you come down upon the Tartar." The Russian of that day needed no scraping—he was pure, unalloyed Tartar; ignorant, bloodthirsty, and debased.

The year 1682 is a great era in the Muscovite annals; for then there came to the throne a boy, ten years old, who was destined to alter the whole face of Russia—to introduce a new system throughout the length and breadth of that immense land. Czar Peter was no hero of romance—no handsome, gallant stripling, like Monmouth, the delight of a court, and the cynosure of all ladies' eyes. He was a Tartar, but an out-and-out Tartar; brimful of energy, ready and quick to learn, and as ready to carry out any scheme, as he was unscrupulous in the means he took for its accomplishment. He travelled through Austria, Holland, and England to study the arts of war, of ship-building, and of commerce. At Saardam, he lived in a little wooden hut, with two rooms, worked on the wharf with the shipwrights, and plied hammer and saw like the best of them. In England, he visited King William the Third, and presented him with a diamond of great value; but he did not get on very well with the noblemen of the court, except with one whom William had appointed as a sort of bear-leader to keep his imperial guest out of mischief, and who must have had a weary time of it, indeed.

For the Czar of all the Russias dwelt in a small house in a dingy street in Rotherhithe, and had a horrible habit of spending his evenings at a low public-house in that choice neighbourhood, smoking a clay pipe, and imbibing brandy with pepper in it; moreover, he would ask questions on all manner of subjects, and show great contempt if the answer he received was not quick, and straightforward, and to the purpose; and really the Czar's questions were very embarrassing—embracing as they did points of jurisprudence, politics, finance, shipbuilding, commerce, engineering, medicine, and polemics, all jumbled together pell-mell, in such confusion as almost to turn the unhappy nobleman's brain. It must have been a happy day for my lord, when the Czar at length turned his face due north, to carry among his savage subjects the result of his travelling experiences.

And what a result he achieved—but at what a cost! St. Petersburg was built on what had been a pestilent marsh on the Neva; but a hundred thousand Muscovites perished in building the city—Charles XII. was beaten, and his army destroyed, at Pultava; but it was after the Swedes had been the conquerors in a long series of battles—the Russians were civilised, at least in part; but revolution, proscription, and bloodshed, attended the change.

It was an era in the Czar's life, when, in 1717, he visited France, to be introduced to the little king Louis XV. Nearly twenty years before he had intended to call on Louis XIV.; but that politic monarch had declined the honour. Brandy and pepper was not exactly the beverage in which the "great monarch" took delight. Now the aspect of affairs had changed. The "great monarch" slept with his fathers, and a puny child held his sceptre in its baby hand; while the rude Czar had achieved the title of Great, and had founded a metropolis, organised an army, and created a navy.

On the 7th of May, 1717, the Czar arrived in Paris. They wanted him to lodge at the Tuileries, but he curtly refused. At the Hotel des Lesdiguières, Rue de la Cerisoie, near the Arsenal—there he received the regent, the duke of Orleans; astonishing the courtiers, who had fancied the "barbarian" would behave with becoming humility, by walking first into the reception-room, and treating his visitor with an air of undoubted patronage. Next Monday, the 10th of May, the little king came in person to pay the Czar a visit. Peter took the child in his arms, and kissed him repeatedly, with a look of paternal cordiality.

The little king opened his blue eyes with astonishment, and then smiled with pleasure. But etiquette, the ruling goddess of the French court, re-asserted her sway. The king lisped out a complimentary little speech, taught him by the Duke of Villeroy, his tutor, and the two monarchs separated on their different paths—Peter to fresh activity, new achievements, and glorious results; Louis to a life of artificial observance, but real neglect, decline, and ignominy; Russia to a grand career of development and progress—France to the terrible outbreak of popular vengeance, known as the first revolution of 1789.

The Matron.

NO. XLV.

NOTICE.—We find from the letters of one or two of our country correspondents, that exception has been taken to the scale of weekly expenditure given in a previous number of "The Matron." We are perfectly aware that the condition of the labouring population in most of our agricultural districts has been of late so much improved, that an adherence to a scale so limited and restrictive as that laid down in "The Matron" is no longer so requisite as in the time when a scheme for making bread from sawdust was seriously entertained. There are, however, exceptional cases which, deeply as we deplore them, it is impossible for us to ignore; and as our paper circulates amongst all classes of the community, including not only those more favoured by fortune, who can afford to wear the fancy articles of female attire of which we have given illustrations, with directions for making, but also those who cannot aspire to anything beyond the bare necessities of life, we have not restricted our suggestions to the wants and requirements of any particular class. The scale of weekly expenditure in "The Matron" is not intended for the generality of our readers, who are more or less protected from the privations which insufficient means or wages entail, but for those exceptional cases to which we have alluded.

My readers may have remarked that I have treated of dressmaking and millinery in the same chapter. The fact is, the "Matron" is a home companion rather than a regular manual of any particular art, although the hints given on all feminine occupations may prove excessively useful to any of my readers who may take up one particular art as a livelihood.

No. 1.

No. 2.

At home, how many things a wife and mother must know if she does all she finds to be done! At one time a shirt or a flannel waistcoat must be made for the husband; then "mother" must trim a best cap for herself. After this, "George's" worsted socks must be darned, toe and heel; and the darning-needle is hardly at rest before one of a different size must be taken up to manufacture a rosette for "baby's" hat. All these things, and the like of these, are best done by those who have had proper directions respecting them; but dressmaking, more than other needlework, wants previous teaching. Therefore, I hope my rules will be welcome.

No. 1.

I gave directions about the skirt of the dress in the last chapter, and I may revert to the trimmings that belong to it before I dismiss the subject; but I am particularly anxious to direct you how to make the body fit well. You must be very careful about the back in order to avoid a round-shouldered appearance. This fault may be ascribed to the practice of cutting the back too long. To remedy it, in fitting, pull the fore-body over the shoulder and proceed to shorten the back at the top, and do not leave off till it fits neatly.

A fault that unpractised dressmakers are very apt to fall into is that of making the armholes too small. This destroys the comfort of the fit, and gives an unbecoming stiffness to the body. Thirteen inches is about the sized armhole for a person whose waist is twenty-four inches round, and for a stout person you may make it fourteen inches and a half. But the armhole is a thing you will probably have to alter when you fit the body on the person for whom the dress is intended. Should you have to alter it, mind you do not do so under the arm, for this diminishes the freedom of the fit; but cut the armhole, or rather pare it, generally round, with the exception of the part immediately under the arm. In putting in your sleeves, recollect that they must be (by an inch and a half) larger than the armhole. You might suppose this would make them look puckered, but it is not the case. Another thing you must bear in mind is, that the seam of your sleeve, instead of being even with the seam of your body, must be half an inch in front of it. And now that I am on the subject of sleeves, I must let you into a secret of great importance in these days of fanciful sleeves. If you have only one good sleeve pattern, you may procure a good many different fashions by making your sleeve longer or shorter; leaving it open, or gathering it into a band at the wrist; or by varying the trimmings. Another plan for giving variety to the appearance of the sleeve is by tacking a pretty under sleeve inside the upper sleeve. In Plates 1 and 2 you will see patterns that may direct your taste in these articles.

Of No. 1, the material is book muslin, and the puffings (cut straight) are of the same material. They should, in width, be about half as wide again as the sleeve itself, and be cut about two inches and a half in depth. In No. 2, the sleeve is of mull muslin. The puffings are cut bias, and gathered on to a foundation of mull muslin (also on the bias), gradually widening towards the wrist. It is finished off with a pretty net edging. The satin ribbon with which this sleeve is trimmed should match the colour of the dress.

The "canezon," of which we give so pretty an illustration, is decidedly a revival. It was very fashionable many years ago. The ribbon trimming is, as you will allow, a very nice addition. The material of the canezone may be either black or white net, or white muslin; but the trimming must be lace, either black or white, to match the body, and only sufficient fulness should be allowed to give it ease.

The canezone is introduced in just the right place, while plain bodies are the subject of my directions; for the canezone is a great improvement to a plain body, whether made three-quarters or quite high. The canezone gives a finish and a fulness to a tight body when worn by a thin figure, and a tight body—though fashion now hardly allows of any other—is very trying to a thin figure.

Before I conclude this chapter I must revert to the subject of sleeves. In giving illustrations of muslin sleeves, and hanging sleeves, I do not mean that they should be worn for out-of-door costume in cold wintry weather. Nothing is more unbecoming than bare arms, blue with cold, in the month of November. The fashion of thus exposing the arms to the cold is not only unbecoming—it is very dangerous. The open or transparent sleeve is no protection from the weather, and the chilling gales entering at the sleeves penetrate to the vitals. I can assure you, on medical authority, that the open sleeve, worn on improper occasions, is a real source of danger. To avert this danger, tuck into the overhanging upper sleeve a puffed sleeve of merino, of any colour you like. Make it according to the directions given in the last chapter for the puffed muslin sleeve. Merino sleeves are quite in harmony with the fashion of the day, and, what is more important, they are in harmony with good common sense.

THE COMMON LOT.

Leaves have their time to fall,
And flowers to wither at the North wind's breath,
And stars to set—but all,
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, oh, Death!

Day is for mortal care,
Eye for glad meetings round the joyous hearth,
Night for the dreams of sleep, the voice of prayer,
But all for thee, thou Mightiest of the Earth!

The banquet hath its hour,
Its feverish hour of mirth, and song, and wine;
There comes a day for grief's overwhelming power,
A time for softer tears—but all are thine!

Youth and the opening rose
May look like things too glorious for decay,
And smile at thee! but thou art not of those
That wait the ripen'd bloom to seize their prey!

Leaves have their time to fall,
And flowers to wither at the North wind's breath,
And stars to set—but all,
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, oh, Death!

We know when moons shall wane,
When summer-birds from far shall cross the sea,
When autumn's hue shall tinge the golden grain—
But who shall teach us when to look for thee?

Is it when spring's first gale
Comes forth to whisper where the violets lie?
Is it when roses in our path grow pale?
They have one season—all are ours to die!

Thou art where billows foam,
Thou art where music melts upon the air;
Thou art around us in our peaceful home,
And the world calls us forth—and thou art there!

Thou art where friend meets friend,
Beneath the shadow of the elm to rest,
Thou art where foe meets foe, and trumpets rend
The skies, and swords beat down the princely crest.

Leaves have their time to fall,
And flowers to wither at the North wind's breath,
And stars to set—but all,
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, oh, Death!

Chemical Experiments.

We will amuse ourselves to-day by some cases of the operation of bleaching. The term is not a good one, inasmuch as the processes which correspond with it have little common alliance with each other. Certain colours are got rid of by actually destroying the colouring agent, when of course the original colour does not admit of being reproduced; other cases of bleaching there are in which the original colouring agent is not destroyed but changed to white for the time. Other cases there are in which the colouring agent is extracted bodily. We will now have a few examples.

Experiment 1.—Pour a little Saxon blue or indigo, dissolved in oil of vitriol, into water, so that the latter may be strongly coloured; add now to the coloured water a little chloride of lime, and the colour will most likely disappear; it will assuredly be caused to disappear if, when the chloride of lime has been added, a few drops of spirit of salt are also poured in.

We have already seen in the course of our previous experiments how chloride of lime is employed for discharging patterns on cotton fabrics; colours which have been discharged by the agency of chlorine may be regarded as destroyed absolutely.

Experiment 2.—Take a red rose, moisten it, and hold it over the fumes of burning brimstone, or chemically speaking, hold it over a source of sulphurous acid gas. The red colour will immediately disappear, but unlike the case just described, it will not be permanently destroyed.

Experiment 3.—Dip the whitened rose into water rendered acid with a few drops of oil of vitriol, and the original red colour will immediately reappear, demonstrating that the fumes of burning brimstone (sulphurous acid) are not a permanent and distinctive decolorising agent. Sulphurous acid is frequently employed as a bleaching agent in the arts. Thus, for example, straw bonnets are whitened by means of it; by sulphurous acid also, yellow sponges are whitened, and occasionally wool.

Experiment 4.—Take some porter, and throw into it goulard lotion (a subacetate of lead), as long as any precipitate falls. By this treatment the porter admits of being bleached almost white. Throw away the porter treated in the manner just described, inasmuch as goulard lotion is a poison.

Experiment 5.—Procure some animal charcoal or purified bone black, mix about a quarter of a pint of porter with three table-spoonfuls of it, place the whole in a warm Florence flask during a few hours, and finally throw the whole mixture on a filter. By this treatment as well as the last, the porter will be almost decolorised.

To get ironmould out of linen.—Wet the ironmould with pure water, then hold it over a burning brimstone match, or if that ancient thing be not procurable, over brimstone caused to burn in any other manner. After an ironmould has been treated in this way, it can be removed by contact with salts of sorrel. The chemical name for sorrel is binoculate of potash, taking heed of it because the substance is a poison.

To remove stains in general.—In certain books we find directions for the removal of stains by one particular process, as if all stains were removable by the same treatment. The reader will have studied the chemical experiments described in this journal to little advantage if he have not become aware by this time that, previous to the removal of a stain, it is necessary to ascertain the nature of the material by which the stain has been caused. If by an animal or vegetable substance, chlorine or chloride of lime will be most generally eligible, providing always that the tissue on which the stain exists be not itself dyed with a colour removable by chlorine. Here, in this circumstance, generally lurks the difficulty. It is not a stain from a colourless tissue that has commonly to be removed, but a stain from a tissue itself dyed and stained by colours, some of which are not dissimilar in nature to those which have to be removed. Grease stains may sometimes be most conveniently removed by turpentine; at other times by fullers' earth. Castor-oil stains may be removed by spirit of wine, in which liquid that very peculiar oil is soluble; a property by taking advantage of which castor oil may be separated from other fixed oils fraudulently or accidentally mixed with it. When paint stains occur upon woollen cloth, they can frequently be removed by no more difficult plan than rubbing it briskly with a piece of flannel. This process, however, is only successful whilst the paint is wet. If the paint have become somewhat dry, turpentine must be employed, which seldom fails to achieve the desired purpose. Most people who dabble much in chemical operations stain their apparel now and then by acid marks, which cause discoloration, more or less, according to the strength and character of the acid. Oil of vitriol and spirit of salt leave red marks upon black and many other tissues. If the redness be touched with hartshorn it disappears on the instant, and provided the hartshorn have been speedily applied after the accident, the tissue will not usually suffer any injury. If the accident have occurred from any nitric acid, the damage is greater. Neither hartshorn, nor anything else, will usually suffice to restore the original colour in this case.

Small Change.

SMALL sands make the mountain, moments make the year, and trifles life.

A GENTLEMAN had a bad memory; a friend, knowing this, lent him the same book three times over; and, being asked afterwards how he liked it, replied, "I think it an admirable production, but the author sometimes repeats the same things."

DISTRUST all who flatter you. Take counsel of your own heart, and be careful lest you find a flatterer even there.

CARDINAL DE RETZ desired Menage to give him a few lectures on poetry. "For," said he, "such quantities of verses are brought me every day that I ought to seem at least to be somewhat of a judge." "It would be hard," replied Menage, "to give your eminence many rudiments of criticism without spending too much of your time. But I advise you, in general, to look over the first page or two, and then exclaim, 'Sad stuff! wretched poetaster! miserable verses!' Ninety-nine times in a hundred you will surely be right."

WISDOM is better than physical power. Better have, like Argus, a hundred eyes to see with and only one pair of hands to work with, than, like Briareus, a hundred hands to work with and only two eyes to see with.

"SIR," said a little blustering man to a religious opponent, "to what sect do you suppose I belong?" "Well, I don't exactly know," replied the other; "but to judge from your size and appearance, I should think you belonged to the class generally called insects."

A LADY declared that she never could see How the men could all smoke—"Why, it kills 'em," said she—

"I don't know," said Sam—"there's my father—ain't slow—

Who smokes every day, and he's eighty, you know."

"But, sir, if he never had used the vile weed, He might have been ninety, he might, sir, indeed."

"MY native country has treated me badly," said a drunken vagabond, "but I love her still." "Probably," replied a gentleman, "her still is all that you do love."

"REMEMBER the poor!" Oh, yes, we all remember them, and—"don't do anything else."

THE following notice from a young man was lately addressed to a Judge of Probate:—"Sir,—My father departed this life not long hence, leaving a wife and five scorpions. He died detested, and his estate is likely to prove insolent. I was left executioner, and being told that you were Judge of Reprobates, apply to you for letters of condemnation."

BLISS has no programme; happiness is not bottled like wine, for future use; it is like dew—remove it from the flower and take it out of the morning, and, though you put it in a cup of pearls, it is only a drop of water.

A YANKEE, describing an opponent, says, "I tell you what, sir; that man don't amount to a sum in arithmetic; add him up, and there's nothing to carry."

No swindler has assumed so many names as self-love, or is so much ashamed of his own.

WITH ladies of taste you cannot hope to accomplish much unless you are yourself accomplished.

WE are not more ingenious in searching out bad motives for good actions when performed by others than good motives for bad actions when performed by ourselves.

A MAN was recently convicted in Kentucky of stealing his neighbour's cows and hiding them in his cellar. It was thought a cowardly mode of cow-hiding.

A CARPENTER'S BILL.—The following bill was lately presented to a farmer in Sussex:—"To hanging two barn-doors and myself seven hours, four shillings and sixpence."

If you adopt another's lie, you show that you would willingly have been its proper father.

BEWARE of self-praise. The breath of others raises our fame, but our own as surely prostrates it.

NOW READY, PRICE SIXPENCE,
CASSELL'S
ILLUSTRATED ALMANACK
For 1859.

This Beautifully Illustrated and Instructive Almanack, which has now obtained celebrity wherever the English language is spoken, will this year be found to surpass, if possible, its previous attractiveness. It will contain upwards of Thirty Engravings, the subjects as follow:—Twelve engravings representing the modes of Repast in various Nations and Periods;—Twelve engravings representing important events of the year 1858, including the Capture of Delhi—Storming of Lucknow—Bombardment of Canton—Earthquake in Naples—Burial of the Queen of Oude—the Leviathan off Deptford—Inauguration of the Boulevard de Sebastopol—Arrival of the Queen at Cherbourg—Launch of the Ville de Nantes—Fort Napoleon in Kabylia—Her Majesty's arrival at the Town Hall, Leeds—Removal of the decorations, fountain, &c., in the Place du Châtelet. Four emblematical designs of the Seasons;—Astronomical Illustrations, &c., &c. The Literary matter, in addition to explanations of the above Engravings, consists of the Calendar, richly stored with historical remembrances; Chronology; Obituary; Abstracts of Acts of Parliament; Important Statistics; Postal Regulations; Stamps and Taxes; Gardening Calendar; the Government; Royal Family; Houses of Lords and Commons, and other matters, interesting to all branches of the community.

N. B. Orders should be given at once to the nearest Bookseller, as delays, consequent upon the large circulation, have unavoidably occurred in the delivery of the two last years' issues.

FLAVIA.—You wish to know what became of the graceful "souvenir" entrusted to the Queen, for the Princess Royal, by the young ladies of Gravesend. It has been accepted, and the mayor of Gravesend has received a graceful acknowledgment of the same from the Princess, through the medium of her royal highness's secretary. The Princess—now Princess Frederick William of Prussia—says that she has had the great pleasure of receiving from the hands of the Queen the tasteful souvenir, commemorating one of the most gratifying, among the many, demonstrations of sympathy, which it was the happiness of her royal highness to receive on the occasion of her departure from England. The charming sight witnessed at Gravesend will, from its own merits, ever live in her royal highness's most grateful recollection. But the Princess derives particular satisfaction from the possession of so elegant a record of the names of the young ladies who took an active part in a scene, the beauty of which her royal highness regrets that she was not able, at the moment of parting from her native country, to enjoy as fully as she felt it, and as she would have enjoyed it under other circumstances. "Flavia" will readily understand how much the young ladies of Gravesend must have been charmed by this gracious, kind, and touching communication.

A WIDOW.—We agree with you that the dahlia and the chrysanthemum are the great ornaments of the latter half of autumn. We are glad to hear you have proved so successful in the cultivation of these flowers. You say you think you deserved the first prize for dahlias at the recent flower-show held in your county town. We must own we think these prizes are generally fairly awarded. Perhaps you do not exactly know what constitutes the beauty of the dahlia in the eyes of a connoisseur. It should be a perfect circle when viewed in front, the petals should be broad at the ends, smooth at the edges, thick in substance, and stiff to hold their form. They should be in regular rows, forming an outline of a perfect circle without any vacancy between them, and all in the circle should be the same size, uniformly opened to the same shape, and not crumpled. The colour should be dense, whatever it be, not as if it were a white dipped in colour, but as if the whole flower was coloured throughout. Perhaps your flowers exhibited their disc or green scale, or they might have been damaged by carriage. If so, their rejection can easily be accounted for.

A. B. B.—As Richard, Oliver Cromwell's son and successor, soon ceased to play any part in our history, you could not well expect much to be said of him in an epitome. As you are interested in him, the following details may be welcome. There was an element of dissension at work from the very beginning of poor Richard's rule, which led finally to the downfall of the protectorate. The army and the parliament, whose animosity had been smothered during the powerful sway of Oliver, now resumed their differences with a vigour which it far surpassed either the might or the skill of Richard to reconcile. Fleetwood (who was very powerful with the army, and who was also the brother-in-law of the Protector), in conjunction with Desborough, prevailed on Richard, partly by prayers, and partly by threats, to summon a general council of officers to take into consideration the state of the army. This was a most dangerous concession. Henceforth he became more and more a mere puppet. At the instigation of Howard, Broghill, and Faulconberg, he dissolved the council, and, at the instigation of the leaders of the council, he dissolved the parliament, and then what was to become of his bewildered self? On this point the generals were divided, but it ended in the recall of the long parliament; and a message to Richard, of which Sir Arthur Haselrigge was the bearer, to quit Whitehall, and consider himself Protector no longer. Poor Richard clung to the palace as long as he could, chiefly from the fear of his creditors, but they became noisy and importunate, and he retired to an estate which his wife had brought him by marriage, the splendid domain at Hursley, near Winchester. This property is now in the possession of the Heathcote family. Even here the ex-protector could not escape the persecutions of his creditors, and he left England in company with Ludlow. He remained in exile twenty years. During this time he resided partly in Geneva, partly in Paris, where his abode was a mean garret in an obscure part of the city. What a residence for a man who had once ruled the destinies of Great Britain! In 1680 Richard ventured to return to England. He took up his abode at Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire, in a house near the church, where he lived, under the assumed name of Clark, in happy obscurity for upwards of thirty years.

ISABELL CHAMBERLIN.—It is evident from your writing and spelling, that your rank in life is inferior to that of the shopkeeper for whom you have formed an attachment. We do not blame you on this account. We all wish to rise in the world; and provided we do so by honourable means, we rather deserve praise than blame. But you will be quite unfit for the rank to which you aspire, unless you employ yourself in cultivating your mind. Give all your spare time to study, and read attentively—not only "The Editorial Table," but every part of our paper, especially those chapters containing "Hopes and Helps for the Young," which will guide you in the prosecution of the necessary studies, and "The Matron," which will assist you in qualifying yourself in the necessary domestic requirements. If your love is returned, you may be sure that your improvement will be appreciated by the object of your affection. Should he be indifferent to you, you will have gained information that will make you a better wife for some other suitor.

JULIE.—"Julie" may walk on the right or left side of her lover, just as she finds it convenient; and there is no impropriety in her taking his arm.

CHURCHMAN.—We believe that the Sunday evening services at Exeter Hall have been well attended, and have proved effective; but for the names of the preachers, and the other particulars about which you inquire, we refer you to the daily or weekly papers, which report such matters.

W. A.—The directions given in No. 39 were as plain and explicit as possible. Use the lotion till the effect is produced. Remember, however, that no remedy of this kind can be infallible, as baldness and gray hairs proceed from such various causes.

MARIE L.—Before we can tell you which of your two lovers to accept, you must let us know if both have proposed. You leave us in the dark on this important point.

A YOUNG DRAPER.—If your intentions are honourable, we see no objection to the course you are pursuing.

A BLIGHTED ROSE.—You have been forsaken by your lover, and you ask us what you must do. It seems clear you must do without him; and as it seems you have only "kept company" with him for six months, we trust you will banish him from your heart without any great effort. If you are, as we suppose, amiable and attractive, you will, in all probability, soon find another admirer.

SKELETON LEAVES.—Several correspondents are anxious to obtain plain and simple directions for carrying out this process. Can any of our readers furnish them?

BUTTONS.—An excellent receipt for making ink suitable for ticket-writing was given in No. 17, page 272.

G. R.—The indentures drawn out and signed by your father and your proposed master have no legal force without your own signature.

Z. A.—State your case to the person in question, candidly and honestly, and abide the result.

DOLLY.—You may make a tolerably good "imitation of cream" by mixing two tea-spoonfuls of fine flour with the well-beaten yolks of two eggs and a tea-spoonful of finely powdered white sugar; turn on this gradually a pint of boiling milk, stirring constantly to prevent lumps. A very small bit of sweet butter may be added.

A BEADLE.—The emphasis is laid on the first syllable; thus, si-ne-cure. In church affairs this means a benefice without a cure, or care, of souls. The strictest sinecure is where the benefice is a gift, and is committed to the incumbent by the patron, expressly without cure of souls, the cure either not existing, or being intrusted to a vicar. In secular or civil appointments, a sinecure is an office which has revenue without any employment.

ANXIOUS G. W.—The 11th of December, 1841, fell on a Saturday. For an answer to your second question apply to a medical practitioner.

A CONSTANT READER.—The stimulants you name are neither "wholesome nor nourishing," and are not needed to "improve any constitution."

IGNOTUS.—Dr. Isaac Barrow, the eminent mathematician, was the son of Mr. Thomas Barrow, a respectable citizen and linen-draper of London, in which city he was born in 1630. Bishop Butler, the author of the "Analogy of Religion," was born 1692, at Wantage, in Berkshire, where his father was a shopkeeper and a Presbyterian Dissenter. After studying the controversy between the members of the Established Church and the Dissenters, he determined on leaving the ranks of the Nonconformists.

JACK MANDERS.—You can obtain the third and fourth volumes of "Cassell's Illustrated Family Paper" of Messrs. Petter and Galpin, La Belle Sauvage Yard. Price, neatly bound in cloth, 7s. 6d. each, or 5s. 6d. in paper binding.

E. J. MC.—For information as to a free passage to Australia or New Zealand, apply to the Emigration Office.

GUILLAUME.—A receipt for preparing quills for use will be found in No. 40, page 224. Receipts for pomades, &c., will be found in several previous numbers.

D. DONOVAN.—Your little French poem does you credit, but it is more suitable for some religious publication.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Nos. 72, 73, and 74, will complete Part 17 of the "History of England;" you had better get these, and then take the monthly parts, thirty-three of which are published.

WRITING MASTER.—The addition of a few bruised cloves, or a few drops of creosote, will prevent any tendency to mouldiness in ink.

SPORTSMAN.—A receipt for staining gun-barrels will be found in No. 47. The receipt for waterproofing boots was intended for another "Sportsman."

LA FIANCEE.—We see no reason whatever why you should not at once fulfil your engagement.

M. E. M. A.—It is impossible for us to say what engagements the projectors of Australian railroads have made, or are likely to make, in reference to officers or salaries.

SUFFOLK.—You have evidently made a mistake. If you refer again to the notice in which 15s. 6d. is stated as the price, you will find that it refers, not to the work you have purchased, but to "John Cassell's Educational Course," which includes "Science Popularly Explained"—"The English Language, its History and Forms"—"Astronomy"—"The Outlines of Botany"—"The Logic of Mathematics"—"Political Economy." If you did not ask the bookseller for "John Cassell's Educational Course," you have no just cause of complaint.

FLORA M.—Rice-paper is not, as you seem to suppose, made from rice pulp. It is the pith of a plant of the bread-fruit genus, brought from the western parts of China, chiefly to Canton, where the manufacture of the paper, and the painting upon it, gives employment to several thousand hands. The outline is made by pressure with a smooth ivory point, and is filled up with all the varieties of colouring matter suited to the subject.

S. J. T.—The pronunciation of the French word Charivari offers no difficulty. You need only refer to the alphabet published in this Paper, No. 23, in the first chapter of the French Lessons, and you will easily make out the pronunciation for yourself.

ROSA BONHEUR.—Avoid the cosmetic of which you speak. It is more likely to injure than to improve the skin.

QUESTIONER.—The Cinque Ports are five in number. The word cinque (five) has kept its place among us long after the English language was substituted for the French in legislative proceedings. These ports were originally five havens on the eastern shore of England, towards France, namely, Dover, Hastings, Hythe, Romney, and Sandwich. Rye and Winchelsea have been subsequently added.

CHARLEY.—In our opinion, conduct is fate. A CORK LASSIE will find that tortoise-shell is improved by having sweet oil constantly rubbed into it. M. L. G.—It is for the gentleman to take the initiative. You should not reveal your own affection until he has confessed a love for you.

THOMAS JONES, J. MURPHY, R. COMPTON, MARY L.—We fear you are not likely to improve your health or your circumstances by resorting to adventurers such as you name; consult medical men of established reputation. LARRY GARG.—Do not tamper with your eyes; wash them night and morning with a soft linen rag, dipped in the following solution:—sulphate of zinc, 16 grains; tincture of opium, two drachms; distilled water, one pint. A.—It is impossible for us to say "how tall" you will grow; but the practice to which you refer is not likely to increase either health, strength, or stature.

AN AFFLICTED SUBSCRIBER, J. D. PERTH.—Read aloud, and read and speak slowly and distinctly. FLIP FLAP, J. THOMSON, PETITE CLEANLINESS, SUFFERING HUMANITY, MINNIE, AN ANXIOUS INQUIRER, A GRAMMAR SCHOOL BOY, PRINCE CHARLIE, R. F. L., and others.—You should not too hastily check these cutaneous eruptions; in many cases they are efforts of nature to throw off humours caused by an impure state of the blood. Unless you first ascertain the cause, the remedy may prove worse than the disease. CROICK.—We fear you must submit to the attacks of midges, or gnats, till cold weather induces them to leave us. A. B. Y. Z., FLORENCE, SIR WALTER SCOTT, ERAU, JACK MANDERS, CONSTANTINE, SOPHIA DE MONTMORENCY, R. TIERRELL.—We have already given numerous receipts for thinning or thickening the hair, softening and whitening the hands, &c.

HOPE EVERMORE.—The two Foscaris (father and son) were Venetians, living about the middle of the 16th century. The father was doge, or duke, of Venice, but he had little power to save his son from severe punishments, decreed by the council, for receiving presents from foreign princes. The younger Foscaris was exiled, and during his absence the chief of the council was assassinated. Young Foscaris was suspected as the instigator; he was taken from prison, put to the torture, and was then once more consigned to captivity. At length the real murderer was discovered; but it was too late, the unhappy Foscaris had perished in prison. Marino Fallero was elected as doge of Venice in the year 1554. An affront (offered to his wife), which he considered the council visited with too lenient a punishment, excited his indignation. He determined to overthrow the Commonwealth, and become Prince of the State. His plot was discovered and circumvented, and the doge was executed.

THE MODEL COPY BOOKS.—In consequence of the numerous inquiries which we are daily receiving as to the Model Copy Books, and the difficulties which appear to exist in some cases in procuring them, Messrs. Petter and Galpin will in future send a set free by post, upon receiving a remittance of 2s. 4d. or, including three pence, 2s. 10d.

R. SMITH.—You will not be able to depend upon any yeast or barm which you can make at sea; but you will find an admirable and very portable substitute in the baking powders, which are in common use; or, you may make light and nutritious bread, cake, or pastry, as follows:—Take two ounces of carbonate of soda, one ounce of tartaric acid, and a small tea-spoonful of sal ammoniac powdered; mix them well in a perfectly dry state, and keep them in a wide-mouthed bottle, closely corked. When you mean to make your bread, mix the above very intimately into half a peck of dry flour; add as much cold water as will make dough rather stiffer than it is usually made for bread. Mix it briskly and well. Make this into three loaves; put them immediately into a quick oven, and bake for about an hour and ten minutes.

INQUIRIES AS TO BOOKS.—Every post brings us inquiries as to which are the best books on this, that, and the other subject. We find it somewhat difficult to answer these questions, in consequence of the rival claims of authors and publishers, and other circumstances which we need not now state. But if our correspondents on these matters will send us their names and addresses, and a postage stamp for reply, we will furnish them with the best information we can obtain.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER CVII.

Can storied urn, or animated bust,
Back to its mansion call the fleeting breath
Can honour's voice provoke the silent dust,
Or flattery soothe the dull, cold ear of death?

GRAY.

It is not to be supposed that the Markhams showed so little gratitude in their prosperity as to forget the warm-hearted, excellent Mrs. Tuttle, the tobacconist's wife, who had so generously relieved the distracted mother and her suffering child on the night which separated them from the hero of our tale. On the contrary, Rachel and her daughter frequently visited her—the only mark of attention they could venture to offer without risking offence; for the worthy little woman was even more independent in mind than in her worldly circumstances, although the latter, thanks to her own energy and economy, had long since placed her far beyond the reach of want.

The events recorded in the preceding chapter took place on the morning of the day generally set apart for these visits, and, on the present occasion, Richard and Jack Manders were invited by the ladies to accompany them.

It was one of the happiest moments of Jack's life when, with Mary on his arm—by-the-bye, she had to ask him for it twice before the poor fellow found courage to offer it—he followed Mrs. Markham and her son into the well-known Belvidere-road, the scene of so much misery to all of them. Perhaps he felt no slight feeling of pride as well, but it was the pride of honesty. He had no cause now to fear the glance of the policemen; he could meet the gaze of his fellow-men without the self-accusing blush rising to his cheek.

The errors of the boy had long since been redeemed by the integrity of the man.

Prosperity, we are told, hardens the heart, and we fear such is its natural tendency. For this reason it is good, therefore, that those on whom fortune at last has poured her gifts should, from time to time, visit the scenes of former poverty and trial; the happy spot where sorrow chastened them. The lesson is, at least, an ancient one, for we find that the Israelites, on their return to Jerusalem, after the first captivity, left in their most splendid structures a portion of the wall unpainted and unadorned.

It is to this custom that Moore so beautifully alludes—

"And like the spot left bare
In Israel's halls, to tell the proud and fair,
Amid their mirth, that slavery had been there."

THE APPALLING FATE OF ILLSTON.

A sentiment equally profound induced Rachel, before proceeding to Mrs. Tuttle's, to visit the old cottage, accompanied by her children. In the excess of happiness she felt that it would be a relief to her to pour forth in prayer the fulness of her gratitude to Him who had watched over her boy, to thank Him for present abundance on the spot where they had known hunger, misery, and want, and bless for His mercy Him from whom all blessings flow.

The cottage remained uninhabited. It was not the first time Mrs. Markham and her daughter had visited it since their prosperity; and the neighbour who kept the key of it no sooner recognised them than she hastened to open the worm-eaten door and shutters.

With instinctive delicacy, Jack Manders drew back, feeling that for some moments, at least, the mother and her children would prefer being alone. He could not repress a smile when the old woman curtsied respectfully as she passed him, evidently without recognising him; she had been one of the foremost to prophecy that he would never come to good. Fortunately, the good had come to him.

It would be difficult to describe the emotions of Richard, as he gazed around the cheerless room, the walls reeking with unwholesome damp, the yawning grate corroding in its rust, the cracked ceiling, and time-stained floor; too many recollections crowded on his brain for words, and he silently pointed to the spot near the window where Rachel used to sit and work, whilst he sat upon the stool beside her to repeat the lessons she taught him.

It was on that spot they knelt, the mother and her children, to pour forth the eloquence of voiceless prayer, to offer a homage more acceptable than the golden censers' perfume, each breast a temple, and each heart an altar.

The act of silent gratitude and thanksgiving ended, not a nook or corner of their former humble abode was left unexplored; numberless incidents in their past lives, privations, and contrivances, moments of joy as well as sorrow—for even in poverty they had known such—were recalled to their remembrance by a look of mutual intelligence, a glance, a smile. The cottage no longer appeared desolate, for it was peopled by memories; the straggling sunbeams peering in upon them through the broken panes, seemed to welcome them back, and our hero felt glad, very glad, that he had visited the old spot once more.

On leaving the place, they found their companion seated on a pile of timber, piled in the open space fronting the house, contemplating a group of children, all more or less marked with the brand of poverty, at play; the youngest, little toddling urchins, scarcely able to walk, deep in the mysteries of dirt pies: the older ones engaged in more active sports.

"Philosophising!" exclaimed his friend, tapping him on the shoulder.

"Philosophising," repeated Jack; "no, sir. I know nothing about philosophy, scarcely the meaning of the word. I was only wondering how it was those rich men who drive down here to business every day, the owners of the great brewery, wood-yards, saw-mills, soap manufactory, and wharfs, have never thought of building a school for these poor little things, growing up under their eyes in ignorance. Are they philosophers?" he added.

"In their own sense, I fear they are," replied Richard Markham.

"Then I am glad that I am not one," observed his friend, emphatically.

"Of what sort?" demanded Mary.

"Gymnosophists," answered her brother, with a smile. "Close-fisted ones," he added, seeing that she did not understand the allusion.

Mrs. Tuttle manifested a slight feeling of surprise at seeing Mrs. Markham and her daughter accompanied by two gentlemen. Such a circumstance had never occurred before, and she did not quite understand it. The first welcome over, and her visitors seated in the snug little parlour at the back of the shop, she began to cast inquiring glances first at her young favourite, Mary, then at our hero.

"No; nothing of the kind," exclaimed the fair girl—for she read her thoughts: "they are neither of them in love with me. Which is very ungrateful," she added, "considering that I love one of the two very dearly, and take great interest in his friend."

Our hero drew the laughing girl towards him, and kissed her tenderly.

Had it been possible for Mrs. Tuttle to suspect the speaker of anything like levity, she would have looked exceedingly shocked, entertaining, as she did, very rigid notions of female propriety.

"Well, it certainly does look a little singular," said the kind-hearted soul; "but, as your mother does not appear surprised, I presume I have no right to be."

"Certainly not," said Richard, kissing his mother.

Mrs. Tuttle thought that she should like to catch any young fellow taking such a liberty with her; which, literally interpreted, meant that she would feel exceedingly indignant at such a freedom. Little did she imagine how soon it would be her turn to undergo a similar salute; and that, too, without a word of anger or remonstrance.

"Can't you guess?" exclaimed Mary, taking both her hands in hers, and looking her full in the face.

Her old friend felt perfectly bewildered, and turned her bright, dark, gipsy-looking eyes first on our hero, next upon his sister. Suddenly the truth flashed upon her mind, and she pronounced the name of Richard.

"My own dear brother," added the happy girl.

"Who claims the right of thanking you for your kindness to those who are so dear to him," observed the youth.

His sister placed the hands she held in his, and the grateful son pressed his lips to the still blooming cheek of the tobaccoist's wife, whose niece, an exceedingly staid young person, on witnessing what was going on through the glass doors dividing the little parlour from the shop, let fall the scales in astonishment.

"God bless you, my dear boy," faltered Mrs. Tuttle; "your return has caused more than one heart to cease from aching. Didn't I always tell you, Mrs. Markham, that I felt certain he would return, worthy of your love and the tears that have been shed for him—and I was right. Am right," she added, "or you would not look so happy."

"He is indeed all that a mother's heart could wish him," answered Rachel.

Questions, answers, mingled with congratulations and expressions of astonishment as the adventures of the lost one were narrated, followed, till their true-hearted friend was in possession of all the facts. But the fact that impressed her the most, as she candidly acknowledged, was Jack Manders turning out so well.

"I never could have foreseen that," she observed; "out of all human calculation, considering the way in which he had been brought up by his wicked uncle. Of course," she added, "you saw in the papers an account of his death."

"This gentleman was present," replied our hero.

"What! he then is—?"

"My friend, Jack Manders," said Richard Markham; "you have guessed rightly."

Mrs. Tuttle shook hands with him, and generously forbore to smile as she recollected having caught him, on one particular occasion, behind her counter with a bundle of the very best cigars in his hand, and having dismissed him with a box on the ears.

The conversation was interrupted by a pale, delicate-looking girl, dressed in deep mourning, passing through the parlour into the shop.

"One of my first-floor lodgers," observed Mrs. Tuttle; "she was not aware that I had visitors or she would have gone the other way; there are three of them, mother, daughter, and step-father. The females have a sad time of it, I fear, for the man is a bad man, a brute in manners as well as in mind. Would you believe it, he beat them both the very first night they came to lodge here; but I soon put a stop to that by telling him I could allow no such conduct in my house. They are up in town to administer to the property left by a poor lad who died at sea; as he was under age, the husband gets it all. I pity the woman and her child," she added, "poor things! they looked forward to the young man's return as their last hope."

"Do you know the name of the young sailor?" demanded Jack Manders, who suddenly felt greatly interested.

"Caleb Costar," replied the mistress of the house; "but the father-in-law's is Gunton. They are all going to-morrow with the lawyer, at twelve o'clock, to Doctors' Commons to take out a probate."

Jack mentally made a note both of the time and place.

As the Markhams were engaged to dine with Mr. Bently, they now took their leave, but not till Rachel had obtained a promise that her benevolent friend would soon pass a day with them.

On reaching home our hero found William Thornton waiting for him.

"I have never been engaged in a duel," observed Richard, as soon as the cause of the visit had been explained to him; "in fact, my principles and reason are both opposed to the practice. Yours, however, appears an exceptional case; at all events, the son of my father's partner and friend shall not ask my assistance in vain. But are there no means of arranging the affair?"

The lover of Alice Boothroyd repeated all that had passed in the interview with her noble cousin.

"The cur, the cowardly cur!" exclaimed his hearer, indignantly. "I am not vindictive in my nature," he added; "but I trust you will give the captain reason to regret the disgraceful part he has undertaken. I will leave word, should the viscount call, that I am to be found at my grandfather's."

The young men shook hands cordially, and agreed that nothing further should be said upon the subject which, as a matter of course, was to be kept a profound secret from the ladies.

As they were to meet at Mr. Bently's, all further arrangements were postponed till after the interview with Captain Chester's second.

Lady Bell had not forgotten the hint so incautiously given in Kensington Gardens, as to what her course of action would have been had she been in William Thornton's place; and, to do her justice, regretted its possible consequences—a feeling that made her not suspicious, but watchful. During the dinner, and afterwards in the drawing-room, she and Lillian both noticed the abstracted air of our hero; but her ladyship alone could understand it; and when the butler brought the viscount's card to his young master, who instantly quitted the room, her fears became confirmed.

"Charley!" she whispered to her husband, who never could resist any request when prefaced by that word, "I fear Richard and young Thornton are engaged in a foolish affair; and something that I very nearly said has set them on a duel with Illston."

"Pah!" replied the baronet, good-humouredly; "the fellow has not the courage to fight. Lumley, of the Guards, assured me he was a most notorious coward. But I will speak to our young friend," he added, "and interfere if necessary."

"It is necessary," said the lady, emphatically. "I feel assured it is."

Although the gallant soldier treated the affair lightly in order to quiet the apprehensions of his wife, he resolved not to quit the house without an explanation with our hero.

It required a great effort on the part of Richard—a strict lover of truth and manliness of character—to receive his visitor without expressing the loathing and contempt his despicable conduct had inspired him with. He did, however, control his feelings within the limits of cold politeness.

"You are already aware, I presume," observed his lordship, "of the motive of my intrusion?"

"Mr. Thornton has informed me of your motives—thoroughly."

Illston bit his lips. He felt the irony of the reply.

"All that remains, then," he continued, "is to arrange the time and place of meeting; in which I shall be most happy to consult the convenience as well as the opinion of Mr. Markham."

"Look you, my lord," exclaimed the latter, "there is something so un-English throughout the entire proceedings in this affair that I scarcely dare trust myself to characterise them. Think not that if your rival falls by the hand of Captain Chester, that you will escape. William Thornton has friends who will most assuredly hold you responsible for his death."

"Instead of appearing as second in this duel," added our hero, "why not assume your true place—that of principal? In which case, I shall be most happy to proceed at once to make the necessary arrangements."

"I have no quarrel with your friend—no motive," he said. "Did he not afford you sufficient ground for one this morning," demanded Richard, "when he threw your card into your face? Most men would have considered it ample. Perhaps your lordship will inform me," he added, in a sarcastic tone, "of the exact amount of provocation necessary to constitute such an insult as you may find courage to resent?"

"Mr. Markham forgets the occasion of my visit," observed Illston, pale with rage. "I am here as the representative of Captain Chester, and most certainly shall not permit myself to gratify either his caprice or that of his friend, by being driven to act as his substitute. My name is not so undistinguished but I may be found—the present affair once terminated."

"Tis well. I shall hold you to your promise. For the rest, name your own time and place: to Thornton and myself, they are alike indifferent."

"To-morrow morning, then, at eight," said his visitor.

"Good."

"And the place, by the wall which separates Hyde Park from Kensington Gardens."

"Perfectly understood."

With this brief acceptance of the arrangements, our hero quitted the room, fearing longer to trust his temper with the cold-blooded, cowardly assassin; for whom, as he passed through the hall, he directed the porter to open the door.

Ilston quitted the house in high spirits. Chester, he felt assured, would rid him of his rival; and it would be quite time enough to guard against danger to himself from the indignation of his victim's friends when that victim was no more.

"Threatened men live long," he muttered, as he descended the steps of Mr. Bently's house into the square. "My life is—"

The report of a pistol rang sharply on the ear, and a bullet scattered the brains of the heartless monster. As not a being was in sight, it must have been fired from the window of one of the neighbouring houses, or the garden in the centre of the square.

It is extraordinary how rapidly a crowd collects in London, even in the most retired spots, the instant an accident occurs, or a crime has been committed. On hearing the discharge of firearms, servants rushed from the areas, and the cry of "Murder!" was raised. The bar of the nearest tavern was speedily deserted by the tribe of cabmen, stable-boys, and loungers; bundles came rushing from the neighbouring streets, all attracted by the magnetic influence of terror; with pale faces they gazed inquiringly upon each other, and asked who had committed the deed.

A policeman being for once where he was wanted, rushed forward: even he was startled, murder being an unusual crime on so respectable a beat.

The party assembled in the drawing-room had been startled by the report of the weapon, and just as Mr. Bently was about to ring the bell to ascertain the cause, the butler made his appearance.

"What is the matter, Barnes?" demanded his master.

"The gentleman who just quitted the house, sir, has been shot," answered the servant, nervously.

Sir Charles Fourreau, our hero, William Thornton, and Harry Morton, instantly quitted the room; fortunately—we say fortunately, for suspicion has as many tongues as eyes—Richard Markham had rejoined the party before the shot was heard, and the lover of Alice had not quitted it even for an instant.

In the presence of the dead all resentment vanished, and the body was at once removed to the house. Some suggested sending for a surgeon—an idea so evidently useless, that it was at once abandoned. A hundred questions were asked, to which no one could reply, for none had seen the murderer. The curiosity of the crowd became doubly intense, when informed that the murdered man was a lord, and it was not till the arrival of a strong body of police, that the hall and library could be cleared of them; even then they remained gathered in groups in front of the house, discussing the probabilities and possibilities of the affair.

"Terrible! inexplicable!" were the only words Richard Markham and his friend could utter.

Sir Charles had gazed on death too frequently to lose his self-possession, but seemed calm and collected as if nothing unusual had occurred. His first act was to telegraph the melancholy intelligence to the Earl of Carlington; his next to request a few minutes private conversation with our hero and William Thornton.

"My dear boy," he said, addressing the former with soldier-like honesty, "where reputation is concerned, there must be no concealment. What was the motive of Ilston's visit to you?"

"To arrange a hostile meeting between Captain Chester and my friend."

"I guessed as much," observed the baronet. "Had you any quarrel with him?"

"Not exactly a quarrel," answered Richard, "for his lordship appeared determined not to take offence. But I certainly expressed my opinion of his conduct."

Here the two friends narrated every circumstance that had led to the intended duel.

"You must permit me to replace Richard as second in this affair," resumed the veteran, after a pause; "that is, if Mr. Thornton will place his honour in my hands."

"Willingly!" exclaimed the lover of Alice Boothroyd.

"And unreservedly?"

"And unreservedly," repeated the young man, deeply gratified at the interest the request displayed.

"I need scarcely remind you then," observed Sir Charles, with a smile, "that from this moment you are a mere automaton in my hands, to act, move, apologise, or fight, as I may direct. Write as I shall dictate."

Without an instant's hesitation William seated himself at the table, and took up the pen.

"Mr. Thornton informs Captain Chester that he cannot, under any circumstances, degrade himself by accepting the hostile meeting proposed. For his reasons in declining it, he must refer him to General Sir Charles Fourreau, K.C.B."

"Mr. Thornton gives Captain Chester twelve hours for writing an apology for his ruffian-like conduct; should he decline doing so, a statement will be published, on the authority of Sir Charles Fourreau, of the circumstances which render it impossible for any man of honour to accord Captain Chester the satisfaction he has had the imprudence to demand."

The letter was sealed and at once dispatched to the chambers of the duellist; and so powerful was its effect, that in less than two hours, an apology, couched in the most ample form, was returned.

Three days afterwards the captain started for Paris.

The baronet never thought fit to explain the means by which he had brought the duellist to accept the humiliating alternative. Doubtless he was one of the few men acquainted with the real cause of his quitting the army. If so, his silence may be accounted for by the respect which, in common with all who had known him, he entertained for General Chester, the worthy father of a worthless son.

The person most to be pitied in the terrible event which had so unexpectedly released Alice Boothroyd from her fatal promise, was the Earl of Carlington, on whom the death of his only son inflicted a double blow—wounding him in his affections and ambition. At first, the family solicitor, who attended the inquest, felt disposed to cast a suspicion upon our hero and his friend; but a hint from his noble patron checked him. His lordship had held a long and private conversation with Sir Charles, in which the conduct of Ilston had been explained, and Captain Chester's letter of apology shown to him.

The attempt of the lawyer, the unhappy father well knew, could only bring dishonour on the memory of the dead.

The verdict of the jury, as might be expected under such circumstances, was "Willful Murder, against some person or persons, unknown." Three hours after it was given, handbills were placarded over London offering a reward of five hundred pounds for the detection of the murderer; and promising her Majesty's free pardon to any accomplice not actually concerned in the deed, who might give evidence against him.

For weeks and months, despite the active researches of the police, not the slightest clue could be obtained, and men began to predict that it was one of those mysteries that never would be solved.

Nous verrons, as our Gallic neighbours say.

Jack Manders had not forgotten the hour appointed for the father-in-law of Caleb and his lawyer to meet at Doctors' Commons, but was waiting for them in the immediate neighbourhood, accompanied by his friend, who, believing himself not yet of age, had carefully disguised himself by wearing the collar of his coat up to his ears, and his hat pulled over his brow.

The poor fellow trembled with rage when he recognised the anxious, grief-worn features of his mother and sister as they were hurried along by the tyrant, impatient to grasp the little inheritance for which he had plotted and sinned. To his astonishment, in addition to the lawyer, Captain Gall accompanied him.

At the sight of their old persecutor the blood of the young men tingled with indignation. They repressed it, however, till prudence permitted them to give free vent to it, and quietly followed them at a distance till they saw them enter the office, where the necessary forms were to be gone through.

The senior clerk was in the act of reading the affidavit of the commander of the Caradoc, in which he swore that his apprentice, Caleb Costar, had fallen overboard, whilst his vessel was lying at anchor in the Hooghly, and been drowned.

"What are you snivelling for?" demanded Gunton, shaking his wife rudely by the arm; "the young rascal would never have come to good."

"He was my son!" sobbed the unhappy mother.

"And so the young man was drowned," observed the official.

"I have sworn it," replied Gall.

"You have sworn to a lie, then!" exclaimed Jack Manders, walking into the office and looking the astonished speaker fully in the face; "for I left him a few minutes since alive and well."

A half-suppressed shriek of joy broke from the lips of the two females.

"You may stare," added the speaker; "I have said nothing that I cannot prove."

On hearing this, the senior clerk looked exceedingly grave, and placed the affidavit and other papers out of the reach of the applicants.

"Gentlemen," said the captain, "this young ruffian is a runaway apprentice of mine, who—"

"We have nothing to do with that, here," interrupted one of the officials; "if the statement you have made is true," he added, addressing himself to Jack, "why is not the young man here?"

"Because he is not of age, and—"

"He is of age!" exclaimed the agitated mother, "and has been these two months past; the papers in the hands of that gentleman prove it."

Caleb, who had been listening in the passage, could restrain himself no longer, but entered the office; the mother and sister recognised him, and in an instant their arms were round his neck.

"No, you don't!" exclaimed Jack, collaring his old persecutor, as he attempted to sneak out of the place, and dashing him aside with a little more violence, perhaps, than was strictly necessary.

Here one of the heads of the department whispered some directions to a porter, who immediately placed himself at the door.

"This must be settled elsewhere," muttered the disappointed father-in-law. "Come home," he added, scowling bitterly at his wife.

The terrified woman shrank back.

"Come home," he repeated, "or—"

Here Caleb stepped between his mother and the man who had so long tyrannised over her.

"Her home for the future is with her son, Mr. Gunton," he observed, his face radiant with smiles. "The time when you could brow-beat and indulge the violence of your temper is past. The boy has become a man. The nerves that trembled at your brutality are of iron: Attempt to enforce your authority, and I will tear you limb from limb."

"Bravo!" exclaimed Jack, casting anything but an amiable glance towards Captain Gall; "and I will second you."

"Nothing like violence can be permitted here," observed the senior clerk, as a couple of policemen entered the office. "You must accompany these gentlemen," he added, "before a magistrate."

Like all cowards, the two bullies were completely cowed by the sudden change in the aspect of affairs, and submitted to be led away without offering the slightest resistance; and the long-suffering wife and daughter returned to their lodgings, accompanied by Caleb and his friend.

When informed of what had taken place, Mrs. Boothroyd warmly congratulated them.

"Only let the wretch come here," she said; "I don't often lose my temper, but—well—only let him come."

Mr. Gunton, however, did not make his appearance; he and his confederate both fled from their hall, rather than stand their trial on a charge of conspiracy and forgery.

CHAPTER CVIII.

I know not of what use to put her to, but to have a hint of her, and her by her own light—SIR CHARLES.

THE death of her nephew proved a terrible blow to the ambitious designs of Lady Boothroyd, who had plotted and intrigued all her life for no other purpose than the empty gratification of seeing her daughter a peeress—a singular weakness for a woman possessed of so masculine a mind. In her rage, she did not hesitate to accuse William Thornton of being in some way accessory to the murder of Ilston, and more than once she repeated the odious calumny in the presence of Alice, whose joy at being released from her inconsiderate promise was damped by the terrible event, and the passionate violence of her mother.

It was true the persecuted girl had never loved her cousin, nay, had looked forward to her union with him with fixed aversion; still she could not help feeling pity at his untimely fate, snatched from life whilst in the very midst of its enjoyments, unwarned, and unprepared.

"I shall exact no promise from you as your poor weak father did," observed her ladyship, "but trust to myself to prevent your disgracing your family by a marriage with the son of a mere trader."

The prisoner, for Alice was still confined to her own room, under the joint surveillance of the French governess and lady's-maid, regarded her only remaining parent with an expression of mingled regret and commiseration.

"Mother!" she replied, "why will you not permit me to love you? Why force upon your child the painful conviction that she has no place within your heart? Why labour to destroy these feelings of respect and veneration which ought to render obedience and duty a happiness, and not a tyranny? Heaven has interposed to prevent the accomplishment of your past design. Think you," she added, "that its wisdom will not find the means to defeat your last and worst? It is never too late to atone."

The haughty woman repeated the word disdainfully.

"What!" she exclaimed, "acknowledges the rights of this pretended cousin, the illegitimate child of the man your poor father hated!"

"He was his brother," observed her daughter, meekly.

"And see you stripped of half your fortune! Mel-down sold! myself reduced to a paltry pittance! a mere existence! never! There are two things I never will consent to; the first is your marriage with William Thornton."

Poor Alice sighed, she felt that her sorrows were not over yet.

"The next is to receive the daughter of Allan Boothroyd as my niece," added her ladyship.

It was a bold assertion even for so resolute a personage as the speaker to make. There are few of us strong enough to war against circumstances, those iron links which form the chain of destiny.

It was a sense of duty rather than the hope of persuading her mother to act justly, that induced Alice to prolong the conversation, by declaring the resolution she had formed.

"I shall acknowledge my cousin Lillian," she answered, calmly.

It was the first time the daughter had ever hinted at the possibility of braving her mother's authority, and it stung the proud and passionate woman to the quick.

"And on coming of age," added the fair girl, "repair any injustice the law may permit you to inflict, by dividing my fortune with her."

The culminating point of endurance had been reached. Lady Boothroyd would hear no more.

"Listen to me!" she exclaimed.

"I have listened to the voice of my conscience, mother," replied the noble-minded girl; "the only plea that can justify me in remaining deaf to yours."

It would be difficult to paint the peculiar expression with which Lady Boothroyd regarded her child for several instants.

"We had better drop the subject, Alice," she observed at last; "two years is a long time to wait. Your resolve may change before it expires."

"Never!" mentally repeated her daughter; "never!"

Meanwhile, the time appointed for the hearing before the chancellor was rapidly approaching, and the witnesses from St. Faith's, including Simon Gee, his wife, Farmer Minter, and several others, had arrived in London ready to give their evidence; but as yet no proof of the marriage, upon which, as Silvertongue and the learned gentlemen who were with him declared the whole case hinged, had been brought to light.

When the honest weaver and Hester, who still fondly clung to the belief that our heroine was really their niece, were first presented to Lillian in the drawing-room of Lady Bell, and saw her surrounded by all the refined luxury which wealth and taste procure, their hearts sank within them.

She has forgotten us, was the sad conviction of the worthy pair, an error her affectionate kiss, kind words, and caresses quickly dispelled. She recollected the tender solicitude with which they had watched over her in their humble home, their goodness, simple piety; and, with the delicate feeling of a grateful mind, sought to convince them they still held a place both in memory and affection no tie of blood could strengthen or absence weaken.

Numberless were their exclamations of grief, astonishment, and indignation, as they listened to the wild story of her abduction and adventures in India. With their inexperience of life it sounded like some fairy tale. One thing, however, they clearly understood—the part Mark Rayner and his wife had taken in her removal from St. Faith's; and it required all Lillian's influence and reasoning, by pointing out the cruel position Lady Boothroyd had placed them in, to induce the weaver and Hester to forgive it.

"We must not be too hard, wife," observed Simon, at last; "temptation is a strong thing."

"Ay, but honesty is a stronger," replied the rightly-judging little woman. "I am not so much surprised at Mark, but Rose—Rose to have deceived me."

"What could she do?" urged our heroine; "see her husband dragged to prison, his life forfeited for a supposed crime! You must have acted as she did, had you been placed in her position," she added; "you would never have seen old Simon torn from his home."

"Perhaps not," sobbed Hester, who could not restrain her tears at such a supposition. "Perhaps not; and after all, God is the only judge."

"Right," said Lady Bell. "He reads the motive—we only see the act."

Farmer Minter, with his usual practical good sense, frankly acquitted them. He did not see how Rose and Mark could have acted otherwise. Yet he, too, was not without his disappointment. The worthy fellow had brought the savings of years to London with him to fight Lilly's battle against the lawyers, and, in the generosity of his heart, regretted that the money was no longer needful.

The morning preceding the hearing, the witnesses were all seated in the lodgings, near Westminster Hall, provided for them. Rose and her husband were also there, and she had been called upon to relate, for the second or third time, the history so deeply interesting to her hearers.

Hester could not comprehend how Lady Boothroyd should have turned out such an evil character—worse than Sir Norman—such a sweet-spoken lady!

"Won't we give Lilly—our young lady, I mean," observed one of the witnesses, correcting himself, "a real west country welcome, when she comes to her own!"

"If ever she does come to it," answered Mark Rayner, looking serious.

"What do thee mean?"

"The marriage certificate of Miss Lillian's parents is nowhere to be found, neither have the lawyers been able to discover the names of any who were present."

Farmer Minter struck his forehead despairingly; he would have given all the money he had brought with him, and ten times more had he possessed it, to remember the last words of poor Barney Gee.

"What be the matter with thee, neighbour?" demanded the astonished Simon.

"O my thick head! my thick head!"

"Well! well!" said the man, consolingly, "it be an honest one; and honesty is better than wit."

"The proofs will be forthcoming in good time," observed Rose. "I feel assured of it. Providence rarely leaves its designs unfinished; its hand is over us from our first step in good or ill; all things tend to its ends."

"Right," added her husband, approvingly; "I can see it now. Every man has one chance of escaping the snares that beset him—one guardian angel to watch over him. Mine," he added, affectionately, "has been my wife."

"I wish my unfortunate brother had had such a wife," exclaimed the weaver; "he might now have been sitting beside us instead of lying in his cold grave. Poor Barney," he added, "he loved me, but never minded me. Perhaps I was not as strict with him as I ought to have been, seeing I was so much the older. I shall never forget the night he first went out a-poaching."

"Why, surely you were not with him!" exclaimed Hester.

Her husband shook his head. "No, no, wife, not so bad as that; but I was in the old belfry when the keeper of Sir Norman chased him. He had a pheasant in his pocket, but once in the church tower, we defied them to find it."

"What did thee do with it?" demanded one of his hearers.

"Hid it in a niche behind the tenor bell, known only to ourselves," answered Simon. "We used to call it the owl's nest."

With a sudden laugh—an historical laugh, as Mrs. Gee invariably described it, when relating the circumstance—Farmer Minter sprang from his chair into the middle of the room, and made several fruitless efforts to speak; joy, or some other equally powerful emotion, was choking him.

"What be the matter with thee, neighbour?" demanded the weaver, patting him with all his strength upon the back, an operation which evidently increased his excitement.

"He be ill, poor man, he be ill!" exclaimed Hester.

"I have it," gasped the farmer; "I have it!"

"What has thee gotten?—the cramp?"

At this question the worthy fellow only laughed the more. "No, no!" he spluttered forth at last; "the—ha! ha! ha!—the owl's—"

"Gotten an owl!" exclaimed his friends, beginning to suspect that he was mad.

"Nest," added the farmer, "nest!" Having gasped out the word, he caught up his hat, clapped his hand upon his capacious pocket to assure himself that his purse was all right, and rushed out of the room.

On the stairs he encountered Mr. Morton's clerk, who had been intrusted to get up the evidence. He had come to accompany the witnesses for the last time before the examiner.

"Where are you going?" demanded the limb of the law. "I can't part with you."

"Owl's nest!" roared his witness. "Owl's nest!" "Owl's nonsense," repeated the clerk, attempting to bar his passage.

With a grasp that all but squeezed the breath out of the clerk's body, Farmer Minter lifted him aside and gained the street.

All that his astonished neighbours could ascertain respecting him was that he had taken the train and started for Devonshire.

As Rose and her husband were returning to Mivart's to inform Sir Charles Fourreau of what had occurred, the latter was tapped upon the shoulder by a police officer in plain clothes, who informed him that he had a warrant against him.

"Upon what charge?" demanded Mark.

"A most serious one—murder."

"I expected this," answered the accused, "and am fully prepared to meet it. Be calm, Rose; I have nothing to fear."

Still his wife regarded him anxiously.

"Go to the hotel, and inform the general of my arrest," he added; "the confession of Saunders is in his possession. You will oblige me," he said, addressing the officer, who seemed rather puzzled by his coolness, "by procuring a cab for my wife, and another for myself. It can be no part of your duty to march me through the streets like a felon."

His captor did not offer the slightest objection; but beckoning to a brother-officer, who had followed him at a distance, ready to lend assistance in case of resistance, he directed him to call two vehicles from the stand.

In a few minutes Rose was on her way home, and her husband under lock and key in one of the cells in Bow-street.

An experienced lawyer like Mr. Morton had calculated the probability of an unscrupulous woman like Lady Boothroyd making a desperate effort to prevent a witness so damaging to her reputation from appearing in court, and had taken his measures accordingly.

Accompanied by Sir Charles and an officer of the 01st, who fortunately happened to be in England on sick leave, he presented himself before the magistrates, who, on reading the confession of Saunders, and hearing the evidence of the baronet and his friend, on oath, consented to accept bail for the appearance of the prisoner.

"Her ladyship is an exceedingly clever woman," observed the lawyer, as they drove from Bow Street; "and the card was skilfully played. Pity," he added, "that it was not her last."

Doubtless the speaker alluded to the absence of all proof of Lieutenant Boothroyd's marriage.

Hopes and Helps for the Young

FOOD AND PHYSICAL CULTURE.

Most writers to young men have a good deal to say about diet, and regimen, and physical culture, and all that sort of thing; those who know the least of these important subjects are invariably the most elaborate and specific in their treatment of them. There have been some awful blunders committed in this business. All the denunciations we can heap together we here dedicate to those ascetic philosophers, who prescribe sawdust pudding, and plank beds, and brief sleep, and exhausting walks, long hours, and short commons for the rising generation. Heartily do we pity any young man who has become the victim of their notions. It is a hard sight to see a young man with the pluck all taken out of him by a meagre diet and excessive labour; his whole nature weakened and impaired by the plan of life he has adopted.

Look at this matter in a common-sense point of view. If you have a likely Durham steer, that you want fully to develop, would you not keep him on something more than a limited quantity of straw? You would not stir him up with a pitchfork before he has had his nap out, and insist on his being driven ten miles before he has had anything to eat. You would not take pains to make him generally uncomfortable; you know perfectly well that the animal will not grow up strong and sound—the pride of the farm and the gem of the stall—unless you give him abundance of the best food, a clean and comfortable place to sleep in, and just as long naps as he sees fit to take. The truth is that a good and abundant diet is not only essential to the highest physical health and development of man, but it improves, in a very important degree, the strength and vigour of the mind. A man cannot acquire courage on a spare diet; it is necessary to take care of the body in order to keep the mind unimpaired.

It may be objected to this, that great animal development is not necessary in man. We answer that it is: we declare that the more perfect a man can make his animal nature the better for him—that the animal nature is the servant of the mind; well treated, it serves obediently and honestly; badly treated, it rebels, and may in its turn assert the mastery over the mind. The idea that the development of the body is something to be condemned, that it is inimical to the best growth and development of the mind, is essentially impious—no matter where it is started; it is all wrong. A perverted and perverting animal nature is a fearful thing, but vigorous and healthful, it is like everything which God makes—very good.

We would recommend this subject of food and physical culture to your most serious attention. We would counsel the use of nothing which would stimulate one portion of your system more than another; but remember the best food is not too good for you, and that unless you have a perverted appetite, there is very little fear of your eating too much of it. Therefore, young men, we would say to you, be honest with your stomach. Let your diet be full and wholesome. Sleep well. If Franklin ever originated the maxim, "six hours sleep for a man, seven for a woman, and eight for a fool," it was unworthy of that great man's common sense. Young man, if you are a student, or engaged in severe mental occupation, sleep just as long as you can sleep comfortably. Lying in bed from laziness is another thing entirely.

Sleep is a thing which should not be rudely or unnecessarily disturbed. Nature is recruiting us, steeping our senses in forgetfulness, invigorating our frames for coming duties; nothing should trespass on an honest sleep. If any ascetic philosopher has made you believe that it is good for you to be hurriedly awakened from your repose at an early hour, and to go out into the raw morning air with your fast unbroken, and your body unfortified by the stimulant of food—forget him and his counsel, and take the full measure of your rest. Just as much labour can be accomplished in ten hours as in fourteen, with more efficacy and less fatigue, when proper rest and bodily exercise are taken.

But, physical culture, what is that? A very important thing, we assure you. Some young men get this in their employments, and are growing up with manly frames and strong arms. Others are delicate, with narrow shoulders, flat chest, and weak arms; they have little or no physical strength, their employment is such as to call for no bodily vigour; to such physical culture, as a part of education, is of the utmost consequence. Physical culture perfects a very important portion of the work which a wholesome diet begins. Your body needs a thorough training for the development of its power and the preservation of its health and strength. You need exercise; a natural law affects children in this particular, and is a striking illustration of what we, grown up children, should do. The necessity of play is laid upon children, and those restless little fellows who are always sliding, or running, or wrestling, are doing exactly what they ought to do. Those little brothers of yours, who, it may be, drive you half insane by their noise, who will not sit down quietly, and who, if they are persuaded to sit down, wriggle and twist their bodies into new positions every moment, these unquiet children are discharging a grand duty of their nature. But boys grow lazy as they grow older. As a child, a boy uses every physical power which he possesses, but as he approaches man's estate he puts away these "childish things," and imagines he is thereby becoming more dignified and more manlike. But the duty of play does not cease with childhood. When your employment cannot do for you what play has done, and when you have no regular task for your bodily powers, you must play. Walking, riding, cricketing, and fencing, ball playing, bowling, rowing, and running, all these are as legitimate to the man as the simpler sports are to the boy, and are, in a degree, essential to his happiness and usefulness. The fact is—and the fact should be constantly borne in mind—that man has a twofold nature—mind and body, and that, in order to preserve the first, he must take care of the second.

FRENCH LESSONS;

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH.

CHAPTER XXIX.

"TO-DAY," observed George, "we will invert the order of things, and begin by a little conversation on some idioms that occurred in that part of the 'Voyage à Paris' which you wrote out yesterday."

"The expression 'cela m'arrange,' for 'it will do,' is a decided Gallicism. Literally, it would be 'that arranges me.' However, there are other ways of ending 'it will do.' Perhaps the most usual is 'cela ira.' Particularly avoid the literal translation, 'cela fera.' It would immediately stamp you as a beginner. Des draps blancs, 'clean sheets,' next claim attention. 'Propre' is the usual word for 'clean,' but applied to linen, blanc, 'white,' is the word used; and bear in mind that 'blanc' applied to a feminine substantive becomes 'blanche.' If you are speaking of a thing being soiled or dirty, you may use the word 'malpropre.' In fact, 'c'est le plus usité,'—it is in the most general use.

"You may remember, Robert, our travellers were to have a female servant to wait upon them. They were lucky in this, for in many places in Paris one sees men doing all the household work, and even making the beds. At first, this is very displeasing to an English eye; but one becomes accustomed to it. In some of the furnished apartments, the servant that waits on you is called 'un serviteur omnibus'—a servant for everything. 'Il bat vos habits. Il balaye votre chambre. Il fait votre lit.' Now, Robert, translate those French sentences."

Robert paused for a moment, and then gave the following correct translation. "He beats your coats. He sweeps your room. He makes your bed."

"Very well, indeed," said George.

"Do not bestow too much praise upon me," said Robert, smiling, "for I partly guessed the translation."

"Never mind that; in the earlier stages of talking and understanding French, we all of us do a great deal by guess work. Only go on with the perseverance you have hitherto shown, and I am sure I shall have often to say, 'Courage, cela ira.' I know I need not translate that, so we will pass on to the rules for the French exercise, leaving the vocabulary for to-morrow."

"I do not mean you to learn by heart the rules that are about to follow. You need merely read them over attentively; and, if you do not quite understand them, do not be disheartened. An exercise upon them will clear up some of the difficulty; and practice alone will make you perfect in them. The subject of the exercise is still the adjective. In French the adjectives must agree in gender and number with the noun it qualifies. You will say this is clear enough; and so is the following rule—that when the adjective is preceded or followed by several substantives of the same gender, and united by the conjunction et, 'and,' it takes the plural, and is of the same gender as the nouns themselves; but if the nouns should have one and the same meaning, representing, as it were, but one idea, the adjective must be in the singular. Another rule respecting the adjective shows the superior grammatical importance of the masculine gender. If the adjective is used to qualify nouns of different genders, it is always used in the masculine plural. In this case, for the sake of sound, the feminine noun should be put first, supposing the masculine termination of the adjective differs from the feminine."

"When nouns have a similar meaning, and only one of them is qualified by the following adjective, this adjective agrees with the last-mentioned noun; and you may apply this rule when there is no gradation in the meaning of the nouns which the adjective is to qualify. Nouns separated by the conjunction ou must have the adjective in the singular; but if the adjective at once qualifies both nouns, then it is in the plural. I had better give you an example of this:—'Quel est le bon fils qui ne gémisse de voir son père ou sa mère perdu pour le bonheur?' 'Where is the good son who would not mourn over his father or mother lost to happiness?'"

"Supposing an adjective preceded by two nouns separated by 'of' (de), it must agree with the first or last, according to the sense of the sentence; and when adjectives, preceded by several nouns, are separated by the conjunctions ainsi que, 'as,' aussi bien que, 'as well as,' comme, 'as,' and avec, 'with,' it must agree only with the first of those nouns, if the sentence expresses a comparison; and with all of them, if the sentence implies unity, as it does in the following instance:—'In Rome, as well as Greece, Jupiter and Mars were acknowledged as gods.' 'A Rome, et dans la Grèce, Jupiter ainsi bien que Mars étaient reconnus pour Dieux.'"

EXERCISE.

ADJECTIVES CHANGING THEIR SIGNIFICATION ACCORDING AS THEY ARE PLACED BEFORE OR AFTER THE NOUN.

1. A tall man is not always a great man, and a small man is not always a mean man. 2. An honest man may not be a brave man. 3. There is a great difference between a good man and a simple man. 4. A certain man told me, yesterday, as a positive fact, that the king is dead. 5. I have heard at the concert that Mr. C has a common voice. 6. Last year was the last year of the war. 7. What is the difference between a wise woman and a mid-quelle sage femme sage-wife? 8. Ladies say that Mr. D is a clever man, but not a courteous man. 9. A lively man is never mistaken for a noble man. 10. Give us some other wine, but not any new-made wine. 11. I see you often with a new coat, but never with a new-fashioned coat. 12. A poor writer is generally a poor man. 13. An honest man, in order to be loved, should be a polite man. 14. A flat epigram is seldom a wicked one. 15. Mirabeau was an ugly man, but not a mean man.

LE CORRIGE.

1. Un homme grand n'est pas toujours un grand homme, et un petit homme n'est pas toujours un homme petit. 2. Un brave homme peut ne pas être un homme brave. 3. Il y a une grande différence entre un homme bon et un bon homme. 4. Une certaine personne me dit hier comme un fait certain que le roi est mort. 5. J'ai entendu dire au concert que M. C a la voix commune. 6. L'année dernière fut la dernière année de la guerre. 7. Quelle est la différence entre une femme sage et une sage-femme? 8. Les dames disent que Monsieur D est un galant homme, mais non un homme galant. 9. Un homme gentil n'est jamais pris pour un gentilhomme. 10. Donnez-nous de nouveau vin, mais non pas du vin nouveau. 11. Je vous vois souvent avec un nouvel habit, mais jamais avec un habit nouveau. 12. Un pauvre auteur est généralement un homme pauvre. 13. Un honnête homme, pour être aimé, doit être un homme honnête. 14. Une méchante épigramme est rarement une épigramme méchante. 15. Mirabeau était un vilain homme, mais non pas un homme vilain.

"You recollect, Robert," observed the instructor, "our travellers had succeeded in finding comfortable furnished apartments. We will suppose they left their hotel as they intended, and moved into their new abode that very night. The next morning we find them in excellent spirits, having just partaken of a good breakfast."

CONTINUATION OF

LE VOYAGE À PARIS.

How comfortable it is to have a little home of our own. Quel bonheur d'avoir un petit chez soi.

Particularly after all the trials of a journey. Sur tout après toutes les épreuves du voyage. Oh, I shall never forget my arrival in Paris. Ah, jamais je n'oublierai mon arrivée à Paris. As soon as one puts one's foot on Parisian ground, one's troubles begin. Au moment même où on met le pied sur le sol parisien commencent les tribulations.

One hears nothing but shouts. On n'entend que des cris. Yes, from all sides. Sir, do you want a guide? Oui, de toutes parts. Monsieur, un guide? Sir, do you want an interpreter? Monsieur, un interprète? Sir, do you want well-situated furnished apartments? Sir, to what hotel shall I take your luggage? Monsieur, une chambre garnie bien située? A quel hôtel faut-il porter les effets de monsieur?

Such confusion! If the poor traveller did not go on some plan, he would soon lose his free will. Ah quel tracas! Si le pauvre voyageur n'y met bon ordre, il risque perdre son libre arbitre. Let us think no more of it; here we are safe and sound. N'y pensons plus. Nous voici sains et saufs. Let us rather talk of the wonders of this fine city. Parlons plutôt de ce qu'il y a de remarquable dans cette belle ville.

I shall be happy to do so. Je le veux bien. Do you not mean to accompany me in my walks? Et n'est-ce pas vous m'accompagner dans mes courses?

Of course I do. But before I guide you through the streets of this vast metropolis, it is advisable to say a little about the history of Paris. Sans doute. Mais avant de vous guider à travers les rues de cette grande capitale, il nous importe de dire quelque mots sur l'histoire de Paris.

FRENCH PRONUNCIATION—continued.

OF THE SOUND on.

This sound, nearly, exists in English, in the word song, &c.

It is found in French words, represented by the following combinations:—aon, in taon, horse-fly;

aons, in taons, horse-flies; om, in complet, complete; omb, in plomb, lead; omps, in je romps, I break; ompt, in il rompt, he breaks; on, in bouton, button; onc, in donc, then; ond, in profond, deep; ong, in long; ons, in poissons, fishes; ont, in ils aiment, they will love; eon, in plongeon, plungeon; eons, in Project plungons; an in Manner (the name of a city), and in in Hammer (a proper name).

The sound on is the result of the following combinations of letters:—an, aon, am, amh, cups, is, is is, is, is is, is is, is, is is,
cuph, on, on, on, on, on, on, on, on, on.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON XXVIII.

EFFECTS OF ELECTRICITY.

713. Can a person be silently and insensibly filled with electricity?—He can: by standing on an insulating stool with glass legs, and taking hold of a brass rod that rests on the prime conductor. In this condition his clothing will attract particles of dust, pieces of paper, and other light bodies; his hair will stand out, and sparks may be taken from his hands, his ears, his nose, or from any part of him.

714. Mention two or three instances of violent effects produced by the mutual repulsion of particles of bodies highly charged with electricity.—The charge of a large Leyden jar passed through water confined in a small glass tube and between two wires that nearly meet at the centre, shatters the tube and scatters it into fragments. A quire of paper, placed between two metallic balls, may be perforated with the charge from a battery.

715. Mention other instances of similar effects produced by repulsion.—In a similar manner, brittle bodies, as pieces of loaf sugar, sealing wax, hard wood, stones, &c., may be broken and scattered into fragments.

716. How are all the violent effects of lightning, such as the shattering of trees, and stripping them of their bark, the destruction of articles of furniture in houses, &c., produced?—By the strong repulsion existing between the highly charged particles of the bodies that lie in the path of the lightning. This effect of repulsion may sometimes be greatly increased by the sudden conversion of the moisture in these bodies into steam.

HEATING EFFECTS OF THE ELECTRIC DISCHARGE.

717. Can combustibles be set on fire by electricity in motion?—Ether and spirits of wine can be inflamed by the electric spark received from the prime conductor of an electrical machine.

718. Can solid combustibles be inflamed by the electric discharge?—Gunpowder will explode, and tow dipped in powdered resin will burst into flame, if the spark from a good-sized Leyden jar be passed through them.

719. Can metals be heated by the electric discharge passed through them?—They may be melted, and even burned up, if they are used in the state of a fine wire to conduct the charge of a powerful battery.

720. In order that heat may be produced by electricity, what is necessary?—That a considerable quantity of electricity should be in motion, and meet with resistance at the point where the heat is to be produced.

721. What is the reason that lightning often sets fire to a building that it strikes?—Because of the resistance that the flash meets with from the combustibles through which it passes.

722. Will an ordinary lightning rod convey a flash of lightning to the ground without being materially heated?—It will; but the points of lightning rods have sometimes been melted when struck by lightning.

ATMOSPHERIC ELECTRICITY.

723. How did Franklin establish that lightning and electricity are identically the same?—He drew the lightning down from the clouds, by means of a kite, and showed that it would produce the same effects as electricity.

724. Where did Franklin perform this remarkable experiment?—At Philadelphia, in the summer of 1752.

725. Was this the first experiment of the sort?—No; the Abbé Chappe, at Tobolsk, in Siberia, had, previous to this, succeeded in drawing the electric fluid from the clouds.

726. Was Franklin's experiment repeated elsewhere?—During the following summer M. de Romas, of France, raised a kite to the height of 550 feet, into the midst of a thunder-cloud, and obtained at the end of the wire coiled around the string, sheets of fire ten feet in length and an inch in thickness, accompanied with explosions louder than the report of a pistol.

727. What is the usual mode of collecting electricity from the atmosphere for the sake of observation and experiment?—By means of an insulated metallic rod terminating in a point directed upward. It is also sometimes collected by means of long insulated wires stretched on the tops of lofty poles.

728. What is the ordinary electric state of the atmosphere?—It is charged with more or less of positive electricity; the quantity increases from the surface of the earth upward.

729. What is the electric condition of thunder-clouds?—Sometimes positive and sometimes negative; and the same is true of the air in stormy weather.

730. Do thunder-clouds always discharge to the earth?—They do not, but generally from one to another.

731. When lightning strikes near to us, what is the character of the thunder?—It is a peculiar, rattling, crackling noise, that continues for a short time.

732. Why is the sound prolonged?—Because it does not reach the ear from all points of the lightning's path at the same instant.

733. What is the original cause of thunder?—The sudden violent movement imparted to the air by the lightning in its passage.

734. What is the immediate cause of this movement?—The mutual repulsion of the particles electrified by the lightning.

735. What is the explanation of the heavy roll of thunder that often follows the first explosion after a short interval?—It is probably occasioned by reverberations of the original sound from the clouds.

736. What are some of the circumstances by which the sound that reaches the ear may be modified?—The zigzag or other form of the lightning's path, the number of simultaneous flashes, and the direction pursued by the flash.

MAGNETISM.

PROPERTIES OF MAGNETS.

737. What is a loadstone?—A piece of iron ore found in the earth, which has the property of attracting iron.

738. Does the loadstone attract a piece of iron with the same force at whatever part of its surface the iron is presented?—The attraction is the strongest at two opposite points called Poles. These are at north and south.

739. In passing from the poles to the middle of the loadstone how does the attraction vary?—It decreases rapidly, and near the middle vanishes altogether.

740. What is supposed to be the cause of this attraction?—A subtle fluid within the mass of the loadstone that has in some way been excited into action.

741. What is this fluid, or principle, whatever it may be called?—Magnetism; and the loadstone is said to be a Magnet.

742. What is the general opinion of the philosophers of the present day as to the nature of the principle of magnetism?—It is believed that magnetism is electricity in a peculiar state of motion. This belief is founded upon the fact that the effects produced by magnetism may be obtained from currents of electricity circulating in wires.

743. What effect has a loadstone or magnet upon a piece of malleable iron brought into contact with one of its poles?—It converts it at once into a magnet, as may be shown by applying a key to the other end.

744. Suppose, instead of malleable iron, a piece of hard steel be applied to either pole of a magnet?—The steel will also become a magnet, but the full effect will not be produced at once, and will be much less than on the iron.

745. How is it with cast iron?—Cast iron resists the magnetising action of the magnet with about the same force that cast steel does.

746. What will happen if the piece of soft iron be withdrawn from the magnet?—It will return at once to its former condition.

747. Will the same be true of the piece of steel?—It will not; the steel will have become a permanent magnet, like the loadstone.

748. What is such a magnet called?—An Artificial Magnet. The loadstone is called a Natural Magnet.

749. To magnetise a steel bar completely, what must be done?—The bar must be rubbed several times, in the same direction, from end to end, against one of the poles of a strong magnet.

750. If a magnet be suspended at its middle, what position will it take?—It will point north and south. If it should be drawn out of this position, it would immediately return to it again.

751. What name is given to the pole at the north end?—It is called the North pole of the magnet, and the other the South pole.

752. How may the unequal distribution of magnetism over the bar be shown?—By rolling the bar in iron filings; the filings will adhere in the largest clusters at the ends and along the edges.

Fig. 46.

753. Does the attractive power exerted by the pole of a magnet take effect through paper, wood, stone, &c.?—It does, but diminishes rapidly as the distance from the pole increases.

THE GATE OF TEARS.

[The "Gate of Tears," the straits or passage into the Red Sea, commonly called Babelmandel. It received this name from the old Arabians, on account of the danger of the navigation, and the number of shipwrecks by which it was distinguished; which induced them to consider as dead, and to wear mourning for, all who had the boldness to hazard the passage through it into the Ethiopic Ocean.]

Among the tide of story led,

We often find some thought astray

That overrules its little day;

So in Arabian tale I read

That all who sought the Ethiop sea

Through Babelmandel's stormy strait,

Were mourned as having passed the gate

That opens to eternity.

It shadowed forth so many fears,

So many farewells, sobs, and sighs,

Such weary hearts, such aching eyes,

It grew to be "the gate of tears."

I thought it over—how they met,

And how they parted, wringing hands,

And giving low and sweet commands,

And love-words, saddened by regret.

And then I thought of other straits

That open into unknown seas;

How Life has many such as these:

How Love, in sackcloth wrapt around,

Hath in her sorrow no relief;

Her heart is overcharged with grief

For those who now are "onward bound."

How, as each slowly disappears

Through perilous straits to unknown seas,

The loved ones fall upon their knees,

And worship at "the gate of tears."

And if the wanderers reached Cathay,

Or harboured at Avillion isles,

They cannot count the deep sea miles

Down which their journey stretched away.

THE FRENCH COURT IN ANCIENT DAYS.

THE close of the ninth century was a period of utter stagnation in the kingdom of France. Under the rule of Charles the Simple, the country had been almost completely sacked by the Normans, and invaders and freebooters ceased to trouble a region where everything valuable had already disappeared. "You might," says an old chronicler, "have journeyed leagues without hearing so much as the bark of a dog;" so deserted and empty were the towns and villages.

The feeble monarch, living supinely among his ruined possessions, was at length roused into something like an appearance of interest, by the bold entry into Paris of Rollo, the Norman chief, who had made his way hither through havoc and conflagration by which he had marked his progress. Hitherto, Normandy had possessed no real title or settlement; but the old chief now demanded that Charles should endow him with its possession, and confer upon him the rank of a great feudal prince, proposing at the same time that he should marry the king's daughter, Gisela.

Charles had not spirit to spurn these haughty proposals, but only stipulated that he should embrace Christianity, and do fealty to him as his suzerain, according to the custom of the Franks, in return for his estates and dignity. These conditions were accepted, and thence sprang into being the often-contested Duchy of Normandy, in which Rollo was now formally invested.

While this ceremony was going on, the old warrior was ordered by the prelates to stoop and kiss the foot of the king. "Never, by Heaven!" was his angry reply. One of his soldiers was permitted to serve as his proxy in this interesting ceremonial, but instead of stooping, the soldier raised the foot to his mouth so rudely, that the king was toppled from his throne to the floor, which drew peals of laughter from Rollo and his people. As soon as the marriage was performed, which made him the son-in-law of Charles, Rollo was baptised at Rome, by the name of Robert.

The new Duke of Normandy was so firm and just in his administration, that no fief in France was as efficiently and admirably governed. It was said of it that, "a child might have traversed his domains, with a purse of gold in his hand, without fear of molestation;" and the old chief is reported to have hung a pair of golden bracelets on a tree, where they remained for two years without any one daring to touch them.

The battle of St. Medard, in 923, brought disgrace and defeat to Charles the Simple; and for the next three-fourths of a century the throne of France passed from king to noble, and from noble to king, until the Carolingian race ended in the person of Louis le Faincant, or the Slothful.

In 996 the son of Hugh Capet ascended the throne under the name of Robert I. His queen, Bertha, was a princess of the house of Burgundy. Gregory V. desired him to put her away, on the alleged ground of relation within the prohibited degrees; and when Robert refused, the pope placed his kingdom under an interdict, and the king was excommunicated.

The court was deserted by all, excepting two menials, who supplied the means of life to the king and queen. Lonely and desolate, the royal pair remained in the deserted palace, receiving their food by means of a turning box, the servants fearing to touch anything which they had used, lest they should draw upon themselves the dreaded wrath of St. Peter.

The persecution at length subdued the king. Bertha was divorced, and the interdict was removed. A new queen was found in Constance, daughter of William, Count of Arles. The domestic happiness of Robert was embittered by the impetuous passions of Constance. She was vain, haughty, and imperious, and abused the station which the unhappy Bertha would so well have adorned.

Meantime, the latter, who had been tenderly attached to Robert, was lingering out a life worse than widowhood. It became known to her, too, as if to increase the sense of injustice which pressed upon her so heavily, that the pope was only a tool of the Emperor Otto III., who sought to get possession of the duchy of Burgundy as his own, a claim which the union of Bertha with the king of France would materially injure. She heard of Constance, holding high festival where once she herself reigned with moderation; of Robert, alone in his religious devotions, while his queen was giving audience to a crowd of revellers, who chanted love-songs, or danced in the state apartments, as if pleasure was all that was worth living for. Constance, indeed, despite her intense piety, at times had seemed to adopt something like the motto of Sardanapalus, the Assyrian king, "Eat, drink, and love; the rest is not worth a filip."

Within the sheltering walls of a convent, Bertha passed her sad and blameless life. For her, never again bloomed a single hope. The roses of youth had been scattered to the winds, and solitary and alone she passed into the arms of death. The nuns found her lifeless one morning, in her lonely cell, and at the very hour, perhaps, in which she died, Queen Constance was listening to the idle romances and exaggerated adulation of the servile courtiers whom she was feasting at the palace.

Among the maidens who attended upon the new queen, was Lucie de Clare, a young and beautiful girl, whom Constance permitted at court, more for her grace and beauty than for her scanty claims to nobility. She became a favourite with both the king and queen, until the latter discovered that the young Hugh or Hugues de Beauvais admired her protégée, and thenceforward Lucie was subjected to annoyances and a system of espionage, which wrought fearfully upon her mind and body. In the queen's apartment she was kept at the embroidery frame until her fatigue often induced faintness, while the queen looked on with evident pleasure and satisfaction. Ill as she was, Lucie de Clare surpassed all the ladies at court in beauty. Though now pale as a lily, yet she was not dependent on colour for her loveliness, but more on the statuesque nobility of her face and figure.

Madly in love with her, De Beauvais had often procured interviews with her at the greatest possible hazard; for such was his knowledge of the violence of the queen, that although he had been an especial favourite, he felt that she would not scruple to sacrifice himself and Lucie de Clare, if she should discover that they met without her sanction.

One night, when all the palace seemed hushed in the deepest slumber, De Beauvais wandered alone in the royal garden, to which he had secretly procured a key. One little faint glimmering of a lamp, placed in a window, was the signal that Lucie would join him there in a certain path which they had agreed upon. Long he waited, for such was now the utter debility of her frame that the descent from her chamber to the garden was painful and difficult. A few moments passed in terror and impatience. She was so long in coming, that he began to think that her progress was intercepted, when a light figure glided rather than walked towards him. So pale and shadowy did she look beneath the pale starlight, that he was almost afraid to clasp her in his arms, lest she should dissolve into unsubstantial air, until, wholly exhausted by exertion, she was near falling.

"Dearest Hugh," she whispered, when she recovered, "I fear the queen's spy, a woman whom she orders to watch me night and day, has discovered and will track me hither. Let me hide somewhere, where her prying eyes may not see me."

"Nay, my own Lucie; fear not. The queen cannot chain our love, and I know that King Robert thinks so well of me that I have decided to ask thy hand of him before to-morrow noon."

"Alas, my Hugh! unless thou canst have the king's word upon it before he confers with the queen, there is not a shadow of hope."

"Cheer up, my pale flower. No queen shall prevent our union. Lucie, would it grieve thee to quit the atmosphere of courts, and fly with me to some quiet spot—perhaps to some little hut in the Alpine solitudes, where we may never hear of grandeur and pageantry again, where the little we need will be supplied to our simple wants, and where peace, which never comes to us here, will brood over our dwelling like a dove?"

Lucie's small hand pressed that of her lover.

"Oh that we might be so happy, dearest Hugh! But there is no spot so remote that this cruel queen would not find me. I think, Hugh, that she is fully bent upon my death. These terrible faintings which I experience, this dying sensation which I feel night and day, sapping the springs of my life, I almost tremble to tell you, are, doubtless, the effect of some poison administered in my food."

"Lucie!"

"I fear so, indeed. This faintness is too frequent to be induced by mere fatigue or anxiety, and I truly believe that the medicine which the queen's physician prepares for me, and which is always brought me by the spy of whom I told you, is changed or adulterated by some one after it leaves his hands."

"Touch it not, my Lucie. Destroy it, or bring it to me that I may one day confront that cruel woman with her wicked attempt."

"Thou knowest not the queen, if thou thinkest she will ever fail in any project near her heart. Hark! was that a rustling of the leaves, or some one in the garden?"

And the poor feeble girl clung closer to her lover's arms, as if, in that embrace, she could gladly breathe out her life.

"It was only the breeze rustling the leaves, but you are so sadly broken that it affects you."

Neither of them saw a gliding shadow that turned out of the path, at these words; nor, if they had, could they have averted their destiny. It came all too soon.

Early the next morning, De Beauvais was summoned with the rest of the courtiers to attend the king on a hunting party, and believing that, in the pauses of the sport, he could better engage Robert's attention, he cheerfully complied. He gave a stolen glance, as they rode off, to the pale face at Lucie's window, but did not venture any stronger proof of recognition. She, however, placed her hand upon her heart, in token that it was still beating for him.

Alone and cheerless, she returned to her couch, after the party had gone, perfectly unable to conquer the languor and listlessness of her whole frame. She slept a part of the day, and woke with a fearful start that shook her nerves to almost infantine weakness. She had dreamed of the queen, of Hugh, bleeding to death, and of King Robert weeping over the body of his wounded favourite.

There was a bustle in the courtyard; the hunting party had returned. A rude hurdle, covered with a cloth, on which something was deposited which Lucie supposed was the deer, was carried hastily past the palace gates, into a quadrangle, sheltered from open sight. Lucie leaned far out of the window, attracted to the spot by something of sympathy with the victim. "Just so are they hunting me to death!" she exclaimed, as she saw a man approach and uncover the supposed deer. A terrible interest chained her at the window, and she held convulsively to its framework, as she leaned forward to catch a glimpse of the stricken animal.

The sight that met her gaze froze every drop of blood in her veins. The uncovering of the hurdle showed her the pale face and bleeding figure of Hugh de Beauvais! Her frame, previously weakened by the minute but certain doses of poison which had been administered to her, sunk at once under the terrible sight; and when the cruel Constance sent for her, in order to enjoy the spectacle of her agonies at the death of her lover, Lucie lay beneath the window where she had fallen. The attendant raised the thin white arm, and it fell heavily from her touch. Death had set his seal upon the beauty of that perfect face. She had gone to rejoin Hugh in a world where "lords and kings are known no more."

Ancient chronicles assert that Constance not only planned the assassination of De Beauvais on that day, but caused it to be executed in presence of the king; and adds, that "the spiritless monarch, as was his duty, was speedily reconciled to his imperious consort." After a life of intrigue and tyranny, the same chronicler quaintly remarks that "she died, to the great relief of her family and the whole kingdom."

Chemical Experiments.

WE will occupy ourselves to-day with some pretty gilding experiments.

To gild steel, or imprint golden letters on the metal.—Procure some chloride of gold, or salt, frequently employed now in photographic operations; dissolve it in water, and to the solution add ether in equal bulk to the water. Shake all together, and let it stand. Presently, the ether will separate from the water, and, rising to the surface, will carry with it portions of the chloride of gold. If into this ethereal solution of chloride of gold a piece of polished steel be dipped, the ether will evaporate, and cause a coating of gold upon the steel. By means of this solution letters may be written upon a steel blade; though to do so requires much practice, because of the rapidity with which ether evaporates. The coating of gold left by the evaporation of auriferous ether is very thin; nevertheless, if the operator desire it, he can gild thickly upon it, common leaf-gold readily attaching itself by mere adhesion to the surface. Chloride of gold may be also employed to gild feathers, ribbons, &c., all of which, when thus treated, acquire a very pretty appearance.

One of several methods may be adopted for gilding feathers, ribbons, &c. The following answers perfectly well. In the early part of our chemical memoranda, perhaps you will remember we dissolved phosphorus in ether, and produced a luminous solution of phosphorus, with which the hands and faces of persons when smeared, caused lookers-on to imagine they were on fire. Some of this ethereal solution of phosphorus will be necessary for our present purposes. Dip the soft material to be gilt in the ethereal solution of phosphorus, and, removing the object, allow all the ether to evaporate, which takes place in the course of a few seconds, and which may be known to have occurred by the appearance of phosphorus fumes. If the soft substance, whilst in this fuming state, be dipped into a solution of chloride of gold, and immediately removed, the coating of phosphorus will speedily change the attached chloride of gold into metallic gold.

Instead of following the operation just described, the operator may, if he pleases, immerse the objects to be dyed in chloride of gold solution, and hold them over a jet of hydrogen gas, an agent which reduces the salt to the metallic form. If, instead of chloride of gold, nitrate of silver be employed, then, instead of metallic gold being reduced, there will be a deposition of metallic silver.

Some of the most beautiful cases of metal-gilding, however, are dependent upon electrical agency, and as they require apparatus, are beyond the scope of ordinary operators. It was a great boon when the process of electro-gilding came into use. The operations which immediately preceded it, and which are still followed to some extent, were very detrimental to health.

Notwithstanding the facility of electro-gilding, it is not possible, either by this means, or perhaps any other sort of gilding, to completely cover a metallic surface. The surface may look covered; but little orifices, quite through to the underlying metal, will remain, into which liquids will, in time, find their way. Nevertheless, electro-gilding is a considerable protection in many instances. Many of the higher-priced gun locks are now electro-gilt internally. The steel wires of some grand pianos have also been electro-gilt with advantage, although the gilding process adds considerably to the expense of the instrument.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

SAMUEL WARREN, ESQ., Q.C., M.P., ETC.

SAMUEL WARREN, ESQ., Q.C., M.P.

SAMUEL WARREN was born on the 23rd of May, 1807. He is the eldest son of the Rev. Dr. Warren, incumbent of All Soul's, Manchester. He was originally intended for the medical profession, but early showed a decided aversion to that pursuit, and a mind bent upon the adoption of an occupation more congenial to his tastes and habits. He loved the pen better than the lancet, and worshipped the Muse rather than Æsculapius. But however strong his inclination for a literary life—and that it was strong is clear enough from his contributing at a very early age to periodical literature—he resolved to adopt one of the regular professions, and therefore turned his attention to the law.

In 1827 he entered the University of Edinburgh, and in his first session gained the prize for English poetry, the subject being the fall of Capua; and for an essay on the comparison between ancient and modern jurisprudence relating to succession to property, with illustrations from the classical writers. Both of these compositions displayed very considerable ability, and were certainly above the average merit of collegiate exercises; they gave evidence of the literary skill of their author, and of the existence of that genius which was subsequently to present valuable additions to our English literature. The political principles of Mr. Warren were also openly manifested about this time, in a pamphlet directed against Canning's accepting office as a premier favourable to Catholic emancipation.

In 1828 Mr. Warren entered at the Middle Temple, and, while studying for the bar, contributed to the pages of a contemporary a series of graphic sketches.

Notwithstanding the intrinsic merit of these sketches, the author had very much difficulty in getting them published. The first sketch was offered by him in manuscript to the editors of three leading magazines, and was by them refused. As a forlorn hope, he carried it to another publisher, and left it in his hands, expecting nothing but disappointment and failure, so that the appearance of his effusion in print was as much a matter of surprise to him as it was of delight to the public. The sketches immediately excited attention. He was urged to continue them. His knowledge of human nature, his imaginative and dramatic power, and the healthy tone which characterised his writings, made his composition popular, and won for him a reputation as well grounded as it is widely spread.

In 1831 Mr. Warren commenced practice as a special pleader, and forthwith issued a professional text-book, entitled "Popular and Practical Introduction to Law Studies," a work which brought its author a great number of pupils. On the 2nd of July, in the same year, he married Miss Bellenger, only daughter of the late James Bellenger, Esq., of Woodford House, Essex.

In April, 1835, Mr. Warren was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, the name of Lord Lyndhurst being the first on his certificate. Two years later (1837), he was called to the bar, and in 1838 went the northern circuit, for the first time. But his legal engagements in chambers and court were not allowed to interfere with his literary pursuits. He still contributed to general literature, and in 1839 issued a novel, the popularity of which far exceeded all that he had hitherto achieved. This work—with its interesting narrative, its ably developed plot, its graphic sketches of character, its natural pathos and equally natural humour, its hits at the men and manners of the time—commanded an immense circulation, was reprinted in America, and translated into almost every continental language. Another work, written in eighteen days, exhausted its first edition on the day of publication. This was followed by a sort of lyrical, philosophical poem, which excited a good deal of sharp criticism, and the occult meaning of which no man has ever yet been able to discover.

At the bar Mr. Warren has been eminently successful. He obtained his silk gown in 1851, and in the following year was appointed Recorder of Hull. At the installation of the Earl of Derby as Chancellor of the University of Oxford, he received, in company with Macaulay, Bulwer Lytton, and Alison, the distinction of honorary D.C.L. On the 10th February, 1856, he was returned, without opposition, for the borough of Midhurst, vacated by Mr. Walpole.

Mr. Warren has contributed several important works to professional literature, his latest work being Blackstone's Commentaries, systematically abridged, and containing very valuable additions. He has also published two important papers on our great social questions.

In politics, Mr. Warren is a staunch supporter of the Earl of Derby. He is a warm advocate of religious education, the reformation of juvenile offenders, and the improvement of the law. He is an eminently practical man. He has shown us—if there were no other illustration of the same sort—that to be a successful littérateur it is not essentially necessary to neglect other pursuits; for, though as zealous a devotee as ever worshipped in the temple of the Muses, he is still as able a lawyer as ever advocated impartial justice.

THE EUPHORBIA, DARFUR, AFRICA.

THE EUPHORBIA.

AFRICAN vegetation may be divided into three distinct divisions, namely, that of the Atlantic, the Equinoctial, and the Austral districts. The equinoctial parts of Africa present trees and plants, differing entirely from those of Europe, and bearing no very close resemblance to those of tropical Asia or America. The southern extremity furnishes a new form of vegetation, of which the prevailing genera are euphorbiae, aloes, crassulas, and heaths of various species.

Darfur is a country of Central Africa, of the topography and actual extent of which we know but little. We are, however, sufficiently acquainted with it to know that it possesses many curious and interesting features; that its people are a mixture of Arabs and Negroes, who devote their attention more to commerce than to agriculture. Indeed, their country possesses but small inducement to the cultivator of the soil, consisting, as it does, chiefly of bare rocks and sandy plains, unrefreshed by lake or river, dotted here and there with patches of verdure, solely irrigated by the heavy periodical rains which are preserved in watercourses for that purpose.

But the traveller in Darfur cannot fail to notice the euphorbiae. These gigantic specimens of vegetation present a very remarkable appearance.

Their strangely twisted branches, so mysteriously netted, as it were, together, completely shut out the rays of the sun, and form an impenetrable shade. They rise up on the mountain side, or hill top, attracting attention by the singularity of their aspect. They are evergreens, and form natural belvederes, where the negroes spend their leisure. But it is not without some degree of apprehension that these people approach the euphorbiae; as they attribute to their shade a pernicious and dangerous influence only to be averted by certain charms which they are simple enough to believe will arrest all evil.

There are many varieties of the euphorbiae. The greater number contain a milky, acrid, and poisonous juice, which often holds dissolved, in addition to other principles, a peculiar elastic substance, and, occasionally, colouring matter. The seeds are oily, and the root is sometimes feculent. Certain members of the euphorbiae possess a fleshy stem, angular and spiny, very much resembling cactuses; others have normal leaves and stems. Many of the African, Arabian, and Indian species furnish an exudation which, when thickened by the sun, becomes the euphorbia of commerce. Some of these trees are celebrated for their peculiarly poisonous qualities. As we have noticed already, the Africans think to overcome this malignant influence by charms; but still declare that it is certain death for any individual to sleep under their branches; and that even rain which touches the skin, after having fallen upon the leaves of this tree, raises a blister.

A recent traveller informs us that, being in the neighbourhood of the gigantic euphorbia, represented in our engraving, he requested one of the negroes to go with him to the tree. The fellow hesitated, excused himself on various pretences, but at last consented to go. It was evident that he was in extreme fear, and that his terror increased the nearer he approached the tree; he lifted his large eyes several times to its branches, and apparently entertained the notion that he was treading on forbidden ground. He stood by without uttering a syllable, but in a high state of nervous excitement, while the traveller made his sketch; but when, on its completion, the artist suggested breaking off a branch as a memento of the visit, the terror of the negro became extreme. His gesticulations were irresistibly comic, his language utterly incomprehensible, but it was clear enough that he felt sure some dire penalty would follow the commission of such sacrilege. At last he said in a sort of mongrel Arabic: "Touch it, and you'll die—it will kill you—it always kills." But the branch was broken off, and the sap, a milky-looking fluid, burst out far more copiously than the traveller had anticipated, and penetrated his outer clothing in an instant. He soon understood the cause of the negro's terror. The sap was a deadly poison, and he was assured that if he had any wound or scratch upon his body, the result would be fatal. Fortunately for him he had not.

It is the sap of the euphorbium with which the negroes poison their darts and arrows, in order to render fatal the wounds inflicted by those missiles. They allow the sap to stand for some time until it thickens into a pasty consistency, which they can readily smear over their weapons.

The euphorbium, of which we give an illustration, grows on the mountain of Kacane. It measures about eighty feet in circumference; its height is about thirty feet. The trunk is a piece of hard, firm timber; the branches are cylindrical in form, and so interlaced that they present an appearance unlike everything else.

The manchineel is a species of the euphorbiaceae. It is found in intertropical America. This tree bears tempting-looking fruit, from which an agreeable odour is exhaled, but the smallest portion of which, if eaten, is certain death.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,

SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER CXX.

A passion, without hope or pleasure,
In her soul's darkness, buried deep;
It lies like some ill-gotten treasure,
Some idol without shrine or name,
O'er which its pale-eyed vot'ries keep Unhallowed watch, while others weep.—MOORE.

Poor Hope! How her cheek alternately paled and flushed; how her heart first wildly beat, and then grew cold and still, as with eyes dim with tears she read the first page of this journal, written so many years ago by that fair hand which had long been dust, but which had left a record that had power to move the deepest feelings, and wake the wildest emotions in the heart of her daughter.

It was a curious coincidence that this journal (the paper of which was yellow, and even mouldy and musty with time) was begun on the very day that Hope's mother completed her seventeenth year.

"May the 9th, 18—. I am seventeen to-day," began the writer, whose every word was so intensely interesting to her imaginative and tender-hearted child; "Seventeen! 'sweet seventeen!' I have heard young girls and old beaux exclaim. Alas! bitter seventeen it will, in all probability, be to me. Every year of sad dependent life seems more laden with care, and more embittered with anxiety. And now to all the trials of my lady's caprice, my dear kind patron's growing infirmity, the insults of menials, and the exactions inseparable from my position as a companion, comes this tyrant of woman's heart, this Aaron's rod, swallowing up all the rest—this dreary, hopeless, miserable love!

"But he shall not know, he shall not guess that I adore him. Alas! my own love I could conceal, my own misery I could hide, as the Spartan boy did the fox that was gnawing his bosom—but he is miserable; he pines; his cheek is pale, his eyes are often wet, he tries to meet me, and I must shun him! I who so long to comfort him!

"And why is this? Simply because I am a poor, dependent, desolate orphan! And yet in birth his equal. I am descended from those whose arms they quarter, whose motto adorns their gay equipages while they live, and their hatchments when they die! I am of the same old blood as this my haughty cousin and mistress, who treats me as if I were her waiting-maid! Nay, worse; for on the maid's good humour the lady's charms depend. She who can make wigs look like real hair, and real hair like wigs—she is a much more important person than the poor companion, that unhappy being whose position is undefined; whose duties are undefined; who must dress, act, talk like a lady, but not require to be treated like one; who is alone in the great house—for she is not good enough for the ladies' haughty circle of friends, and too good for the servants' hall. The great despise and mortify her un-tentionally; the humble inmates envy and hate and mortify her deliberately and on purpose. A knock at my door! Oh, what a sweet surprise! Oh, silly Constance! What a tumult of delight! And yet how wrong to be so glad of what must bring so much unhappiness! It was—one I dare not name. 'Twas he. Come from Oxford in haste and secrecy, because it was my birthday! And he has run such risks! He could not get leave; and so he came without, at the risk of his noble, his precious, his darling life; and, with no help but that of his friend, Mr. Evermore, he scaled the great iron gates of his college—a feat never performed but once before. And Mr. Evermore is to stay in his rooms, and sleep in his bed, and pretend to be my beloved one ill in bed. And all this for me!—one whom my lady this very morning rated as she would not have done a housemaid, and threatened with expulsion, and taxed with laziness, and uselessness, and stupidity! Yet he thinks me worth all this risk, all this fatigue; and he has brought me a beautiful locket, with a curl of his bright brown hair, and a miniature of his too dear, too beautiful face. I know I ought to refuse them; but yet I cannot do it. He gave them with a trembling hand, and eyes full of tears; and he said, 'One day, dear Constance, I will offer you the original. Till then, wear this in your bosom.' How could I say no! But yet what hope is there that his parents (my lady especially) will ever consent to his wedding the poor dependent Constance! My lady thinks no duchess, were she beautiful as Helen, wise as Minerva, and accomplished as all the Muses rolled into one, would be good enough for her only son. And she has no suspicion of his love—alas! I must say it now, of our love; and she will believe that he is here, not because it is my birthday—a day so utterly contemptible in her proud eyes—but because he heard she had not been well!

"Ah, there they go! How proudly she takes his arm—how lovingly she looks up into his noble face! How fond she is of him! How proud! how delighted! And, bless him! oh, bless him ten thousand times! He has cast up a glance at this window, and while she plucks a flower for his button-hole, he has waved his hand to me. How can I help loving him! What a figure I am in this plain morning dress, and my hair all knotted up! But now I will run to the laundry and coax Dorcas to get up my white dress in time for dinner; and I will let my hair all down in the ringlets he is so fond of, and wear my blue ribbons, and my blue shoes, and gloves, and the pearls that were my mother's; and I will play and sing, if I am but asked—and he will be sure to ask me. Alas! alas! why am I so full of ecstasy? how is all this to end! Life, alas! is not like the romances and novels which I read to my lady. In a novel it would all come right, but in real life I fear the poor companion's love for her lady's only son, will, if found out (and love, like fire, cannot long be hid), lead to her disgrace and expulsion. . . . What then! I will never, never let him take any step that can injure him, and to offend his mother, were ruin to him! But I will love on, and if I may not see him, I will pray for death; but if any other offered me the wealth of the Indies, and a coronet to boot, I would say no, for my heart could not go with my hand. And now I must try to compose my spirit and my manners. I must learn not to blush, to falter, to tremble. Alas! how can a poor, weak, loving girl conceal so great a secret from the prying eyes of a whole household.

"Love cannot long be feigned where it is not, nor hidden where it is. I must look in the glass to see if my heart is, alas! legible there. Too much so, indeed! What shall I do? Why do I look so happy? How can I feel so elate with such a future before me? A message! what is it? My lady sends to say I am not to dine at table, but I can be in the drawing-room to pour out the tea. Not to dine at table to-day! the only day for months that I have wished to dine at table! And he will be disappointed—I know he will! Never mind: I shall see him in the evening, and my lady will fall asleep; and then, while I sing to him, he will look at me, and perhaps turn the leaves and whisper a few words in my ear—and that will be better than merely sitting opposite to him at table, with the cold eye of the butler fixed upon me, and three powdered footmen; who of course see and hear though they say nothing. And I am seventeen to-day! and this birthday, which dawned so drearily, is become a perfect fête—a festival of the heart! How weak and irresolute I am: last night I resolved to tear this passionate weakness from my heart, though every fibre might bleed as I did so; and here I am hugging it as my darling—feeding, fondling it! Again, how often have I determined to keep a minute record of my thoughts and actions, and of every event of my life. I have begun again and again on those days which are Time's landmarks—my birthday, New-year's Day—and never have I had courage to persevere. Alas! what dependence can I place on myself when even to myself I seem so infirm of purpose?

"10th of May.—He is gone! What an evening of intense and trembling delight was that of yesterday! How early he joined us! How beautiful he looked! How merry—how amusing—how polite he was! How he made us laugh with his wild adventures—hunting and boating—'by flood and field!' What curious slang seems to be in vogue at Oxford, and how pretty it sounds from his dear lips. How my lady stared when he said he'd 'let her into a wrinkle or two'; and that she mustn't walk into his trunk; and that his father was a buck and a beau, and no end of bird; and had given him such lots of tin, that though he'd been offered tic by all the tradespeople at Oxford, they found it 'no go'—he wasn't such a shady bird as to do 'the governor' in that way! How lucky it was that my lady chose to summon Garnet, and go to her dressing-room to put on her fancy dress that she wore at the Duke's; and how glad I was she did not call me to help, and that the dress of Queen Elizabeth was so elaborate. For nearly an hour we were alone! Oh! such an hour—it was worth a life! Generous, kind, beloved Walter! As soon as he has taken his degree he means to own his love, and ask his parent's sanction. He says he is working very hard, night and day, to graduate in honours. He thinks his father will then be so pleased he will not thwart him in the great wish of his life. Walter turned student! And all for me! Love lighting the lamp of learning! Ah! surely, it is no sin to love this man! Would it not be cold, thankless, unwomanly, to be cold to such devotion—such tenderness? He has infected me with his own bright hopefulness. And yet reason, experience, common sense, tell me there is no hope! And yet I have promised to write to him! How could I say 'No,' when he—the noble, the beautiful, the beloved heir to this fine place and all its honours—was kneeling, on his own hearthstone, at the feet of his poor third cousin, his mother's companion, and swearing that, even if she came in and found him there, he would not rise till I had promised to correspond with him? And I am to write my first letter to-day; and I must make some excuse to walk to the village, in order to post it. And his letters are to be left there 'till called for.' Oh, what a world of delight! And yet what delicious difficulties and appalling perils! I dare not look my lady in the face—I am so afraid she should read in my eyes, or on my cheek, the rapture of my heart.

"May 11th.—I could not get out yesterday to post my first letter to Walter; my lady did not leave me a moment to myself. I was in a perfect fever. I am almost inclined to send Bertha, the under housemaid—she seems so affectionate and so innocent. But to-day I will go myself. . . . I have been! I have posted my letter—I have received his! How my voice trembled, my face burned, and my knees shook, when I asked if there was a letter for C. E. And with what rapture I clutched it, and hurried into the wood to read and revel in it! What a dear, kind, darling letter! And yet how short! How soon I knew it by heart! And mine is so long—too long!—crossed! re-crossed! Will he not smile at the tautology of tenderness? Sir Augustus is expected to-day. I feel like a guilty thing; he is always so kind. When he kisses me, and says, 'Bless you, my child!' I shall think, 'Would he bless me if he knew all? Would he not curse me? No, no! He would not. But my lady, I fear she would.' I must take Ruth into my confidence, for I cannot get away, either to post my letters or to inquire for any.

"May 12th.—My lady is gone to town; and now I can write as much as I please, and go to the village when I like. Is not this delightful! And now I can finish the sachet, and the purse, and the drawings I promised him. And I can make him up a parcel; and send him a cake of my own making, and the apricot marmalade, preserved by myself, and which he liked so much. Oh, what joy to send him a parcel! I shall put in it everything I can think of.

"May 13th.—Oh, rash Walter! and oh, weak, devoted Constance! He knew his parents were in town; and again, sub rosa, and without leave, he climbed the college gates, Mr. Evermore again helping him, and suddenly, as I sat alone in the library, he came in through the conservatory. 'Is he mad?' He wants me to elope with him, get married at Gretna, and keep the marriage secret. Oh, how he pleaded! how he wept! how fondly he entreated! how bitterly he reproached me! But I thank Providence I did not comply. No; I cannot break his mother's heart. He says I shall break his; but I will hope not. I feel sure my lady will find out he has been here. He says not; that he has bribed the butler—the only one that ever speaks to my lady. I have no faith in those who can be bribed. What a joyous, and yet agonising meeting it was! How he held me to his heart! and how that heart beat against my own! He says I am cold, unloving; that I calculate, but do not feel. I am glad he does not know how much I feel. How near I was yielding to his passionate entreaty, and letting him carry me into the post-chaise he had left in the lane, and to Greta with him!

"May 15th.—I could not get a moment to myself yesterday. My lady is come back, so cross, so cruel, so exacting! How she mortifies, wounds, and insults me! How she talks before the servants of making me a teacher in a school! She quite ignores and forgets the relationship between us. Unkind as she is now, what would she be if she knew all! I fear she would kill me."

CHAPTER CXXI.

Conscience does make cowards of us all.—SHAKESPEARE.

"May 26th.—Can my lady suspect anything? She watches me closely, and scarcely leaves me a minute to myself! Several letters have passed between my lady and Walter. She fixes her eyes steadily upon me when they come, and I can feel my colour come and go, and my heart stand still, and my knees tremble. I cannot even get a moment for my journal. Under pretence of dread of fire, my lady sends Garnet to take away my light as soon as I have had time to undress. Alas! what will Walter think? I have not been able to send him a line, or to call for his letters!

"Oh! what a tangled web we weave,
When once we venture to deceive."

Yet, what could I do? Not to love him was impossible; and loving him as I do, could I spurn and betray him?

"May 27th.—There is some commotion going on. Garnet tosses her head, and looks very mysterious. She affects to treat me with supreme contempt. Ruth tells me Sir Augustus has been to Oxford. She suspects Mr. Walter has got into some scrape. Poor, dear Walter!

"May 29th.—Oh! what will become of me? Walter was here last night and I never knew it. Ruth went into the garden, and stood on the flower-beds under the windows, to hear what she could. I told her how mean and wicked a thing it was to do; but when she said she did it out of true love for me—that she was sure my lady was determined to cross true love, and Garnet was a snake in the grass; and that she had always loved me, and couldn't help listening to know what they were plotting against me; I could not but forgive her. How true it is that servants see and know everything that passes in a family! Here have I for months been thinking about telling Ruth my secret, and she knows it, and talks about crossing true love! Of course she means the love between Walter and me! Well, it seems she heard Walter, when upbraided by his mother, swear he loved Constance and would marry her; and then he said, 'You disgrace yourself, mother, to treat your own cousin like a waiting-maid. I have blushed to hear you rate her and order her about; and it was your injustice and cruelty first made me love her!' Hereupon, Ruth says, my lady went off into hysterics. She thinks they made Walter believe I was gone away, for his last words were, 'I'll find her, if I search the whole world!' Noble, dear, generous Walter? How can I help loving thee?

"June 14th.—Oh! what a dreadful time have I spent? What mental agony I suffered before I was stretched on a sick bed! And so all was discovered! The post-office woman—I saw her sly face as she crossed the park; and when I was sent for to my lady, there was the table covered with letters—Walter's letters, which I had had no opportunity of claiming, and one or two of mine which had not been forwarded. Of course, deception was at an end! My lady did not storm; she did worse—she wept. She told me her son's fate and fortunes were in my hands; that if he married me he would be driven forth disinherited, penniless—a blighted, blasted being! That his father and herself had sworn it; but if I promised to resign him, and go quietly into a situation she would find me, as teacher in a school, she would get him married to a beautiful young heiress of rank who was in love with him, and my self-sacrifice would make him great, and wealthy, and happy. I could not answer her. The struggle ended in a fit, and I have been at Death's door ever since.

"June 20th.—I am slowly recovering. No! I will not resign him, except I hear from his own lips that he will not curse me if I do. What are rank and wealth to hearts that love! If he loves as I do, would he thank me? What should I feel, wedded to a king, and not to him!

"June 25th.—Another scene with my lady. She says he is gone to travel abroad, and I am to leave this place to-morrow at dawn, and to be conveyed to Goff House, where I am already engaged as a junior teacher. Bertha thinks it is not true; she believes it is settled he is to go abroad, but she thinks he is coming here first. What shall I do? Oh, wretched orphan! penniless, friendless, hopeless—what can I do but submit? Yet I will never resign him till he bids me do so.

"Goff House, Chelsea.—Here I am a wretched junior teacher! looked down upon by everybody, and too miserable to assist myself at all. I cannot control my own fast-flowing tears, how then can I keep in order these rude, sarcastic, vulgar hoydens? To-day I found a card pinned to my shawl; some illiterate damsel had written thereon, 'Crossed in love! What a Guy!' I have no heart for my journal now, and, indeed, no time! My duties extend over play, as well as school-hours, and my miserable nights are not sacred, for my wretched pallet is placed in a dormitory in which sleep twenty great ill-bred, hard-hearted, but sharp-witted girls! Summer is gone! Autumn is here, with its staring dahlias and chinas—alas! where is he! for months I have not heard his name!

"November 2nd.—I have seen him. He has seen me walking with the odious file of school girls; yet he knew me, and followed me home.

"November 3rd.—He has written to me. He begs me to meet him, if only for a moment, at the gate that looks into the lane. He has bribed the cook. He says life is become an intolerable burden to him; that he came from Dresden, where he was lying on a sick bed, because his valet had found out, through Ruth, where his cruel and implacable mother had hidden his poor Constance. He vows he will shoot himself before my eyes if I refuse to meet him. I am to steal down when the girls are in bed; the cook will keep watch. The odious, cruel, sneering, tyrant, Mrs. Markham, my mistress, will be gone to a party. He has made himself acquainted with every particular. I will see him, but only for a few minutes. Wretched girl that I am! my heart beats with a wild delight at the thought of seeing him once more, though I must turn a deaf ear to his prayers. Why, oh why, was I born?

"Stamford Street, Blackfriars.—Here I am, safe at last from temptation and from him. Goff House, farewell for ever! I met him; and he, oh, cruel, selfish, and unkind, feigning submission, yet resolved to have his own way, persuaded me to step into his cab to speak to him, and then, in spite of my prayers and screams, carried me away. What now becomes of my fair fame? The cook has no idea who he is; to her he seemed to be a foreigner. His parents will believe me faithless, false, even to him. But it was vain. I would not agree to a marriage which would cause him to be disinherited, ruined, disgraced. He took me to some fine place, all crimson velvet and gold, looking-glasses everywhere—a fashionable hotel, I believe; but while he went to order something, I slipped out, rushed down the grand, brilliantly-lighted stairs, across the marble hall, out at the glass doors, and found myself alone in the streets, a heavy rain falling, thinly clad, frightened; but I have escaped the temptation of yielding to his entreaties, and those of my own too yielding, too devoted heart! I will not bring on him his mother's curse. How I came here I know not; but I rushed on, without heeding or caring which way I went—all ways are the same to me. At length, after insults, at the memory of which my blood boils, and sufferings and terrors of every kind, I found myself at this door. A card announced a room to let; and I knocked. A kind creature, motherly, clean, and trusting, took me in; and now I may be able to maintain myself, like a heroine of romance, by the sale of needlework or drawings, or by teaching. I have some few pounds in my purse, and a basket with some necessities, which the cook at Goff House—of course, by Walter's desire—thrust after me into the cab in which he bore me away. At any rate, I have seen him; I see he loves me still. He says his mother believes him cured of his passion for me; and is busy with her efforts to get him into the army. He let out, too, that his wily friend, Evermore, was at the bottom of this plan for carrying me off. I cannot like that man. I think his influence over Walter is a bad influence. He seems to me to be the evil genius of my darling.

"Christmas-day.—How lone I feel! but I have hopes of employment. I have an order, through my kind hostess, to paint a pair of screens.

"I fear I am tracked. I went to church on Christmas-day; and in the evening two gentlemen called to see the lodgings. They gave no names; but I fancied, as I locked myself in my little room, I recognised the voices of my Walter and Mr. Evermore.

"Feb.—They have found me out. Walter has been with me. How ill he looks! He says he is dying; that unless I marry him he shall die—a private and clandestine marriage, he says; it cannot be known. I am supposed to have eloped with a foreigner. Evermore will manage it all. He says, as for his parents, unless I consent, they shall have no son, and that that is even worse than a disinherited one. Where can I go? What can I do? I was peaceful, if not happy, here. And that good, pious Christian, Jem Goodman, had spoken words of such comfort to my soul! What virtue there is in humble life! What noble, generous qualities adorn the very poor! How gentle and liberal and kind are these Trudges! How they watch over and care for me! When I compare their delicate regard for my feelings with the cruel, haughty suspicions and heartless tyranny of my lady, how I bless the poor!

"'Tis done: the unequal combat is over. I have consented. To-morrow I am to swear before God's altar to forsake all others, and keep me only unto him, so long as we both shall live. They have arranged all, settled all, managed all. Under a feigned name, in a deserted, dark little church, in Surrey, in secret, in trouble, but yet in a tumult of wild love and joy, he will make me his!

"I must have been more or less than woman to have resisted longer. Pity, pardon, and support me, Father of the orphan! I fear they will use many deceptions—they will misrepresent my age, my condition. Mr. Evermore seems to me to love lies far better than the truth. He rubs his hands! he is in ecstasies! Why should he be so glad! I could grow sick with fear, and weep my eyes out, but that Walter's honest joy and deep love dance in his eyes. How happy, how tender, how devoted he is! Why cannot I be as thoughtless of the future, as delighted in the present!"

Here the young girl's MS. ended. When it was recommenced, she was a wife; at first, wildly, intensely happy; then, by degrees, were traces of remorse, anxiety, jealousy, distrust of one whom she called Walter's evil genius. At last, a few lines, blotted with tears, announced that Walter had obtained a commission, and that his regiment was ordered abroad. With the wretched words—"I have not a hope or a joy left on earth. What becomes of me! Yes; he is gone; and I am desolate"—ended this sad, heart-rending record of the trials of an orphan beauty, companion to a fine lady, Hope's innocent, but miserable mother.

CHAPTER CXXII.

You are as fond of grief as of your son.

Grief fills the room up of my absent son;
Lies in his bed, walks up and down with me,
Stuffs out his vacant garments with his form;
Then have I reason to be fond of grief.

SHAKESPEARE.

The impression left on Hope's mind, by this simple record of a mother's sorrows, was extremely painful and depressing.

Then, too, the scene before her was not calculated to cheer or solace her dejected, anxious spirit.

There, on her rich and tasteful bed, lay the bereaved mother, in the deep trance-like sleep, caused by a strong opiate, administered for the first time. But the anguish she had endured was legible on her fine features.

Intimately as Hope had for years been associated with Lady Glenlonely, she had never before been present at her toilet. She had no idea of the arts that were invoked to rejuvenise the belle of a past generation.

It was a shock, and a very painful one, to delicate, true-hearted, loyal Hope, to be compelled to violate the sanctuary of the cosmetic powers, to intrude into the arcana of so many mysteries.

Poor Lady Glenlonely! in her agony of despair she had torn off the delicate fabric of lace and ribbon, and from her hot head the soft tresses, borrowed from indigent beauty; and there, almost witch-like, streamed over her pillow the snow-white locks, of whose existence Hope had never dreamed. There was no delicate peach or pearl powder now upon that pallid face; dark arches went round the hollow eyes; the fine black arch of the eyebrow was gone. Hope saw that a few gray hairs were all the eyebrow Lady Glenlonely really possessed, and she felt like a guilty, treacherous thing, for having involuntarily become possessed of these secrets. Still she had never felt half the affection for her poor lady when "made up" into blooming middle-aged beauty, as she did for that old looking, picturesque, and almost weird woman, moaning in her deep sleep, and whose waking would be so terrible.

Hot and fast dropped Hope's tears as she gazed on the bereaved mother, whom she loved so much better than she had ever done the fine lady! The morning looked in cold and gray, and Hope still watched, and Lady Glenlonely still slept and moaned. Hope was very cold, and felt very sick at heart, chill, and desolate. The fire was burnt almost out; and Hope, numbed and trembling, rose and determined to go to a little room at the end of a passage, in which wood, and other combustibles, were kept, in order to procure the means of renovating the dying embers. This closet, which had once been a dressing-room, had a window which looked on a back entrance. The curtain was partly undrawn, and as the window looked towards the east, Hope stood for a few minutes entranced at the sight of the sun rising from a canopy of purple crimson and gold. It was long since she had seen the sun rise, and in the Highlands never.

The exquisite freshness of the heather-scented air seemed to refresh her spirit, and she inhaled it with ecstatic delight, which recalled early wanderings in the dear long ago, as she with Larky Grigg, when on some holiday she would wake at four, and dress her little self with great speed, and went out with Larky hand in hand; and Mr. Trudge would give them a lift in his cart which carried vegetables, fruit, and flowers into the suburbs; and Larky and Hope, each with a large apple and a crust of bread, would find themselves on Clapham Common or Hampstead Heath, wild with delight—glad as the lark they roused with their glee, and rosy as the morning they loved to meet face to face.

Yes; very early morning had an ineffable charm for Hope; and its cool, fresh breezes always brought to her mind the love of Larky Grigg. But while Hope was inhaling, with almost gasping emotion, this elixir of the young, this first breath of Aurora, she suddenly perceived, on the plot of dewy grass that lay below, a shadow, a lengthening shadow, of a man; and drawing back behind the curtain, she perceived that it was the shadow of Captain Greville, and that he was hastening to the gate, at which stood a tall form, enveloped in a mantle, evidently awaiting him. For one moment the light of the rising sun fell on the stranger's face; and Hope shuddered—she knew not why; for it was a very handsome, pale face, of a man scarcely middle-aged; but it struck her that there was such a serpent-glitter in the eye, such a cold sneer in the downcast curve of the nostril of the handsome nose, and such a cat-like expression of resolute cruelty in the grim smile, which disclosed a whole set of glittering white teeth, all of them pointed like eye-teeth. Then, too, the hand that clutched the ample Spanish mantle, and that which pulled down over the low brow—receding above, where reflection predominates, but very full where perception dwells—those hands, ungloved, and very white, had something claw-like in their long, meagre shape; and Hope thought of harpies, ghouls, and vampires, as she noted them.

Quietly Captain Greville unlocked the gate and passed out, and Hope saw him, arm and arm with the mysterious stranger, turn into a wood that skirted the garden.

So still, as yet, was the whole scene, she could hear their rapid steps among the rustling leaves, and the low tone of the stranger in anger, and of Captain Greville in apology and in deprecation.

Hope listened with changing colour and beating heart, and yet she scarce knew why. What was it to her that some friend of Captain Greville's should call to take a morning walk with him? What could either of them be to her?

She asked herself this again and again; and yet the face and figure of the stranger haunted her spirit and froze her blood. However, she recollected, when she could hear their steps and voices no more, that her object in coming there was to get fuel for Lady Glenlonely's expiring fire. She filled a basket with wood and shavings, and she soon (for Hope, in dear old times, had been a great hand at a fire) built up and kindled a noble pile of wood and coal; and then, wrapping herself up in a warm cloak, and taking the pillows from the sofa and throwing them on the rug before this noble blaze, poor Hope soon became warm and comfortable, and fell fast asleep.

Poor Lady Glenlonely's waking hour came at last! It was, as all had anticipated that it would be, terrible to behold!

Her maternal anguish knew no bounds.

Constance's agony, when she loses her Arthur, was less dreadful than this.

Reason for a time gave way; and it was a merciful dispensation that it did so!

Sometimes the poor mother was so violent that her own safety and that of all around her rendered restraint quite necessary; although that necessity wrung tears from Lord Glenlonely, and sent Hope into the wildest bursts of sorrow.

"Anon, as patient as the brooding dove,

When that her golden couplets are disclosed," she would sit with fixed eyes and clasped hands, and talk to her Walter, her Eaglescliffe, her boy!

For some time everything gave way to this sad trial. Hope, Nussy, Doun, Greville, and poor Lord Glenlonely himself, were up all night. Doctors and nurses—though there were enough and to spare—gave way to these zealous amateurs; but they knew well how it would be. They had seen such watchers before; they knew the nurses would wear themselves out by their overzeal, and that, like the lights at a theatre, and the ministers when out of favour with the people, they would all go out together. And so it proved: before the week was half over, all the amateur nurses were quite knocked up. Doun dropped asleep directly he sat down; Greville was more dead than alive; Nussy looked like a spectre, and behaved like one, too; Lord Glenlonely was attacked by gout; and though it was evident to all that she must soon give in, and take to her bed.

"Hope, the charmer, lingered still behind,"

A first-rate London physician, who had made mental maladies his study, was sent for; and he decided that none of those amateur nurses must approach the patient.

He wished to remove her to his own "Retreat," in the suburbs; but Lord Glenlonely would not consent, and so he decided on sending nurses, or rather keepers, of his own to carry out the plan he determined to act upon; and it was decided that for the present her ladyship should remain at Burnside.

Under these circumstances, the Marquis of Doun felt compelled reluctantly to take his leave; and Captain Greville was obliged to do the same. Nussy, too, had no excuse for lingering longer; and now Greville was gone, she had, in fact, no desire to do so. Her modish preceptress was going to winter in Paris, and Nussy availed herself of the opportunity of joining her there.

(To be concluded in our next.)

AGE OF THE WORLD.

THAT learned and accurate chronologer, Mr. Clinton (author of the "Fasti Hellenici," "Romani," &c), continued to the last firmly to believe that "in 1851, our world's age was approximately within fifteen or sixteen years of its six thousandth year from the creation of man;" in other words, that in the year 1866 the world would be 6,000 years old. Mr. Clinton never attempted to adjust matters with the extreme nicety of Archbishop Usher, who begins his famous "Annales" with the statement that the creation of the world and the march of time began "early in the evening which preceded the 23rd of October, in the year of the Julian Period 710, and B.C. 4004." Archbishop Usher was undoubtedly a great chronological genius and a man of vast and profound erudition, but how he reached the nice calculation that time began on the evening of the day which (if it had ever existed) would have been the 22nd October, five thousand eight hundred and sixty-two years ago this autumn, it would puzzle us to say, since he has not explained the process. Archbishop Usher and Mr. Clinton, it will be seen (both of whom based their opinions on independent and very careful observations), differed in their estimate of the world's age only to the extent of 130 years—the former making it 5862, the latter 5992 years old the present year—a surprising approximation to unanimity, especially when we recollect that for nearly the first half of time men were without written records, and that the art of adjusting and preserving dates was only slowly and at quite a recent period brought to perfection.

So short has been the duration of human history! For it is of course of the earth as the abode of man that we are now speaking. And even from that short period nearly one-third must be deducted as belonging to the history of human progress and development.

The Flood is computed to have occurred in the year of the world 1656. Almost all previous results of human thought and labour must have been buried forever by that tremendous calamity. Some traditions might have been preserved; and what strictly belonged to the moral development of humanity was undoubtedly kept alive. But art, science, philosophy, all the enterprises and works of man, when a lifetime reached almost a decade of centuries, must have utterly perished. Humanity must needs take a new start. The web of history must be woven anew from the naked warp. The complicated problem must be recommended from its simple factors. And then the first battle must be with the elements; the first tug to satisfy the stern exigencies of mere life. It would be a good while before men would have that security and leisure which is indispensable to thought and higher culture, to the recollection and preservation of the old and the invention of the new. And yet there is a curious fact to show how soon men were about it. When Alexander the Great took Babylon (about the year of the world, 3674), Callisthenes, one of the scientific corps attendant on the expedition, found in the tower of Belus calculations of eclipses for 1903 years preceding. This takes us back to within little more than a century after the Deluge—so soon did the aspiration after knowledge overpower the first wants and appetites of animal nature. So soon did men pass from watching and attending their flocks to watching and grouping the stars; and, for want of other books, to reading the starry volume, of which every night turned over a new page—an occupation, it must be allowed, to which nomadic life under the transparent atmosphere and cloudless skies of the Asiatic steppes is not unfavourable; and this, doubtless, suggests the true reason why astronomy got the start of the other sciences, and made more rapid progress among the simple post-diluvian shepherds than it is likely to make at our modern observatory.

Little more than forty centuries, then, can be allowed to make up the solidus dies, the real working-day of the world. Look at "the earth and man," in history and in their actual state, and you must allow that not much time has been lost. Within that period, man has explored the earth from the easternmost verge of Asia to the westernmost of America. He has penetrated almost to either pole. Scarce an islet of the sea which has been left unvisited or unpeopled. He has turned the mighty element which covers two-thirds of the globe into the means of abridging his labours, multiplying his comforts, and transporting him over ocean and continent. He has caught from the clouds the most terrific force of nature, and taught it to flash his thoughts over continents and under oceans with a speed only inferior to that of thought itself, and with a precision like that of intelligence. He has formed some two thousand languages and dialects. He has sounded the depths of the sea, on the verge of which he once trembled, and the yet profounder depths of his own mind. He has—but we must rehearse Universal History in order to tell of the arts, discoveries, sciences, institutions, monuments which perpetuate the memory of man's toils and sufferings upon earth in these forty centuries—a period scarcely exceeding four successive antediluvian lives! How vast his faculties! How restless his activity! How powerful the virtue of that primal blessing of the Father of men, "Be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth, and subdue it and have dominion." And as the last fifty years have witnessed a far more rapid development than any earlier period, who can forecast the future of Humanity?

NOTES OF WARNING.

[In former days, on a dangerous rock on the coast of Scotland, a deep-toned bell was so placed as to be rung by the motion of the waves. To this warning bell Mrs. Hemans alludes in the following lines.]

When the tide's billowy swell
Had reach'd its height,
Then toll'd the Rock's lone bell
Sternly at night.

Far over cliff and surge
Swept the deep sound,
Making each wild wind's dirge
Still more profound.

Yet that funeral tone
The sailor bless'd,
Steering through darkness on
With fearless breast.

E'en so may we, that float
On life's wide sea,
Welcome each warning note,
Stern though it be.

A STREET IN BARCELONA.

BARCELONA.—VII.

In a description of Barcelona the pig should on no account be left out. Young Spanish pig is a wonderful favourite, and the great pig-killing festival causes general excitement. Pigs are the lions of Barcelona on this particular occasion. There is an esplanade specially devoted to this solemn sacrifice—it may be half an acre or more, and thither, on the appointed morning the pigs—all black, a white pig would look like a ghost among them—are driven, by tens and fifties, to their fate. There, in the streets of Barcelona, do you meet these droves of pigs, pigs from all parts, pigs driven by picturesque-looking pig-drivers that Murillo might have painted, pigs and all. You may meet pigs in the streets of Barcelona on other occasions. Very often is a pig the subject of a raffle. He walks over the course to show his points, he is escorted with a drum and fife, and his tail is tied up with ribbons. All men give way to him. He is the hog of the walk. He is the biggest, fattest animal, his owner says so, ever put up in a raffle, or ever won in a lottery. He is a nut-fed pig, with the flavour of acorns sweetly in him. Who would not pay down his paesta for a chance of the whole hog?

But apart from the fact that pigs are always to be seen in Barcelona; that they are held in peculiar esteem, and with horses, cattle, &c., are duly blessed on the 17th day of January—apart from all this is the fact that pig's flesh is the only meat in the Peninsula which has any juice in it. A leg of mutton is not to be found; a joint of beef is like a joist of timber. You must eat the abomination of the faithful if you have any intention of staying in Spain. The choice is simple—that or nothing—and the first is preferable to the last in the estimation of most travellers. Another thing to be borne in mind is, that the soul and relish of everything is garlic. Garlic is in every dish; its scent is in every room, it tickles your olfactory organs everywhere, so that to become accustomed to the smell of garlic, and to eat pork with an appetite, are essential to your happiness at Barcelona. These are not to be guarded against. You must submit to them. You can't help it.

There are some things you can help. For instance, you need not ride in a Barcelona cab. Strictly speaking, these conveyances are two-wheeled carts, with a leather cover to keep off the sun and rain, and an entrance from behind like an omnibus. Sometimes they are drawn by a horse, generally by mules, and they rattle along at a smart pace, rather too smartly for a foreigner. For the carriage being well nigh destitute of springs, and the roads apparently never having been mended since the days of the Moors, the passenger is most unmercifully jolted.

Speaking of the coach stand in Barcelona, a recent visitor says:—

"There are so many carriages on the station that the drivers of them, besides furnishing a certain quota to sleep on their coach-boxes, and another to watch at the gate for passengers, lie about in such numbers as to cover half an acre of greensward. There they play at cards for coppers. They squeeze a bottle together or peel an onion. With sunlight and a paper cigar they seem perfectly happy. Every one takes care to be ready for business when his turn comes, but until that time he is as independent as a beggar. The sunny day is never too long for him. If without work, he talks and sings. He cracks his whip. He trades in horses. The sod is soft to his back; and with his bright eyes, he can even look the noonday sun in the face without winking. Curling himself up in his faithful cloak, he sleeps the hours away, if he happens to be an old stager; or wrapping it cavalierly around him, in case he is one of the youngsters, he plays the gallant to the damsels who pass the gate. He may not earn as much money as his brother of Paris or London, but, surely, his is no harder lot. He does not wear out either himself or his beast with too much work."

It is evident that the drivers are better off than the passengers—they are used to the jolting and don't mind it, but it is another matter with a foreigner. In the summer time the dust is wheel-rim deep; in the winter, the dust is turned into mud—and dashing wildly through either dust or mud is not agreeable.

By the way, the winter at Barcelona is of the shortest. Old Winter hurrying to the northern climes, just stops a fortnight and no longer, scatters a few snow-flakes once in a quarter of a century, and is off again, leaving Barcelona to perpetual sunshine for the rest of the year.

And now, before we take our final leave of Barcelona, suppose we saunter through the streets once more, and take a last look from the Muralla del Mar. In the Rambla we notice the principal hotels, the theatres, the cafés, the post-office, the library, the clubs, the reading-rooms, and the fruit and flower markets. Here we notice again the whitewasher in his picturesque gamboge; there the Catalonian peasantry decked in velvet, and all covered with tags and tassels; here again our heart is set on fire by the fair promenaders, whose humble devotees and slaves we are, for the time. But we pass the gate, and leave the town behind us. Here, after crossing the drawbridge, we find ourselves on the promenade of the Muralla de Tierra, a broad belt of green lying between the walls and the open country. This promenade encircles the city on all sides excepting that which looks towards the sea; and as the sun shines out upon it from a cloudless sky, turning to diamonds the dew-drops hanging on the grass, and to gold the broad fields of waving wheat beyond, there are few fairer prospects to be seen from the Pyrenees to Gibraltar. Shall we go to Gracio, to Monjuich, to the Cementirio, to the gardens of St. Beltran, to the fountains of Trobado? or shall we not rather—it being a holiday—make the best of our way to the Muralla del Mar, and pay our last respects to the beauty and fashion of Barcelona? Certainly; and here we are amid as gay a scene as was ever lighted by Catalonian sunshine. Now or never must your Spanish conquest be achieved. Throw your cloak gracefully over your shoulder; you have received the last touch and finish of Figaro's curling-irons; give your moustache one more twist, and you may pass for one of the nosotros, that is to say, of ourselves, the Spaniards.

The prospect commanded by the Muralla del Mar is exceedingly picturesque. The gorgeous scene reminds one of the best effects of Turner. Look at it in the early morning. Out at sea the horizon is a blaze of sunlight; in the harbour the ships have unfurled their sails to dry in the golden day; in all directions, the white, brown, and purple canvas is vividly in relief on the blue of the reposing waves. Directly before you is moored a large ship from the Levant, the sailors of which are climbing the shrouds in their picturesque but unsailor-like costume; near the landing-place a goodly number of red-capped boatmen are lying upon their oars, idling away in unconscious delight the sunny hours; porters in cool linen are piling high upon the wharf the yellow wheat from the Ebro; and boys wading for mussels about the rocks on the shore. Lean over the railing of the Muralla, and gaze long at this beautiful sea scene, where the sailor, no longer tempest-tost, or drifting upon the rock-bound shore, is lying safely at anchor in a peaceful haven, and pouring out in laugh and song the natural gaiety of a heart at ease.

'Tis best to have your last remembrance of any place you visit a happy one; and to have this 'tis well to take your last view—save and except your compulsory view on starting—from the best point. For this no place is better than the Muralla del Mar. On the one hand is as fair a sea-view as the eye ever beheld; on the other, the gaiety, bustle, and excitement of a fashionable promenade. So here we present a bouquet for the last time to the ladies, cast our last mite to the lazy beggar in the sun, and, with a pleasant recollection of the old town, bid farewell to Barcelona.

The Matron.

NO. XLVI.

In the last chapter I spoke of tight bodies as being fashionable; but some people who prefer their own taste to the fashion, may be glad to know how to make a nice full body. It should be made with a perfectly straight piece of material, 18 inches in width, and 20 in length (this half the front), gather the said material straight at the bottom, place it on a tight and well-fitting lining, and, having gauged or gathered it towards the waist, gather it at the shoulder. Be very exact with the gathers which you tack into a narrow waistband, and also with the upper gathers which are finished off in covered cording round the neck.

No. 1.

Supposing you have to put folds on a tight body, mind that these folds are either quite straight or decidedly on the cross. If they are neither one nor the other, they are sure to look ungraceful.

Jackets are still worn, though they are not so much in favour as they were. Suppose you undertake the making of one, mind you fit the jacket lining to the figure before you attempt cutting out the material. A jacket requires even more caution than a dress body. Some slight figures are shown off to advantage by loose-fitting jackets; but they are very unbecoming to stout people. Before leaving the subject of bodies, I must give you a useful hint never to trust to stiff whalebone to give the appearance of a good fit to your dress. The best dress-makers use the bone so thin that it bends to the outline of the figure. Of this, be convinced: that if the body does not fit well without the whalebone, it will not fit well with it.

No. 2.

No. 3.

I said I should refer to the subject of flounced skirts. Suppose you are making a dress with three flounces of different depths, let the bottom one be the fullest by three inches. The middle flounce and the uppermost one may have the degree of fulness we prescribed in the last chapter but one. Mind you halve and quarter your flounces, and do the same with the skirt for which the flounces are intended; this will save you a great deal of trouble. Tucks are advisable for children's dresses, because as they outgrow them, these tucks can be let down. I do not particularly recommend them for grown people—they take quite as much material as flounces, and have less effect.

To be successful in dressmaking, you should know a few rules about the best manner of putting on trimmings. If for the front of your dress and on the cross, you should cut the trimmings in much the same manner as flounces. It is a good plan to cut a piece of paper the length of the skirt, to pin it on, according to your plan of trimming, and, guided by the paper, tack a pattern for the trimming. In fact, you should have tackings wherever you mean to trim, and this tacking is most easily done after placing the skirt on the cutting-out board. It is very seldom we have to complain of things being done too well, but in trimmings inexperienced dress-makers are very apt to put too much good work in sewing them. Light work is best for trimmings. Avoid such stitches as you would apply to under-clothing. But at the same time put on the trimmings securely, and (another thing of great importance) put them on evenly.

Those who succeed in trimming, have generally a taste for millinery, and millinery is almost as useful an art for wives and mothers as dressmaking. I shall give some general remarks on the subject of caps, &c., in next number. In the meantime, I offer my readers four pretty illustrations of these articles. They are intended to be worn by young, not middle-aged or elderly, ladies.

The caps, Nos. 1 and 2, are for morning wear, but the dress-sleeve in No. 3 is for a festive occasion, and the wreath, No. 4, is intended for a bride, as the pendent veil indicates. The sleeve is composed principally of silk tulle. The first puff is merely ornamented with white satin ribbon; the second is crossed with the same—namely, white satin ribbon. The bridal wreath is, of course, of orange flower. The nature of the lace composing the veil must depend on the circumstances of the bride. Ladies of the higher classes generally select Brussels lace, but our English imitations rival in beauty the rich laces of the continent, and we recommend them to all who are anxious to be economical.

THE SLIGHTED SCHOLAR.

CASES like the one I am about to relate are much too frequent; and they are such, too, as should be guarded against by all who have an interest in education. The incident was brought to mind by hearing a complaint made by the parent of a poor boy, who had been grossly neglected by the master of the village-school,—neglected simply because he was poor and comparatively friendless!

Many years ago, when I was but a small boy, I attended school in the town of M—. Among the scholars, there was a boy named George Henry. His father was a poor, drinking man, and the unfortunate boy had to suffer in consequence. George came to school habited in ragged garments—but they were the best he had; he was rough and uncouth in his manners, for he had been brought up in that way; he was very ignorant, for he had never had opportunity for education.

Season after season, poor George Henry occupied the same seat in the school-room,—it was a back corner seat, away from the other scholars,—and there he thumbed his tattered primer. The ragged condition of his garb gave a homely cast to his whole appearance; and what of intelligence there might have been in his countenance was beclouded by the "outer covering" of the boy. He seldom played with the other children, for they seemed to shun him; but when he did, for a while, join with them in their sports, he was so rough, that he was soon shoved off out of the way.

The master passed the poor boy coldly by in the street, while other boys in better garbs were kindly noticed. In the school, young Henry was equally coldly treated. The teacher neglected him, and then called him an "idle blockhead," because he did not learn. The boy received no incentive to study, and, consequently, he was most of the time idle, and idleness begat a disposition to while away the time in mischief. For this he was whipped, and the more he was whipped, the more idle and careless he became. He knew that he was neglected by the teacher simply because he was poor, and ragged, and with a sort of sullen indifference, sharpened at times by feelings of bitterness, he plodded on in his dark, thankless way.

Thus matters went on for several years. Most of the scholars who were of George Henry's age had passed on to the higher branches of study, while he, poor fellow, still spelled out short words of one and two syllables, and still kept his distant seat in the corner. His father had sunk lower in the pit of inebriation, and the unfortunate boy was more wretched than ever. The look of clownish indifference which had marked his countenance, was giving way to a shade of unhappy thought and feeling, and it was evident that the great crisis of his life was at hand. He stood now upon the step in life from which the fate of after years must take its cast.

At this time a man by the name of Kelly took charge of the school. He was an old teacher, a careful observer of human nature, and a really good man. Long years of guardianship over wild youths had given him a blunt, authoritative way, and in his discipline he was strict and unwavering. The first day he passed in the teacher's desk of our school was mostly devoted to watching the movements of the scholars, and studying the dispositions with which he had to deal. Upon George Henry his eye rested with a keen, searching glance. But he evidently made little of him during the first day, but on the second, he did more. It was during the afternoon of the second day that Mr. Kelly observed young Henry engaged in impaling flies upon the point of a large pin. He went to the boy's seat, and after reprimanding him for his idleness, he took up the dirty, tattered primer from his desk.

"Have you never learned more than is in this book?" asked the master.

"No, sir," drawled George.

"How long have you attended school?"

"I don't know, sir. It's ever since I can remember."

"Then you must be an idle, reckless boy," said the teacher, with much severity. "Do you realise how many years you have thrown away? Do you know how much you have lost? What sort of a

SOME persons, with apparent zeal, vindicate their friends from all their little peccadilloes, whitewash them very carefully, and then knock them on the head by lamenting their addiction to some gross impropriety. They are somewhat like the Roman priests, who, when an ox was not completely white, chalked over the dark spots, and, leading him up to the altar, dispatched him with a blow.

GOLD is an idol, worshipped in all climates without a single temple, and by all classes, without a single hypocrite.

SOME writers think they ought to have the favourable regard of posterity because they bestow a great deal of labour upon their works. But, if hardships are a good title to immortality, it often belongs much less to the writer than to the reader.

EXCELSIOR.—Your Problem, although creditable as a first attempt, is much below our standard of merit. We are much gratified at the laudatory tone of your letter.

E. R. B.—Your solution of Problem No. 69 is correct, but you fail in Problem No. 70.

EXON.—Your letter is highly gratifying to us. We shall always feel much pleasure in answering your inquiries.

H. WALLING.—The games sent shall be reported upon at the earliest opportunity.

CORNISHMAN.—Your suggestions, for which we desire to thank you, shall receive attention.

W. B. B.—Problem No. 1 is very easy. No. 2 can be solved in three moves by commencing with Kt to Q Kt 4.

J. PALMER.—We have communicated your challenge to the gentleman named by you.

BROOKLET OF OUR JOYS.

"The brook of the willows."—ISAIAH XV. 7.

With a pleasant, murmuring noise,
Glides the brooklet of our joys,
Sparkling in the sunlight sheen,
Fring'd with flowers and fleck'd with green;
Yet its beauteous banks along,
Here and there, with fibres strong
Still the tree of weeping droopeth,
And to kiss its forehead stoopeth.

Early Spring the current swells,
Brimming o'er in crystal wells;
Sultry Summer checks its flow,
Brooks decrease—but willows grow.

NOW READY, PRICE SIXPENCE,
CASSELL'S
ILLUSTRATED ALMANACK
For 1859.

This Beautifully Illustrated and Instructive Almanack, which has now obtained celebrity wherever the English language is spoken, will this year be found to surpass, if possible, its previous attractiveness. It will contain upwards of Thirty Engravings, the subjects as follow:—Twelve engravings representing the modes of Repast in various Nations and Periods;—Twelve engravings representing important events of the year 1858, including the Capture of Delhi—Storming of Lucknow—Bombardment of Canton—Earthquake in Naples—Burial of the Queen of Oude—the Leviathan off Deptford—Inauguration of the Boulevard de Sebastopol—Arrival of the Queen at Cherbourg—Launch of the Ville de Nantes—Fort Napoleon in Kabylia—Her Majesty's arrival at the Town Hall, Leeds—Removal of the decorations, fountain, &c., in the Place du Châtelet. Four emblematical designs of the Seasons;—Astronomical illustrations, &c., &c. The Literary matter, in addition to explanations of the above Engravings, consists of the Calendar, richly stored with historical remembrances; Chronology; Obituary; Abstracts of Acts of Parliament; Important Statistics; Postal Regulations; Stamps and Taxes; Gardening Calendar; the Government; Royal Family; Houses of Lords and Commons, and other matters, interesting to all branches of the community.

N. B. Orders should be given at once to the nearest Bookseller, as delays, consequent upon the large circulation, have unavoidably occurred in the delivery of the two last years' issues.

L. JONES.—The Prince of Prussia, who, in accordance with the laws of the constitution, has succeeded to the regency, is the father-in-law of our Princess Royal, Princess Frederick William, by marriage. We believe it is softening of the brain that occasions the mental incapacity of the King of Prussia. Your request that we will give our opinion of the real character of the King of Prussia before his mind became affected, imposes on us rather a difficult task. An irresolute man can neither be called good nor bad, but his sway is generally very injurious to his subjects. The king was full of noble impulses, but he had not strength of will to carry his good intentions into effect. Though glowing with patriotism, he diminished the influence of Prussia. Though he was a lover of peace, he protracted the Russian war through his want of courage to take the side which he knew was the right one. Thus, he brought down upon himself the contempt of Europe. Again, it was his earnest desire to see his country free; he granted her liberty, and then, alarmed at his own deed, he withdrew the gift. May his brother, the present regent, display the good qualities without the weakness of King Frederick William. He assumes power in less troublous times than those which distracted, and perhaps weakened, the mind of his unhappy brother. Let us trust that, warned in time, he will act on the conviction that irresolution is the worst fault a ruler can have, and that it is not so much the wicked as the weak monarchs that bring upon their subjects the greatest calamities.

STEPHEN R.—After Lord Elgin had procured for this country, and through this country for the world, an advantageous treaty with the Emperor of China, the Cantonese chose to continue the war on their own account. Actually the "Sun-Kum," an illegal tribunal, and great mandarins (taking advantage of Lord Elgin's absence on a mission to Japan), have been offering rewards for the heads of Englishmen, and been threatening with vengeance and death all Chinese who may continue in the domestic employ of British subjects, or who may supply the colony of Hong Kong with provisions. Urged by the British residents in Hong Kong, who are threatened with starvation, Sir John Bowring (governor during Lord Elgin's absence) has issued a proclamation threatening the "Sun-Kum" with vengeance. But proclamations seldom avail when traitors and murderers have to be dealt with; and as a protection to the lives of our fellow-subjects, we have reason to expect that Lord Elgin and Sir Michael Seymour will soon return to Canton with a force sufficiently strong to prove to the "Sun-Kum," the mandarins, and other rebels, that, although they may trifle with the authority of their own government, they cannot safely trifle with the majesty of Great Britain.

NINA.—We can easily understand how anxiously you and all your friends look out for news respecting the condition of the transatlantic telegraph. Strange to say, even in its defective state, it is capable of conveying messages from Newfoundland when under the influence of extraordinary and peculiar battery power. This, however, though encouraging, must not be regarded as a permanent state of things. There is a serious fault in the cable, and at present all efforts, to bring it into perfect working order (on our side at least), are fraught with danger to the cable. But you and your friends must hope for the best, and recollecting the almost boundless powers of science, look forward to the welcome news that the cause of the fault has been discovered and the remedy applied.

W. W.—So you have been reading the newspaper, and met with the word "fait accompli." You wish to know the meaning of the expression. Literally, "un fait accompli" is an accomplished fact. Thus: the suppression of the Indian mutiny is "un fait accompli,"—a thing actually done or accomplished; for, although some vitality may still exist here and there in this never-to-be-forgotten rebellion, it is speedily met and crushed by our brave generals and men; and although Nana Sahib is not yet taken, and Tantia Toopee, another insurgent leader, has displayed marvellous military talent, we may rest assured that peace will soon be restored, together with the thorough establishment of our authority in India, and the extinction of the last sparks of this once mighty conflagration.

OLYMPIE.—In order to preserve your plants throughout the winter, recollect the following rules. Let your plants have plenty of air and light, but do not keep them standing in a powerful draught. Do not expose them to a frosty air, and in severe cold; instead of stirring out the fire in the room in which you keep them, leave a little in the grate on retiring to rest, but mind you put up the guard for security's sake. Only apply a small quantity of water at a time, and let this, if possible, be rain, or river water. If you have nothing but spring water, expose it for a day to the influence of the air or the sun before watering your plants with it.

CURIOS.—We believe it is a mistake to suppose that Vauxhall was named after Fawkes, or Guy Fawkes. It more probably took its name from one Jane Vaux, or Fawkes, mentioned in the history of Lambeth as holding a copyhold tenement in Vauxhall in 1615. Guy, or Guido Fawkes, was not likely at any time of his career to have possessed a hall or mansion. Contemporary history does not lead us to suppose that Guy Fawkes (one of the principal actors in the gunpowder plot, who conspired to overthrow James I. and his government) was a mercenary ruffian. He seems rather to have been an enthusiast, in whose mind fanaticism had obscured the perception of right and wrong. It was on November 5th, 1605, that the dreadful plot was discovered. Had it not been for "a remorse of friendship" experienced by Sir Henry Percy, who, by a letter, warned his friend, Lord Mountague, of his danger, the plot would have succeeded.

G. W. and N. L. are both suffering from evils usually called imaginary evils; but as they occasion much real suffering, they are as deserving of pity as more ostensible calamities. There is one cheering feature in the case of our correspondents; they have the good sense to reveal their sufferings, and not to let them prey on their own hearts in silence. Sorrow, apparently groundless, is generally caused by some latent indisposition of body. We recommend "G. W. and N. L." to consult some kind, judicious medical man, and frankly to confide to him the state of their feelings. We think it very likely he may discover the cause of their sufferings, and suggest a remedy.

HENRIETTA and NANCY.—Henrietta's communication begins thus:—"Henrietta, an amiable and beautiful young lady, 22 years of age." This manner of speaking of oneself does not evince an humble, teachable spirit, and we think our advice is more likely to find a patient hearing from "Nancy," so we turn to her. Her verses on "Home" are pretty, and we thank her for them, although we do not think them quite good enough for publication. We consider that the want of religious feeling in her sutor is a much more serious objection than his age, for we do not call forty, old.

NETA ALBERTA.—For dyeing ribbons of a light blue colour, we recommend you to purchase a bottle of "blue dye," as oil and colourmen call it, and proceed according to the rules already given. The said blue dye, mixed with turmeric, produces a green dye, which you may apply to the gloves according to the directions for dyeing gloves purple. But, in order to procure what you wish for, viz., a variety of colours, we have more confidence in the following receipt, which dyes gloves of a York tan. Put some saffron into a pint of boiling water (mind it is soft water), and leave the saffron in the water all night. Next morning wet the gloves with the dye, applying it with a brush, but recollect to tack the tops of the gloves together, to prevent the dye from getting inside. Having refused one gentleman, you cannot, according to the laws of etiquette, dance with another. A young lady's neglect of these laws may lead to dangerous quarrels between gentlemen. Both "Agnetta" and others of our readers must forgive our firmly declining all private correspondence. The constant and imperative nature of our avocations renders private correspondence with our readers impossible, and we must beg that no postage stamps will be sent with a view to receive a written answer.

GEORGE.—Be ever on the watch, and we do not doubt an opportunity will present itself. Perhaps your parents know more about the young person than you do yourself. It is not likely they would wantonly stand in the way of your happiness. H. L.—We think, under the circumstances, the invitation should be in the singular number, viz., "Mr. B. presents his compliments," &c. We consider the expression, party, the most fashionable, but home, the most friendly. A SOLDIER.—As a "Lance Corporal" and an educated man, you are so much better off than many of your cloth, that we think you are justified in following your inclinations and marrying the young girl. A SEAMAN.—Write once again, and give her another chance.

A PLAIN GIRL.—By eating plenty of fresh vegetables you may check the scurvy, and by taking enough air and exercise you may give bloom to your complexion. MIKE SILEX had better drop the acquaintance of the lady gradually; and A SLIGHTED ONE will do well to pursue a similar plan with the gentleman. SILLY FANNY and POLLY must clearly see that if they cannot polish the beaux of Stourpool, we are quite inadequate to the task. ONE IN A DILEMMA.—You may accept the offer of the man for whom you feel only an affectionate esteem, provided you entertain no passionate love for any other.

ALICE BELL has reason to suppose herself preferred. We recommend the farmer to the choice of AN UNDESIDED ONE, provided both suitors are equally steady. C. GRUBO BACH appears to us to be a young man whose love would stand the test of a long engagement; and as his circumstances do not allow of his marrying, we think this engagement would conduce to his happiness, provided the young lady's parents do not object to it.

A YOUNG CABINET-MAKER, J. W., AND S. R. B.—To make French polish: Dissolve one pound of pale shell-lac, and two ounces of mastic, in one quart of spirits of wine of 90 degrees strength. Make it in the cold, by frequently stirring or shaking the ingredients together in a well-closed bottle. To use French polish: finish off the article to be polished as smoothly as possible with glass-paper—first with fine, and then with the finest. Make a rubber of thick woollen cloth, in narrow strips (or list): apply some varnish from the mouth of the bottle to the middle of the rubber, and inclose it in a soft linen cloth, doubling over the outside, so as to form a sort of handle. Moisten the face of the linen with a little raw linseed oil, applied with the finger to the middle of it. Place your work opposite the light; pass the rubber quickly and lightly over its surface, until the varnish becomes nearly dry; again charge the rubber with varnish, omitting the oil, and repeat the rubbing, until three coats are laid on. Repeat till there is sufficient thickness of varnish; then wet the linen cloth with a little oil and spirits of wine, without varnish, and rub as before till dry.

R. MARKHAM.—The distance from London to New York across the Atlantic is usually estimated at 3,000 miles.

A MOTHER.—We are not matrimonial advisers. STUBBS.—If you wish to terminate the affair, return the presents at once. FANNY.—That which will remove the hair from your face, is very likely to do injury to your skin. J. MAE.—Your writing betrays your youth; mustaches will come in due time. PETER M.—The subjects about which you inquire, are of a class on which we decline giving advice. ADOLPHUS.—You are unwise to stop the growth of your hair. A CONSTANT READER.—Apply to the nearest stationer or bookseller. A LLOYD.—Mix flower of malt with some butter, and add thereto a drop or two of oil of aniseed; make it into balls, and bait your trap with it. This will be sure to attract the rats. DELTA.—You will find an answer as to the model copy-books, in No. 50. D. SLATTER and LARRY GRIGG.—We have given directions for the removal of warts again and again: see No. 49. PETER MANGLES.—Cod liver oil is not a suitable hair-oil. J. M.—The office of Lord Great Chamberlain is one of great antiquity, but the precise date is not known. Lord Willoughby D'Eresby holds the office at present. A CONSTANT READER.—Soy-sauce is prepared from a small bean, the fruit of the Saja hispida. You will hardly be able to manufacture it yourself. W. S.—The colours usually sold in cakes will answer your purpose for painting portraits in water-colours; or you may purchase the colours in powders, and mix them carefully with weak gum-water.

JUVENIS.—"Juvenis" is a very happy youth. He has seldom suffered from illness; his parents are indulgent, and have allowed him to follow his own inclinations in the choice of a business; but, in spite of all this, he is sometimes saddened by the thoughts of old age, and of death; and he wishes to know how he can banish these thoughts. We do not advise "Juvenis" to banish them. Let them serve as monitors, and as checks in the hour of temptation. The thought of the future ought not to sadden, but to sober, the feelings of the young. For the benefit of "Juvenis" we will quote a few lines of a little poem, in the form of a dialogue between a young and an old man, which run thus:—

"You are old, Father William," the young man said,
"The few hairs that are left you are gray;
You are healthy and happy, a hale old man;
Now what is the reason, I pray?"
"In the days of my youth," Father William replied,
"I remembered that youth would not last;
I thought of the future, whatever I did,
That I never might mourn for the past."

Let "Juvenis" follow William's example, and he will not be made miserable by the thoughts of life's decline; and let him remember, that the difference between a happy and a miserable old age consists in this, the one is sweetened by hope, the other is embittered by regret.

MACULLAN P.—Admirable lessons in chemistry (organic and inorganic) and geology are included in the volume of "Cassell's Educational Course," entitled "Science popularly Explained." You can obtain the other work you name either in volumes, parts, or numbers.

ALLEN.—If you wish for very beautiful red ink, dissolve twelve grains of pure carmine in three ounces of water of ammonia, adding eighteen grains of powdered gum arabic.

BRAVE JACK.—Take a little weak aquafortis or oxalic acid, and rub the stains on your desk with a piece of cork dipped in it, till the colour is restored; wash it immediately with water, and then dry and polish as usual.

OLD ROBIN GRAY.—You will not be able to get the marks out of your skin. You can have the "Illustrated Almanack for 1859" by sending seven postage stamps to the publisher.

A TRUE LOVER.—Unless the young lady was an old acquaintance, we think, with your mother, that the step she took was a bold one; in fact, quite at variance with that modest dignity we so much admire in the fair sex. JESSIE FAIRBAIRN.—In this important affair be guided by the advice of your nearest relatives and most tried friends. TYRELL.—If the young lady is not a decided coquette, she has what is called in Scotland a "bee in her bonnet"; in either case you are lucky to escape her. As to the return of the presents you have made her, the law of the land does not enforce it; so you had better think no more about them.

A FAITHFUL SUBSCRIBER.—You must have received an imperfect copy of No. 64 of the "Educational Course," as that number includes title-page, contents, &c. If you send three penny stamps we will furnish you with a complete number by return of post.

A CONSTANT READER.—Why should you be in "great suspense" about so plain a matter? By all means complete the engagement at once.

* Several of our correspondents who have written at various times for information upon South Africa, will be pleased to learn that a very nice volume, containing much useful information upon this interesting country, has been issued by Messrs. Ward and Lock, under the title of "Narratives and Adventures of Travellers in South Africa." It is published at 5s., and is well illustrated. It has, also, an excellent map. It is a volume which we can highly recommend.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER CIX.

The law is past depth
To those that, without heed, do plunge into it.
SHAKESPEARE.

THERE is one institution in the country which few characters, however resolute, incline to brave, for it is armed with a power more iron than despotism—public opinion sometimes tempers that—unyielding as the granite, hard as the age in which it was founded; an institution against which time has fluttered its battered wings in vain, from which reform shrinks back, palsied by its cold impassibility.

There is nothing human about it, although presided over and put in motion by human beings. Built upon precedent, it is itself the slave of precedent, in whose chains even its judges are bound.

Could tears have melted it, it must have been washed away long since; could curses have appalled it, the thousand imprecations uttered in exile, poverty, the madhouse, and the gaol, would have startled it from the icy complacency with which it regards its work. It is a machine which those who have set it in motion know not how to stop.

We need scarcely say that we allude to the Court of Chancery.

Powerful as were the reasons of Lady Boothroyd for wishing Alice to withhold her evidence, she found herself compelled to yield; not one of the gentlemen of the long robe whom she consulted could point out a means of avoiding it. All her suggestions were met by that terrible word—"contempt."

A man may treat parliament with contempt—in its greatness it rarely condescends to notice him; the church with contempt—in its charity it forgives him. Even royalty may be treated with contempt, and no very serious consequences follow. But woe to the desperate wretch who falls into a similar error with Chancery! Flight is his only safety. England has no longer a home for him, except in her prisons. The respect exacted by the inquisition was not more jealously guarded. In fact, so susceptible is the court upon this point, that even ignorance is not held to be an excuse. The crime may be committed unwittingly in one's sleep.

This is no overdrawn picture. Many persons have languished years in prison for not putting in a reply to a bill, in which they had neither contingent nor present interest, or for neglecting to obey an order they did not comprehend.

That is one form of contempt.

A still more serious one is refusing to give evidence when duly cited. It would require a vast amount of expenditure, as well as time and punishment, to purge the offender of that—a fact which her advisers succeeded at last in impressing on the mind of their client, who, as her daughter was a minor, would be held legally responsible for her absence.

PETER MANGLES AT THE GRAVE OF CARUS THE MURDERER.

The consequence was that Alice appeared before the commissioners appointed to take evidence, and related the scene she had witnessed in the old pavilion in Meldown Park.

Lillian and her friends were already in court when Lady Boothroyd and her daughter made their appearance. By a singular coincidence, both the cousins were dressed in black; and the ambitious mother had the mortification of hearing the remark, "How like they are!" from those hangers-on of Providence—the junior briefless members of the bar.

"Put down your veil," she whispered to Alice, who, in obeying her command, seized the occasion of exchanging a smile with Lillian; a very improper thing, no doubt, and only to be pardoned on account of its rarity.

Few persons smile in chancery.

It would be an ungrateful return to our readers, for the interest they have shown in the fortunes of our heroine, if in the last number of "Smiles and Tears" we were to enter into all the dry details of a court of equity; added to which there is another consideration, we doubt whether in that case the present number would prove the last—a suit in chancery resembling, in some respect, the famous sea-serpent, whose head and tail are rarely seen at the same time.

The petition of the plaintiff had been ably drawn. The means employed by Lady Boothroyd to destroy all trace of her existence; the abduction from St. Faith's by Mark Rayner and his wife; the means used to overcome their scruples; the placing her with Mike; the exchange of children with Fiddler Dick; her supposed death, and subsequent adventures in India—step by step, each scene in the drama was minutely traced.

The reading of the petition was followed by that of the affidavits in support of the allegations it contained.

All who heard them felt assured of one thing, that if the claim of Lillian were not established, the reputation of Lady Boothroyd was most effectually damaged by the narration.

It is said that at the moment of death every action of our past lives is presented vividly before us, and it is a curious question whether the leaves of the volume on which, we are told, the recording angel writes them, are not, in fact, the tablets of our own memory.

Perhaps we had better not enter into that speculation, although it is a tempting one, but proceed with our tale.

Some such phantasma passed through the brain of her ladyship as she sat, to all outward appearance, calm and unmoved, listening to the deep clear voice of the learned counsel. Her life passed, as in a mirror, before her, and for the first time, perhaps, she asked herself if crime had made her happy.

Conscience assured her that it had not. All that she had sinned for had been defeated except wealth, and even that was fast gliding from her grasp.

The sobs of her daughter became painfully audible. Bitterly did she feel her mother's degradation.

Every countenance was marked with expectation when the opening counsel rose to reply.

"My lord; your lordship has listened, with most exemplary patience, to an amusing romance, to which it would be a perfect waste of your lordship's valuable time to reply. This is not the time or place to vindicate the reputation of my respected client, so ingeniously assailed. I ask your lordship to dismiss the plaintiff's petition on the ground that there is no such person as Lillian Boothroyd before the court, and we defy the very interesting young lady, claiming that name, to prove she has the slightest right to it. It is a vile conspiracy from beginning to end, by which some, no doubt, most honourable persons have been deceived, and induced to lend the moral countenance of their support."

"Where did the marriage of Allan Boothroyd take place?" inquired the chancellor, after referring to his papers.

"In India, my lord," replied Serjeant Silvertongue. "We have letters from his wife to her brother, in which she speaks of—"

"Any certificate?" interrupted his lordship.

"Unfortunately not, my lord. Late events in that distracted country—the destruction of registers and the different stations looted and burnt by the rebellious sepoys—will, I humbly submit, sufficiently account for its loss. We have the affidavit of the godmother of the plaintiff, the wife of a distinguished officer, who will prove to you that Mrs. Allan Boothroyd was everywhere received in the best society; in fact, that there is not the slightest moral doubt of her having been a wife."

"Your lordship will agree with me that this is perfectly extraneous. My learned friend very naturally is doing all he can to make a case for his client, but I contend that it has broken down. There is not a tittle of evidence to show that Lieutenant Boothroyd ever was married."

"Beant there?" roared out a voice in the crowd.

"That's all you know about the matter!"

The chancellor frowned; the astonished clerks called "Silence!" and the indignant usher ordered the officers to take the speaker in charge.

But the speaker did not choose to be taken in charge—at least, till he had had his say. Bustling through the densely-packed crowd that filled the court, he made his way to the space in front of the bench, and holding a packet of papers in his hand, exclaimed, "Here is the proof that Lilly's mother was married!"

The countenance of Lady Boothroyd flushed for an instant, and then became exceedingly pale.

"I found 'un, Lilly," added the speaker, who was no other than Farmer Minter, "in the owl's nest."

His lordship directed one of the clerks to hand them to him.

The packet so singularly recovered contained not only the certificates of the lieutenant's marriage with the mother of our heroine, and the birth of their child, but a letter written by Allan Boothroyd on his deathbed to Sir Norman, imploring his protection for his orphan.

The chancellor read them twice. Shrewd, intelligent, and accustomed to unravel, during his career at the bar, the intricacies of evidence, he hesitated before expressing an opinion—the whole affair seemed so like a coup de théâtre.

"They certainly have the appearance of being genuine," he observed.

"Will your lordship permit me?"

They were passed to the counsel of the defendant, who, after a careful examination, looked exceedingly blank.

The marriage certificate was signed by the Rev. Henry Churton, A.M., regimental chaplain, witnessed by Barny Gee and Henry Coulson, sergeant-major.

A junior barrister rose, and requested to be permitted to examine the signature of the clergyman.

As his name was Churton, of course it was permitted.

"The handwriting of my brother, my lord," he said. "There cannot be the slightest doubt on that point. At the date mentioned, he was regimental chaplain in one of our Indian regiments, though now, as your lordship is aware, one of the colonial bishops. He arrived in England three days since."

"There can be no difficulty, then, in proving his signature," observed the chancellor.

"Not the slightest, my lord."

Poor Lillian! It was not the prospect of wealth that caused tears of joy to fall at this unexpected discovery. They proceeded from a purer, better feeling—the certainty that she would never have to blush on hearing the name of her mother.

"Where did you say you procured the papers?" demanded the chancellor, addressing Farmer Minter.

"In the owl's nest, my lord."

"Where?"

The witness related, with much good sense, though certainly more circumlocution than we feel disposed to indulge in, the death of Barny Gee—the fruitless attempts he had made to recall his last words, and the conversation which so opportunely at last had brought it to his mind.

There was a straightforward, simple integrity in his manner of relating this, that carried conviction to every mind present—if we except the legal ones—that he had spoken the truth.

"Very strange you should have forgotten, as you say you did, the last words of a dying man," observed the opposing counsel.

"Yes! it was."

"How do you account for it?"

The farmer shook his head.

"Owls are not rare in Devonshire, I believe?"

"There are not many in our parts, I reckon," was the reply.

"And they build nests there?" added the counsel.

"I never heard they were built for 'em," answered the farmer, with a broad grin.

There was a titter in court; the usher looking sternly round, as if he felt his own personal dignity insulted, called for silence.

"And you expect his lordship to believe this strange tale?" continued the learned gentleman.

"Now, sir, look me in the face, and answer me: Would not the sight of an owl have recalled the last words of the man Barny Gee to your mind? supposing he had uttered them?"

The features of the counsel, unfortunately, bore a distressing likeness to the bird in question. He had large round eyes, a hooked nose, and large feathery iron-gray whiskers. The wig also favoured the resemblance.

The witness could not restrain his mirth.

"I believe it would," he said; "but I have never been in a Court of Chancery before."

Either the words, or the tone in which they were uttered, caused a burst of laughter, in which the bar and court so far forgot their dignity as to join—a breach of etiquette which made the pompous usher look, if possible, still more stern and dignified, as he repeated his parrot-like cry of "Silence! silence!"

The case was virtually at an end, although his lordship did not pronounce any decision—that would have been quite contrary to precedent, and precedent rules everything in chancery; added to which, the evidence of Farmer Minter was not evidence in the legal sense of the word. Legal evidence in the Court of Chancery can only be received on affidavit. The counsel both for plaintiff and defendant clearly foresaw what it would be—an action at common law to try the validity of the codicil and the genuineness of the certificate.

Lillian, accompanied by her friends, returned to the hotel, where she received the congratulations of those who loved her.

"In tears?" whispered her lover.

"They are for Alice," replied the generous-hearted girl. "I cannot but feel for what she must have endured for my sake."

Richard thought she had never appeared so lovely as at that moment. And he was right. There is an intellectual and moral beauty, which impart a grace even to the most faultless features, and retain a hold upon the heart when time has dimmed the eye of its lustre, and robbed the cheek of the bloom we prize.

A numerous and happy party were assembled that same evening at Mivart's—Mr. Bently, William, the father of our hero, Rachel, Mary, the Thorntons, Morton, his son, and Peter Mangles, who was now looked upon so completely as one of the family, that no reunion would have been considered complete without him.

How proud did Sir Charles and Lady Bell feel of their adopted child. Not that she had become rich—that was a secondary consideration; not even the name now proved to be her right, added to their satisfaction; it was caused by the noble sentiments she displayed in speaking of her cousin!

"She certainly has acted nobly," observed Mr. Morton, "and I have no doubt but means might be found to remove her from the guardianship of her evil-minded mother."

William Thornton thought he had never listened to so sensible a suggestion in his life.

Later in the evening Lady Bell and our heroine had a long conversation with the lawyer upon the subject, in which Rachel and Mary were ultimately called to take a part. It was decidedly a female plot that was hatching. "But with such conspirators," as our hero observed, "the object was sure to be a worthy one."

Mr. Morton was the first to take his leave, when, strange to say, not one of the ladies pressed him to remain.

Mary and Lillian were each questioned by their lovers. Nothing, however, could be elicited from them, till William begged to be taken into their confidence, which boon, by dint of prayers, he at last obtained.

"It was yielded," as Mary said, "to his piteous looks rather than to his still more piteous eloquence, and then only on one condition—that he kept the nature of it from Richard and Harry."

"You remember how you tormented me?" she added, laughingly, to her lover; "it is my turn to have a secret now."

"You have always possessed one," observed Harry, gallantly.

"Indeed!"

"The power of convincing me that whatever you decide upon is right. But you forget," he added, "that I have all but eaten my way to the bar, and can give a shrewd guess at the project you have talked my father into."

We need scarcely add, that before separating, Lillian had imparted all that she knew of it to our hero.

Lady Boothroyd had returned to her home, with the bitter conviction that all she had toiled and sinned for was lost; her reputation destroyed, and what was still worse, as her lawyers had pointed out to her, the jointure which Sir Norman had secured to her upon his personal property considerably imperilled, as there was not the slightest chance of the chancellor decreeing costs out of the estate.

Ruin, therefore, comparative ruin, stared her in the face.

With her usual decision of character, she determined to meet it promptly. Alice was still under her control. The selfish woman knew that her child would never permit her to know want; but to prevent her from falling under, what she was pleased to term, the influence of her enemies, she decided upon withdrawing at once to Paris—a step her counsel had hinted might be necessary.

On reaching home, orders were given for her departure at an early hour the following morning.

This was a sad blow to her daughter who found herself powerless to resist her mother's determination; and, let us add, from a sense of duty and obedience, she would have hesitated to do so under any circumstances.

Painful as the thought of exile appeared, it was bliss compared with the sorrow which had lately oppressed her—the dread of a marriage with Ilston.

At a very early hour the carriage was at the door, luggage packed, and everything ready for the journey, when just as the travellers were about to step into it, Mr. Morton made his appearance—followed by our readers old acquaintance, Meadows—and requested a few minutes' private conversation.

"It must be some other time," replied her ladyship, haughtily; "you perceive I am about to leave town."

"It is pressing."

"By letter, then."

"Letter," replied the lawyer, coldly, but with perfect politeness, "will not do. I am anxious to spare you a public disgrace; but you must grant me the hearing I request; unless," he added, lowering his tone, "you prefer all taking place before a magistrate."

The first impulse of the mother of the trembling Alice was to brave him; but there was something in the cold gray eyes of the gentleman's companion, that were fixed upon her, which created a vague, unpleasant impression in her mind, and she retraced her steps to the library, motioning to Mr. Morton to follow her.

"You will remain here," whispered the latter.

Mr. Meadows gave an intelligent nod, which showed he perfectly understood every movement of the game.

Whilst waiting the result, a second carriage drove up, with Lady Bell and Lillian; neither of whom, however, quitted it for the present.

"The communication I have to make is an unpleasant one," observed Mr. Morton; "a warrant has been applied for, for your apprehension."

"Ridiculous!" ejaculated her ladyship.

"Very few persons find it so," remarked the gentleman, drily.

"Upon what grounds?"

"Conspiracy to defraud your niece of her share in the Meldown property! If driven to extremities, the charge may take a still more serious form. All your ladyship's letters to your late steward, Andrew Silex, are in my hands."

Lady Boothroyd sank into a chair. Her self-confidence had at last abandoned her.

"There is only one arrangement for avoiding it," resumed her visitor, "which, as it will not interfere in the slightest degree with your ladyship's visit to Paris, I trust you will see the necessity of acceding to."

The guilty woman glanced instinctively towards her bewildered and terrified child.

"You are right," said Mr. Morton; "the friends of Miss Boothroyd feel that a residence with you can no longer conduce to her happiness. Lady Bell Fourreau, the guardian of her cousin, the joint heiress of Meldown, will be happy to receive her."

"What if I refuse?"

"The law must take its course."

"And if I accede?"

"The letters will be destroyed. That is," added the gentleman, cautiously, "as soon as your daughter is of age."

"My cousin Lillian means this well," said Alice; "but I cannot avail myself of her kindness. If my mother is unhappy, it is the place of her child to remain with and console her; if she has erred, to pray and suffer with her."

There are few hearts so hardened but in one corner of them some chord will be found to vibrate to the touch of nature. The devotion of her child did more than even the menaces of the lawyer could have done.

"You will not leave me, then?" she exclaimed.

"Not against your wish."

"Alice!" said her mother, with a violent effort, "perhaps it is best that we should part; no words—this is not the moment for me to give way to weakness. Whatever my motives in the course I have pursued, you, at least, will forbear to judge them. On one point you will still find me consistent. I never will consent to your marriage with William Thornton."

"And yet to his father's forbearance, Lady Boothroyd, you owe your safety," observed Mr. Morton.

"His!"

"He is the executor of Andrew Silex."

Alice took her mother's hand, and regarded her imploringly.

"Never!" gasped the haughty woman; "but I no longer oppose it."

"And now, sir," she added, "the sooner this painful interview is ended the better for myself and child. I must see Lady Bell; understand from her own lips that she is willing to receive her: Alice must not be regarded as an intruder."

Her visitor rang the bell.

"Inform the ladies who are in the carriage below that your mistress wishes to see them."

In a few seconds Lady Bell and our heroine made their appearance.

"Am I to understand," said Lady Boothroyd, coldly, "that the offer which this person has made has the sanction of Lady Bell Fourreau?"

"If it is to act as a mother to this dear girl, to share with her the love I feel for her cousin—yes!"

"I know in whose hands I place her, and rely upon your promise."

With pride unsubdued even to the last, the widow of Sir Norman placed the hand of her weeping daughter in that of Lady Bell's, and without uttering another word, or condescending to notice Lillian, even by a glance, quitted the room.

Mr. Meadows, comprehending that his services were not required, touched his hat respectfully; nay, even carried his politeness so far as to close the door of the carriage, and wish her ladyship a pleasant journey as it drove off.

"Strong-minded woman," he muttered to himself, "very. Morton must have played a clever game with her."

In less than an hour the two cousins were seated in the dressing-room of Lady Bell at Mivart's, their arms encircling each other.

"Do not weep," whispered Lillian, kissing away her tears.

Alice could only murmur the word "Mother."

"A sister's love shall replace her," murmured the fair girl.

Some time elapsed before the trial at common law, which the chancellor had directed, could come off; during which period William Thornton, as well as Richard Markham, were constant visitors at the hotel. As the cause of the plaintiff was unopposed, verdicts, establishing the validity of the codicil and the certificates of Allan Boothroyd's marriage, were returned. Immediately after which Mr. Bently invited the principal personages in our tale to Meldown Park.

CHAPTER CX.

Patience and sorrow strove

Who should express her goodliest. You have seen
Sunshine and rain at once: her smiles and tears
Were like a better day: Those happy smiles,
That played on her ripe lip, seem'd not to know
What guests were in her eyes; which parted thence,
As pearls from diamonds dropp'd.—In brief, sorrow
Would be a rarity most beloved, if all
Could so become it.—SHAKESPEARE.

NEVER had such doings been seen in St. Faith's, as on the first of May—the day when the two cousins were to arrive at Meldown. It being a generally understood thing that Alice was to become the wife of William Thornton, her name appeared as well as Lillian's in the triumphal arch, erected at the entrance of the village, and nothing that could soothe her feelings was neglected. The congratulatory address, presented by the tenantry headed by Farmer Minter, was addressed to both.

The heart of Lillian was full when she remembered the circumstances under which she had first made her appearance at St. Faith's: then a friendless child; now surrounded by loving friends.

As Richard rode by the side of the carriage and gazed upon her, he thought of the poet's lines:—

"The April's in her eyes: it is love's spring,
And these the showers to bring it in."

Time flies rapidly when happiness is the companion of its fleeting hours; and several weeks elapsed without one of the numerous party assembled at Meldown finding a single day hang heavily upon their hands. Rachel and her husband experienced in their present prosperity and the future prospects of their children that deep, contented thankfulness which the recollection of former trials and sufferings renders doubly sweet. The two cousins—the last descendants of an ancient race—would frequently steal from the society of their lovers and, accompanied by Mary Markham, visit the old pavilion in the park; the cottage of Simon Gee, whose future comforts it had been Lillian's first thought to care for; or the homestead of the Minters, where Jack Manders and Caleb Costar, with his mother and sister, had taken up their abode.

It was not long before the three girls—it is astonishing how clear-sighted love had made them—perceived our friend Jack had discovered that his heart was something more than a mere forcing-pump—an engine to keep up the circulation; in other words, that he had fallen over head and ears in love with his friend's sister—not a mere dip, but a decided plunge; and that Caleb began to look exceedingly sentimental at the eldest daughter of Farmer Minter.

It must not be supposed that Rose and her husband were forgotten: their former home had been restored to them by the guardians of the heiresses: Lillian felt that she had a debt of kindness to repay; Alice, the wrong her mother had forced them to accede to to atone.

Neither were the gentlemen idle. By the advice of Mr. Thornton and his grandfather, our hero, who had inherited the property of Andrew Silex, made what all parties considered a just distribution—a farm was purchased close to the hall for the old miser's nephew; the rest, and by far the larger portion, of it distributed to the poor.

Jack hesitated to accept his share of it, till Richard pointed out to him that all the wealth of his relative had not been obtained by crime; but that a part of it, quite as much as he would receive, had been the fruits of his long life of economy and service.

"I think you are right!" exclaimed the honest fellow, his face radiant with smiles; "and now I only want two things to render me the happiest fellow in the world."

"And what may they be?" demanded his friend, gravely. We suspect that either his sister or Lillian had given him a hint of the discovery they had made.

"The first is a cottage for old Bunce."

"That is easily gratified."

"The next is—" here Jack coloured and hesitated.

"Speak out."

"I shall not be able to manage a farm alone."

"Certainly not; you must have labourers," observed our hero, with difficulty repressing a smile, for he saw what the speaker was beating about the bushes for.

"I mean in the house, a—a wife! There, sir, the word is out. I think Caleb's sister would have me, at once, if you or Miss Lillian would only speak a good word for me—express a wish that you would like me to be married on the same day as yourself."

Richard Markham would have gone much further than that to promote the happiness of Jack, and he readily promised, counting on the influence of at least three fair allies, who, considering, as they said, the very considerable period that must elapse before they could think of naming even a distant day for their own marriage, consented to assist him, which they did most effectually.

Somehow—perhaps our female readers can explain the means—the considerable period was wonderfully abridged, the day named, and not a very distant one.

The brides never could exactly explain how it occurred. There had been a long walk with their lovers in the park, they had wandered into separate walks, unconsciously, of course, and doubtless felt quite astonished to discover, on comparing notes, that each had fixed the period for becoming a wife, and by a coincidence equally remarkable, named the same day.

No sooner was the intelligence imparted to the heads of the family, than Peter Mangles was invited down.

Although he took infinite pains to conceal it, the kind old man had not quite got over his disappointment at Mary's not marrying a business man. As a mark of his affection for his young favourite, who, even as a child, had crept, as it were, into his heart, he brought with him a magnificent set of pearls, and such a love of a bracelet!

The wonder was not where he found the money, but the taste.

"I hope you will be happy—very happy," he whispered, as he clasped it on her arm.

"I am sure I shall," answered the blushing girl; "and I have something to tell you, Peter, that will make you happy too, but it is a very great secret; can you keep one?"

"You know I can."
 "Well, then—but I must kiss you first and thank you for your gift—Harry is to give up the law."
 The face of the clerk became radiant with smiles.
 "And devote himself to business. Grandpapa intends that he and Richard shall be partners, if—if—"

"If—if what?"
 "If you will only undertake to give them the benefit of your experience."

"Of course I will," exclaimed the old man, complacently, "break them to the desk—teach them everything. Five years," he repeated; "I think, Mary," he added, with touching simplicity, "that I shall last that time: I am only—"

"Many—many years longer," interrupted the fair girl, throwing her arms around his neck. "This is the first time, Peter," she added, "that you ever said a word to grieve me."

The preparations for the reception of the heiresses at Meldown were poor, compared with those made by the inhabitants of St. Faith's for their wedding day, when every cottager stripped his little garden of its choicest flowers to deck the church and the pathway leading to it. Every one declared that such a sight had never been seen in St. Faith's before.

Sir Charles Fourreau gave away his adopted child. Fervent were the blessings which he and Lady Bell pronounced as she knelt at the altar, her hand clasped in his who was henceforth to be her protector and guide through life. They had little to fear for her happiness: the manly tenderness beaming in the eyes of our hero, the deep emotion with which he pronounced the vow to love and cherish her, guaranteed the felicity of Lillian, as far as human felicity can be assured.

Mr. Bently performed the office of a parent for Alice, and George Markham to his daughter, Mary.

As the bridal procession emerged from the sacred edifice, it was welcomed with a shout from the villagers and tenants of the Meldown and Elms estates—a genuine Devonshire shout, the heart in the ring of it—whilst, at the same instant, the bell-ringers of St. Faith's, headed by old Simon Gee, who never pulled more lustily, even in his younger days, sent forth a merry peal from the old belfry, that must have very much disconcerted the rooks—it being breeding time; between the firing of the bells, the shouts of the crowd rose clearly again and again, and were kept up long after the long train of carriages was out of sight.

It was the first occasion since her widowhood that Mrs. Chutnee threw aside her weeds, and appeared in a dress of silver gray.

"I thought," whispered Sir Charles in the ear of his wife, as he directed her attention to the quiet earnestness of Wharton, upon whose arm the still girlish Zamora leant, "you said your friend would never think of marrying again?"

"Never! yes—that is for a year, at least," replied her ladyship, laughingly.

"I understand!" exclaimed her husband; "never, in a lady's calculation, means a year."

"In a widow's, Charley—in a widow's."

Although it is a sad anachronism to do so, we may as well state here that Lady Bell proved correct in her prediction; for it was not till the full year of mourning had expired that Zamora became the wife of the gallant Wharton.

We will spare our readers a description of the rejoicings that celebrated the happy event; the feasting of the poor, the ox roasted whole in the park, the escort of mounted tenantry that assembled to accompany the brides the first stage from Meldown, as well as the speeches at the wedding breakfast, in which Peter Mangles and Major Hawley greatly distinguished themselves. Prolong the instants as they would, the period of separation at last arrived: the carriages were at the door.

This—as we have frequently heard our venerable maiden aunt somewhat doubtfully observe—if men ever really do possess any proper feelings, ought to be a painful moment for the newly married husband. The leave-takings, blessings, sobbings, adieus, kisses, and tears, showered upon the bride—no one thinks of noticing him—are so many indirect reproaches for his cruelty in depriving the respectable middle-aged father in spotless white waistcoat, who made such a capital speech at the breakfast—the weeping mother, sisters-in-law, and bridesmaids of their sweet child, friend, and companion.

If the bridegroom has any heart, he must feel it; if he does not, more shame for him. All we can say is, that he ought.

As for the brothers of the victim, we have purposely omitted mentioning them; generally speaking, they are inclined to be jolly rather than otherwise on the occasion.

Fortunately, in the present instance, which after all is the only one we have to do with, cambric was not in very great request. The tears certainly did stand in the eyes of Rachel Markham and Lady Bell as the vehicles drove off; but the smile of hope quickly cheered them. The only bride upon whose happiness a cloud of regret or sorrow rested, was the gentle Alice, who sighed for her mother's blessing.

As the carriage in which William and herself were seated passed the lodge of Meldown Park, Joseph, the footman, who had accompanied Lady Boothroyd to the continent, rode up, and placed a packet in the hands of his young mistress.

"My lady is quite well," exclaimed the old man, perceiving the agitation of Mrs. William Thornton. "As I was about to return to England,"—here he looked knowingly at the bridegroom, to remind him of his promise of taking him into his service,—"her ladyship intrusted me with these."

"Thank Heaven!" murmured Alice, as she handed the letter to her husband; "the last, the only cloud has passed away."

Although the haughty woman most probably never could have brought herself to give a formal consent to the marriage of her daughter, she not only sent her her blessing, but the Boothroyd jewels: a proof that she felt perfectly reconciled to it.

The filial devotion of her child, in refusing to separate from her without her consent, had touched her heart: though sadly worldly, it was not all of clay.

The morning after the wedding, Peter Mangles returned to London. His absence had lasted a week—a most unusual circumstance for him, a week from business!—but on his way back he consoled himself by the reflection that he would soon have our hero and the husband of Mary to initiate into the business of the firm, the mysteries of exchange—in fact, a commercial education to undertake, as it were, from the commencement.

Between ourselves and our readers, we are inclined to suspect that when the arrangement does take place, the kind old clerk will find that he has rather underrated the experience of Richard Markham and his friend Harry. A counting-house in Calcutta and a course of mathematics at Cambridge, are not the worst preparation for an introduction to a life of business in London.

On making his appearance at the counting-house, the porter informed Mr. Mangles, with a certain air of mystery, that for the last three mornings a person from the "Crown and Magpie" had been inquiring for him.

"From where, did you say?" exclaimed the horror-struck Peter, who had never forgotten his adventures on the only occasion on which he had ever visited the tavern.

"Crown and Magpie," repeated the man.

"A black woman!" gasped Mr. Mangles.

"No, sir, no," replied the porter, who evidently would have indulged in a laugh had he dared; "a fellow who looks like a potman. Somebody, as I understood him, is dying at the place, and very anxious to see you. But if you object to be troubled," he added, "I can easily send him away."

Peter reflected for an instant. In the City, in his own room, the police and clerks within call, there could not be any great danger he considered, and he directed that the person, in the event of his calling again, should be admitted.

He had not long to wait before the man presented himself. The tale he told was rather a singular one. A gentleman, whose name no one in the house had been able to find out, had been residing at the Crown and Magpie ever since the 11th of March.

The clerk started; the date was that of the murder of Viscount Illston.

"The gent is a-dyin'," added the messenger, "and wants to see you."

"I know no reason why the person you speak of should desire to speak with me," said the old man, thoughtfully; "why did he not write?"

"Perhaps he daren't."

"Or send his name?"

"That might be wuss," observed his visitor, with an exceedingly knowing wink. "We all thinks as the gent is a hidin'. But he told me a word by which he said you'd know him. Care—Carus! that's it!"

Peter hesitated no longer, but drove at once to the tavern. A shudder ran through his veins as he recognised the house—the fat landlady in corkscrew ringlets, gold chain and rings at the bar. Recollecting, however, that it was daylight, his courage somewhat revived.

"This is the gent, missis," exclaimed the messenger, "as is come to see our lodger."

"I should like to know who is to pay for our lodger," replied the woman, tartly; "his last bill has been standing a month."

"If it is the person I have reason to suppose it is, I will," said Mr. Mangles.

"Better see him at once, then," observed the landlady; "if it isn't, he must go to the workus—I don't keep my house open for nothink."

On entering a small, dingy room at the back of the tavern, the old clerk with some difficulty recognised in the gaunt, emaciated skeleton before him the nephew of his employer. Evidently the unhappy man was fast sinking; he had scarcely strength to stretch forth his hand, which Peter slightly touched, but his eyes were terrible in the eloquent agony of their expression.

"You are come at last," he muttered, hoarsely; "sit down, I am dying. Leave the room," he added, addressing himself to the potman; "this gentleman will pay you for your trouble."

The fellow sullenly obeyed him.

Mr. Mangles was about to speak.

"Hush!" whispered Carus Kearn, "don't breathe my name; they are listening—I am sure they are listening."

Peter walked to the door and opened it. The potman was already at the bottom of the stairs.

"And why should you fear their listening?" he demanded.

The look which the dying wretch gave him in reply was so hopeless, so full of misery, that it caused the blood to run cold in the veins of his visitor.

"You are ill," he said; "very ill. You see what drink has brought you to."

Carus shook his head.

"I have not tasted spirits, or even wine, these three months," he answered. "I dare not drink, and that is my punishment; for when I drink I talk."

Peter Mangles was by no means eloquent; but he possessed, which most of our readers, we feel assured, will consider much better than eloquence, an upright, honest mind; an integrity temptation never yet had shaken, and that straightforwardness of character which often renders the plainest words more persuasive than the most brilliant oratory. He saw that the wretched man, stricken in the full pride and force of manhood, had not many hours to live, and, in his simple, earnest manner, he spoke to him of the future.

The murderer writhed as on a bed of thorns, and more than once grasping the arm of the speaker, implored him to be silent.

"I must do my duty," observed the old man, kindly, "however unfitted for the task; if you refuse to listen to me, allow me to send for a clergyman."

"No, no, he would betray me! no clergyman—no magistrate."

"You have something on your mind, Carus," said his visitor; "I can partly guess it. It is a bad thing to stand before the judgment-seat, with such a balance sheet. We may hoodwink the courts of bankruptcy with false accounts," he added, "but not the court of Heaven."

"You can guess it—partly guess it," repeated the nephew of his employer, fixing his eyes uneasily upon him; "I do not understand you."

"Yes; you came here on the 11th of March."

"Hush! hush!"

"Does not that date suggest my meaning? The night of Illst—"

With a half-stifled shriek, the dying man started from the chair on which he was seated, and attempted to place his hand upon the lips of the speaker.

"Do not name him—for pity's sake, do not name him: they would drag me, even from this den, to the prison—the scaffold. I have never known a moment's peace of mind since that night. Terror has been my companion—wedded to me like my shadow—inseparable from me, even in my dreams—enfold me like a shroud. You speak of punishment. Oh, I have been punished—fearfully punished. Dreading each moment, lest some incautious word or look should betray me. A prisoner, a self-constituted prisoner in this chamber. If I ventured forth," he added, "the placard—the reward stared me in the face. A look—a casual glance sufficed to send the blood from my heart to my gorged brain; and I returned pursued by my own fears. Punishment! men have been said to sleep upon the rack, and I believe it; for the rack would have been mercy to what I have endured; and yet I have slept, to dream—to dream!"

By dint of reasoning and entreaty, the old clerk obtained the wretched man's consent to send for a physician, who quickly saw that the case was a hopeless one.

"How long has he to live?" demanded Peter.

The medical man looked astonished at such a question, asked in the presence of his patient.

"You must answer me," continued the speaker, solemnly, "unless you would have him die with the weight of bloodguiltiness upon his soul."

"Speak!" groaned Carus.

"About five hours," answered the physician; "five hours at the utmost."

Strange to say, the reply appeared to afford the dying man relief; it insured him against the scaffold, and he no longer refused to receive the visit of the clergyman, who impressed upon his mind the necessity of making a full confession of his guilt, which was witnessed and signed a few minutes only before the murderer expired; his intention having been, as he declared, to shoot Richard Markham, in order to revenge himself upon his uncle.

He had mistaken the viscount for our hero.

This confession was not made public till the remains of Carus had been consigned to their final resting-place. Peter Mangles was the only person who followed him to the grave.

"A bad end," he exclaimed, with a sigh; "a bad end! But it is not to be wondered at; he never was correct in his petty cash book!"

THE END OF "SMILES AND TEARS."

[Our next number will contain the opening chapters of an entirely new and original tale, by J. F. SMITH, author of "Smiles and Tears," "Phases of Life," "Dick Tarleton," "The Soldier of Fortune," &c., &c., written expressly for this paper, entitled "THE SUBSTANCE AND THE SHADOW," which surpasses in stirring incident and startling adventure the most popular productions of this justly celebrated author.]

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

THE REASONABLENESS OF RELIGION.

COMPLAINTS of the world and of life we often hear even from those who are surrounded by all the external of comfort and happiness. But the world is good; for it is God's world, made by his power, fashioned by his wisdom, and fitted by his bounty for many precious uses. The world is good, for it is intended for man, the first home of his being, and the school of his destiny. Life is also good, for it is mighty in purpose and capacity, and endowed with tender and sublime affections, which are improved by cultivation and exercise.

The ascetic view of life is as erroneous as the sensual. The Christian view of life is that which is alone consistent with reason and revelation, a view in which both the present and the future are seen to be but one life—one in essence, and one in interest.

It is scarcely necessary to caution young men against the ascetic view of life. Ascetics are generally those who have met with bitter disappointment, or who have satiated their nature with the pleasures of life. Instead of accusing themselves of misusing that which confers happiness when properly employed, these people become dissatisfied with the arrangements of Providence, misanthropic and ascetic. But such cases are not common among the young. To youth the world wears its brightest aspect, and life presents its most alluring charms. Life is so good, and so much enjoyment is anticipated, that anything which seems to interfere with the full gratification of the desires, is shunned as a burden, or resented as an insult. Religion seems to cloud the horizon, and to cast a shadow on the earth. But this is only in appearance. A misconceived idea with regard to religion is the cause of this disinclination to admit its claims. It is associated with long faces and prayer meetings, psalm-singing and dull sermons, and grave reproofs and stupidity. It is supposed to regard human life as a mere dull, wearisome journey to another world; it is thought to condemn every pleasure as vain and wicked; to teach you to despise things that you love, and to love things that you despise. You feel that much of this is unnatural and irrational. So it is. But true religion is a very different thing from that which it is sometimes represented to be, and in all its freshness, purity, and elevating power, demands your serious attention.

Enter a railway station, go out on the platform, look on those iron roads—the uplines, downlines, curves. What were they laid in that way for? It is a road. Try your cart or carriage upon it. The axletrees are too narrow, and you go bumping along the sleepers. It is evident it was not made for any ordinary conveyance. Now observe that locomotive. Examine it carefully. It is a very ponderous affair, the wheels would sink to the axle on any common country road. What use is it? why was it built? Stop a moment; would not those heavy wheels just fit this railway? Yes, they would. That solves the difficulty. Those rails were made for the locomotive, and the locomotive was made for those rails. They are good for nothing apart. The locomotive is not safe anywhere else. Now, what the rail is to the locomotive, religion is to the human mind. It is the road on which we were intended to travel, and for which we are especially designed; and as surely as we attempt to run on any other road do we come to inevitable ruin.

Suppose you don't believe this, and try other roads. There are many roads which you can take; but the result will be deplorable. Here is the tavern, or public-house road; try it—follow it, and see how long it will be before you come to ruin. Here is the road of sensual pleasure; you are sure to bury yourself in the mire if you try it—your machine is not at all adapted for that road. Here is the winding, uncertain path of frivolity; there are morasses on each side of it, and at the rate you are travelling, you will be sure, sooner or later, to run into one of them. Here is the road of philosophy; but it runs through a country in which the light of heaven is obscured; and, while you may be able to maintain the equilibrium of your locomotive, it will only be by a slow and tedious process and with no certainty of ever arriving safely at the end of your journey. Here is the road of scepticism; that is covered with fog, all the signal-lights are uncertain, and a fence runs across it within ten rods. Do you not see that your locomotive was never meant to traffic on these roads? don't you know that the only safe and sure road is that which the Creator has appointed? Don't you know that so long as you keep on this road destruction is impossible, and that the same can be said of no other track under the sky? Don't you know that over rivers and valleys, through hill-cuttings and tunnels, in darkness and in light this road affords an unobstructed and happy progress? If you don't, try it, and answer, is it not what we describe it to be?

Do you ask us what do we mean by religion; do you run over the names of churches and denominations, and ask to what we refer? We point you to the Bible, to the study of the sacred Scriptures, and declare our belief that the Bible, and the Bible alone, furnishes a religion worthy of God or Man.

We believe your personal value depends entirely upon your possession of religion. You are worth to yourself what you are capable of enjoying; you are worth to society the happiness you are capable of imparting. To yourself without religion you are worth very little. A man whose aims are low, whose motives are selfish, who has in his heart no adoration for the Creator, no reverence for the Bible, no strong-armed trust in the future, no elevating sense of the true dignity of his nature, cannot be worth much to himself. Neither can he be worth much to society, because his mind is selfish and degraded, his purposes low and sordid, and he has not that to bestow which society most requires for its happiness and prosperity.

Look at the real object of religion, and observe how rational it is. It is the placing of the human soul in harmony with the Creator and his laws. It is only by preserving your true relation to the Creator, that you can be manly or attain a manly growth. He has given you appetites, and he meant that you should indulge them, and that they should be sources of happiness to you, but always in subordination to your spiritual growth and development. He gave you passions, and they are just as sacred as any part of you, but they are to be under the strict control of your reason and your conscience. He gave you desires for earthly happiness, planted in you the love of human praise, delight in society, and the faculty to enjoy all his works. He gave you his works to enjoy, but you can only truly enjoy them when you learn to regard them as blessings from the Giver of every good gift, and as bestowed on you for the development of your higher nature. There is not a true joy in life which you need give up in being faithful to the Creator, but without such fidelity every pleasure is bereft of its best charm, and yields no solid satisfaction. In whatever way you desire to realise the full grandeur and completeness of life—be religious.

CHAPTER XXX.

"I HOPE, George," said Robert, "that when I go to France I shall find something to drink as well as to eat. After discussing (as we have lately done in the vocabulary) so many excellent dishes, I begin to feel rather thirsty."

"In France," replied George, with a smile, "there are beverages to suit all tastes. You know I am a water drinker, considering water 'le vin de tous les pays,' translated literally, 'the wine of all countries,' and translated freely, 'Adam's ale.' So we will begin with my favourite draught, a glass of water."

"I think now," said George, "you need not complain of having nothing to drink."

"No, indeed," answered Robert. "You certainly have told me the names of drinks to suit all tastes."

"France," said the teacher, "is, as you may have heard, one of the principal wine lands; and 'Le petit vin,' inferior wine, is drunk as generally as beer in this country, and not—as is too generally in England—to excess. Drunkenness is not one of the vices of the French people. You seldom meet a drunken man in their streets, and a drunken woman hardly ever. But the French, of the working classes, are very fond of what they call 'la goutte.' 'Prendre la goutte,' in English, 'to take a drop' of brandy. The drivers of diligences (stage coaches) are especially fond of 'la goutte.'

"A glass of something in the way of a gratuity is called in French 'un pourboire'; and, to tell you the truth, the constant request for 'pourboires' is a drawback to the pleasure the traveller would otherwise find in his excursions in Paris. If he asks the way, a 'pourboire' is expected for the answer; and if, after the 'deuxième à droite' (the second to the right), 'quatrième à gauche' (the fourth to the left), 'tout droit devant vous' (straight before you),—if, I say, after all this, the traveller loses his way, and has to make fresh inquiries, there must be a fresh 'pourboire.' At last he takes refuge in a 'fiacre' (a cab), but as the door is closed upon him, a hand is extended for a 'pourboire'; and when the traveller reaches his destination he beholds the same pantomime, and hears the same request—'un pourboire.'

"Oh, George!" exclaimed Robert, "you quite frighten me. Really you diminish my wish to visit Paris."

"That is far from my intention; I would only put you on your guard. The best plan is to go on excursions with a friend who knows Paris, then you are less likely to be importuned. It is the wandering, puzzled, staring John Bull that is dunned for 'pourboires.'"

"I can easily understand that," replied Robert.

"Now," said the preceptor, "we must speak a little about the exercise. I have not much to say, as you will continue to write on the agreement of the adjective."

"I must, however, direct your attention to the peculiarities of the adjectives feu, late, and nu, naked. The former is invariable when placed before the article or the possessive pronoun, but it declines (or changes) if placed after the one or the other; for instance, 'feu l'impératrice,' or 'la feue impératrice' (the late empress); 'feu ma maîtresse,' or 'ma feue maîtresse' (my late mistress).

"The latter, that is, the adjective nu (naked), does not change when it precedes a noun, but it agrees with the noun when it follows it; but supposing this same adjective to be preceded by the article the, used in the feminine, it agrees with the noun, though placed before it; for instance, 'The Queen has only kept for herself the title to her kingdom.' 'La reine ne s'est conservée que la nue propriété de son royaume.'"

AGREEMENT OF THE AMBIVALENCE AND USE OF THE ARTICLE WITH THE AMBIVALENCE.

1. It is not improbable that the late queen had several good qualities. 2. I was obliged to wait for her half an hour. 3. I gave her half a pound of butter. 4. It is hardly half a mile from here. 5. I can go there in an hour and a half. 6. They walked, yesterday, ten leagues and a half in eight hours and a half. 7. The late queen was universally respected. 8. His impetuosity and courage, his restraint, surmounted all obstacles. 9. The nation and genius of Ariosto, although inferior in their march, yet surpassed and captivated the nation. 10. Mistress C plays with exquisite taste and feeling. 11. The French fight with astonishing courage and intrepidity. 12. I never saw a lady who united such an admirable sweetness and equanimity of temper. 13. Modesty and disinterestedness deserve to be praised and admired, when they originate in good and laudible motives. 14. His brother and sister are not happy.

LE CORRECTIF.

1. Il n'est pas improbable que la reine (ou la reine) eût plusieurs bonnes qualités. 2. Je fus obligé d'attendre une demi-heure. 3. Donnez-moi une demi-livre de beurre. 4. Il y a à peine un demi-mille d'ici. 5. Je peux y aller en une heure et demie. 6. Il court en moins de temps qu'un foin, nu-pieds, nu-tête; il avait les jambes nues. 7. La reine (ou la reine) fit un voyage de dix lieues et demie en huit heures et demie. 8. Son impétuosité et son courage long temps enchaînés, surmontèrent tous les obstacles. 9. L'imagination et le génie de l'Arioste, quoique inférieurs à leur marche, intéressent néanmoins et captivent le lecteur. 10. Madame C joue avec un goût et un sentiment. 11. Les français se battent avec un courage et une intrepidité étonnants. 12. Je n'ai jamais vu de femme qui réunît une douceur et une égalité d'humeur si admirables. 13. La modestie et le désintéressement méritent d'être loués et admirés quand ces qualités viennent de motifs bons et honorables. 14. Son frère et sa sœur ne sont pas heureux.

"Suppose now we listen to what our travellers are saying about Paris," said George.
"With all my heart," answered Robert.

CONTINUATION OF LE VOYAGE À PARIS.

ENGLISH. FRENCH.
We were speaking of the history of Paris. Nous parlons de l'histoire de Paris.
That is true; but we will only say a few words about it. C'est vrai; mais nous ne dirons que peu de mots à ce sujet.
Nevertheless, the little you tell me will enable me to appreciate what we shall see in our walks. Néanmoins le peu que vous me direz me mettra à même d'apprécier ce que nous verrons dans nos courses.
You are right. I begin by telling you that Paris was in the first instance called Lutèce. Vous avez raison. Je commence en vous disant que Paris s'est d'abord appelé Lutèce.
Oh why? Ah pourquoi?
Some say that Lutèce comes from lutum, which means mud. Les uns disent que Lutèce vient de lutum, qui signifie boue.
Oh, that's capital! Even to the present day there's no want of mud. Ah, c'est admirable! Même aujourd'hui la boue ne manque pas.
Others assert that Lutèce is derived from the Celtic. D'autres prétendent que Lutèce est dérivé du celtique.
Is Paris one of the most ancient towns of France? Est-ce que Paris est une des plus anciennes villes de la France?
Oh, there's no doubt of that. Ah, voilà ce qu'il y a de certain.
Does Julius Caesar speak of it? Jules César en parle-t-il?
Yes he does in Paris. Oui, il l'appelle Parisii.
In what condition did he find it? Dans quel état l'a-t-il trouvé?
Paris was then but a collection of huts, on an island in the river Seine. Paris n'était alors qu'un amas de cahutes renfermées dans une île au milieu de la Seine.

* It is a French idiom, literally translated, as "with put to the test," this would be nonsense. It is the French idiom for "with enable."

And what does history say of the inhabitants? Et que dit l'histoire des habitants?
That they were celebrated for their courage, and their hatred of foreign dominion. Qu'ils étaient célèbres par leur courage, et leur haine de la domination de l'étranger.
Did Caesar become master of Paris? César devint-il maître de Paris?
Yes, and, according to some writers, he improved it. Oui, et il l'embellit au dire de quelques auteurs.
Where did the governors of Gaul reside? Où séjournaient les gouverneurs de la Gaule?
At Paris. Considerable enlargement of the town is said to have taken place in the reign of Julian the Apostate. A Paris. Le principal accroissement de cette ville est rapporté au règne de Julien l'Apostat.
Did he visit Paris? A-t-il visité Paris?
Yes, he spent several winters there. Oui, il y passa plusieurs hivers.

FRENCH PRONUNCIATION—continued.

OF THE SOUND un.
This sound is nearly similar to that of un in the English word uncle, &c.
In French words, it is represented in the following manner: un, in parfum, perfume; uns, in parfums, perfumes; un, in important, importune; uns, in importunes (plural of importune); unt, in emprunt, loan; eun, in à jeun, fasting.

Thus the sound un is the result of the following combinations of letters: um, uns, un, uns, unt, eun.

REMARKS ON THE PRECEDING SOUNDS.

If books were printed with their syllables numbered as above, we need say no more about the pronunciation of sounds produced by the combination of vowels, simple or compound, with the letters m and n; if even the syllables thus formed were nasal and sounded alike, each according to its formation, we should have said enough; but it is not so. These syllables are not always nasal, and as their pronunciation changes them entirely, we have, therefore, to explain when they are nasal or not, and what differences arise, in regard to their pronunciation.

1st. Whenever one of the syllables 16, 17, 18, 19, is followed by a vowel or h mute in the formation of a word, the nasality of the sound disappears, the vowel is sounded by itself, and the letter m or n is joined to the next vowel in pronunciation; that is to say, whenever the letter m or n is placed between two vowels, or a vowel and h mute, it is joined to the subsequent vowel, in the division of the word into syllables, as in the following words:—

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON XXIX. MAGNETISM.

754. Illustrate this by stating the result of a simple experiment.—If a sheet of paper be inserted between the pole of a magnet and a piece of iron, the attraction is much less than when there is an actual contact.

755. Is the power of a magnet weakened by use?—On the contrary, additions may be made from day to day to the weight that it first supports.

756. What inference may be drawn from the fact that the magnet does not lose its virtue?—That the

† Au dire, "to the to say," as translated word for word; freely translated, "according to."

‡ Est rapporté might be translated "is taken back to," but this is awkward and un-English, and it is necessary to keep to the meaning rather than to the words of this sentence, and to render it as above, viz., "is said to have taken place."

piece of iron in contact with the pole does not draw its magnetism from the magnet, but contains the principle of magnetism within itself.

757. What may be inferred from the fact that the magnet is strengthened by use?—That the magnetism developed in the contiguous iron reacts on the magnet, and brings into action a new portion of its magnetism.

758. What is the sustaining power of good bar-magnets?—Bar-magnets are seldom found capable of supporting more than their own weight of iron.

759. Have small magnets greater proportional power than large ones?—They have; a small magnet set in a ring and worn by Sir Isaac Newton, is said to have lifted 250 times its own weight.

760. If a steel wire that has been magnetised is cut into small pieces, what is true of each piece?—Each piece is found to have a north pole at one end, and a south pole at the other end.

761. What is inferred from this?—That a magnet is made up of lines of particles all of which are little magnets, with the same poles turned the same way.

762. How is this explained?—There are supposed to be two magnetic fluids, as there are two electric fluids, and these are combined in each particle.

763. What may be said of this explanation?—It is the simplest conception by which the facts can be represented, but is not believed to be a reality.

764. What are the two supposed fluids called?—Austral and Boreal.

765. What is supposed to take place when a bar of iron or steel is magnetised?—These fluids are separated in each of its particles by the action of the magnet; the austral fluid is made to occupy one half of each particle, and the boreal fluid the other half.

766. We have seen that each pole of a magnet attracts iron or steel—what is the nature of the action of two magnets on each other?—The north pole of each magnet attracts the south pole of the other, but repels the north pole; and the south pole of each magnet attracts the north and repels the south pole of the other.

767. We have seen that if either pole of a magnet be applied to the end of a small bar of iron, the bar will become a magnet—which pole will be developed on the end of the bar touched by the magnet?—The pole of the opposite name; and if the bar is not too long, the pole of the same name will be developed at the other end.

768. What may be said, then, of the attraction between a magnet and a piece of iron brought into contact with it?—It is really an attraction between the opposite poles of two magnets.

769. What is a horse-shoe magnet?—It is an artificial steel magnet bent into a shape resembling a horse-shoe; the poles are at the two ends, and are therefore by the side of each other. A piece of soft iron extends across from one pole to the other, and from this weights may be suspended by means of a hook.

Fig. 47.

770. What is this piece of iron called?—A keeper, or armature. It is so called because by means of it the full power of the magnet may be preserved for any length of time.

771. What may be said of the power of the horse-shoe magnet to support weights?—Its sustaining power is much more than double the natural attraction of either pole for a piece of iron.

THE BLIND PAINTRESS OF CREMONA.

The year 1530 saw the birth of Sofonisba Anguisciola. She was born at Cremona, and, like many of her countrywomen, her chief education was in the noble art of painting. She was a relative of Pope Pius IV., and one of her most successful efforts was the portrait of Isabella, Queen of Philip II. It was a present from the king to the pope. In her earlier years she had studied with Bernardino Campo and Bernardo Gatti, and under their instructions had in turn become a thorough portrait and historical painter. Her first portraits were those of her father and two of his children, and these brought her a reputation which has been kept in honourable remembrance. The "Marriage of St. Catherine," in the Pembroke collection at Wilton, is hers, and the portrait of Sofonisba herself, playing on a harpsichord, is there also. Her three sisters, Lucia, Europa, and Anna Maria, were also painters.

If genius has its exquisite delights, it has also its exquisite sufferings. It was so with the sensitive heart of Sofonisba. Her marriage with a Sicilian nobleman, Don Fabrizio di Moneada, brought her all the happiness which she could look for. She accompanied him to Sicily, and, for a short time, life seemed to bloom, a second Eden to the youthful and romantic artist. It was all too bright to last. Her husband died, and the unhappy widow, unable to live where everything reminded her of her lost happiness, returned by way of Genoa to Italy.

Orazio Lomellino, the captain of the ship in which Donna Sofonisba returned, was one of the bravest, as he was one of the handsomest of men. His life had been a scene of romantic interest, from the varied incidents which had chequered his career upon the sea; and his relation of these, and the fascinating manner in which he brought them, distinct and graphic as a picture, before the minds of his audience, roused all the enthusiasm of his passengers, and made him a hero at once. He, however, modestly disclaimed any such pretensions, and placed all his own deeds in an unassuming light; but no one who knew Lomellino could forbear the tribute of admiration. Toward his lady passenger his manner was a beautiful blending of sympathy and reverence, accompanied with a protecting air that the widow could not but be grateful to him for showing.

Arriving in Italy, Sofonisba resumed the study of art, and strove to silence her grief by an increased attention to its pursuit. Her life in Sicily came back to her only as a beautiful dream, the incidents of which, bright and brief as they were, it seemed to her that she could almost transfer to her canvas. She passed three years in this way, alternately dreaming of the past, and laying up a reputation for the future. Her home grew lonelier every succeeding year. Her sisters were all married, and her parents had lain down in the same slumber in which her dearest friend was sleeping. Only herself and a young brother remained, and it was on account of her loneliness solely that he refrained from leaving Italy altogether, to find a new home; but he loved his sister too well to permit him to do this.

They lived very simply. The pretty Italian cottage in which she was born had been improved and embellished by Sofonisba's wealth, until it needed nothing more to make it a paradise. It was shaded on three sides with beautiful trees, and on the north were picturesque views that would enchant a painter's eye. Glimpses through the foliage at the south and east showed vineyards, mantling with purple grapes, and on the southwest, the waters of the Mediterranean lay like a "glorious mirror, where the Almighty's form glasses itself in tempests."

Within, all was elegance, but so simplified that it did not seem to clash with the modest style of the building, or the retired life of its owners. The room where Sofonisba painted, and that which she devoted to music, were the two most frequently occupied by her. But to Julius, the library had greater charms. Here they had collected a vast amount of books, in all languages, while paintings and statuary were not wanting.

One of those delightful days which rise and set only on Italy, or at least are lovelier there than elsewhere, was just dawning. Julius had been up and waiting long for his sister to appear. The servants brought in breakfast, but still nothing was heard from Sofonisba. The brother was alarmed at this departure from her usual custom. It had been her delight for years to greet the hour of dawn. He hastened to the door of her room, and called to her to look forth upon the loveliest day of the year. Her sobs reached his ear, and he entered the room.

"How shall I tell you, my brother? I cannot see a ray of light. Julius, I am blind!"

It was too true. Some misgivings, it seemed, she had felt, but could not endure to give them expression, lest they should wound the brother's affectionate heart; and, besides, she had never anticipated anything so complete and sudden as this. Oculists were called in, and the best advice consulted, but in vain. Never again would those eyes that loved so well to look upon the face of nature, and direct the cunning hand to copy its beauties—never again would they behold the light of day. Beautiful eyes were they indeed, and all untouched, to outward appearance, by the cruel disease. No one would have dreamed that they did not see as well as ever. The disorder was of that peculiar nature that, while it destroys all hope of recovery, leaves the eyes in their original beauty and brightness.

Now then, indeed, the world in which Sofonisba had lived was dark and dreary in the future. Now, indeed, did the affectionate brother give up all thoughts of leaving her, and resolve to devote his life to her happiness. Long before he had ceased to mourn over her privation, she had become most truly reconciled. She lived now in the world within, instead of the world without. Now she more fully valued her wealth of books, since she could remember and repeat what Julius had read to her.

Her delicacy of touch as a painter stood her now in good stead. Through its subtle power, she could more easily than others distinguish what she wanted to find, without asking for it; and in her walks, when she wished to be alone, her little dog was a sufficient safeguard.

"I am not unhappy," she would say. "God, in closing my eyes, has opened to me a better vision. True, I cannot see the trees as I walk beneath them, but I hear them as they bow to the blind artist who loved to paint them, and the birds carol sweet songs in their branches as I pass, and the soft breeze kisses my sightless eyes. Do not weep, Julius; I am very happy in them all, and in you more than any."

Vandyck, who often visited her, declared that he learnt more of the practical principles of art from this blind painter than by studying all the Italian masters. This was rare praise, and, better still, it was deserved.

One day she was alone. She had driven Julius away, declaring that he should go and sit for an hour or two in "somebody's sunshine." She would not have him wearing out his young days for her. She would play and sing, she told him, all the time he was gone; and finding her in a mood so cheerful, he obeyed.

She passed slowly and cautiously to the music-room, and felt her way to the harpsichord, and soon the music rose loud and sweet from hand and lip. Her voice seemed richer and fuller than ever before, as the eyes of nightingales have been said to be put out that they might pour forth a more thrilling melody. The vaulted roof of the room echoed to the strain, while the sightless eyes were turned upward as if in prayer, with not a cloud upon their blue depths. She looked a Saint Cecilia—an embodied muse, or the spirit of music itself.

So thought he who stood, speechless and entranced, at the door of the room. At the conclusion of the song, he breathed a deep sigh. It caught the quick ear of the songstress, and the rich red hue spread over a cheek that had not lost any of its fairness or beauty since he saw it last. He approached and held out his hand. She saw it not, but she heard his footstep, and recognised it as one she had heard somewhere before. Her blindness had sharpened every other faculty to its utmost.

"Will you not speak to an old friend, lady?" asked the stranger. And her quick, glad response was music to his ear. "But did you not know my face?" he asked. "Am I so strangely altered?"

She paused a moment ere she replied, and her eyes were full of unshed tears.

"You did not know, then, Lomellino? You had not heard of my misfortune?"

"Never. What is it, dear lady? I thought that fate had already done its worst for you when we met before."

"True. Your words are a rebuke, although I know you did not intend it. I must be brave, Lomellino, and tell you that I am blind—hopelessly, irretrievably blind!"

He turned pale for a moment, but, recovering himself, he said—

"And if so, dearest lady, will you not give me a right to walk ever by your side, to direct your steps, to love and protect you always, as he would have done, him whose loss you so bitterly mourned? Say, will you not permit me to be to you what he would have been?"

"No, my friend, no. It shall not be said that Orazio Lomellino has bound his free, glad steps, or his spirit, free as the waves over which his vessel glides, to a blind wife. Had it been otherwise—had I not experienced this misfortune, my heart and soul would have answered yes. I knew all your worth long since, and believed you all that was good and noble. God forbid that I should make the world dark to you, because it is so to me."

"Bless you for some of the words you have uttered, and oh, forget the rest! Beloved lady, think better of what you have uttered. Oh, I will so watch you that you shall hardly miss the sight of those dear eyes. Answer me; may I thus guard her who, waking or sleeping, has never been absent from my mind since first we met?"

Who can doubt what that answer was? In the whole world, there was not, perhaps, a happier pair than Lomellino and his blind wife. As he had promised, so did he perform. No cloud of distrust ever came between them; and when the auburn locks of Sofonisba changed to silver gray, she seemed dearer to his heart than when in all the flush of her youthful beauty. He lived to watch those footsteps until they disappeared over the river; nor were they long separated.

There is something inexpressibly touching in this union, something which rises far above the level of ordinary love. To us, it is absolutely glorious. Woman, we know, is born to grief and love; but when a man steps aside from his triumphal career, to shed light over a darkened life, it is glorious. It is as when the sons of God came down to love the daughters of men. Let the memory of Orazio Lomellino be embalmed with all that is good and noble, while woman has a heart to feel or a tear to give.

LORD STANLEY.

The government of our Indian Empire was the principal topic which engaged the attention of parliament during the last session. The revolt of the native troops, the general disaffection of the country, the incompetence of existing institutions demanded for the subjugation of India, and the re-establishment of our government in that important and valuable dependency, a vigorous and decisive policy. The necessity for a change was evident—a change that must be begun, and carried on with zeal and activity. The old system had failed. The century which had elapsed between the victory of Plassey and the outbreak at Meerut, had seen many changes in India, but none so complete as that which was imperatively called for by the disastrous events of eighteen hundred and fifty-seven. To the proposition that something must be done beyond the mere suppression of the rebellion by military force, there were few dissentient voices; but what ought to be done,—what would tranquillise the country and consolidate our authority in India, was the question on which various and conflicting opinions were maintained.

On the 12th of January, 1858, Lord Palmerston moved for leave to bring in a bill for transferring the government of India from the East India Company to the British crown. The debate which followed occasioned, it will be remembered, a retrospective examination of our Indian policy from the days of Clive downwards, and it was not till the 18th, that leave to bring in the bill was carried by a majority of 145. The following evening saw the defeat of the Palmerston ministry, on the conspiracy bill, a defeat which brought about the resignation of Lord Palmerston, and the formation of a new cabinet under the Earl of Derby. This circumstance naturally occasioned some delay in the transaction of public business; and it was not till the 26th of March that the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Disraeli) obtained leave to bring in a new Indian bill, for transfer of all authority from the Company to the Crown. This bill, it will be remembered, was, at the suggestion of Lord John Russell, submitted in the form of resolutions to the house. But after nearly three months' slow and wearisome progress, the further consideration of resolutions was abandoned, and an India bill (No. 3) was introduced.

Throughout the debates in the Commons, Lord Stanley was remarkable for his acquaintance with the question in all its bearings, and the complete mastery which he had acquired, not only of its general principles, but of its most minute details. Much had been anticipated of his lordship, but on the Indian question he exceeded the most sanguine expectations, and materially strengthened that reputation for independence, intelligence, and ability which he has enjoyed since his first introduction to public life. It was universally felt that no man was better qualified to deal with the practical working of the Indian bill, than he who had so diligently devoted himself to its progress in the house. It was felt that he had grasped this important topic—that his views were at once comprehensive and circumstantial, and, consequently, his appointment to the newly-created office of Secretary of State for India was a matter of general satisfaction.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD STANLEY, M.P., SECRETARY FOR INDIA, ETC., ETC.

No member of the cabinet is more popular than Lord Stanley, and this is no doubt traceable to one important fact, namely, that he has made for himself the position he holds. Without relying on the accident of birth, he has worked hard, by study and travel, to prepare himself for the responsibility of office. In England we are all, more or less, working men. In our hive of human industry we have no room for drones. Among the wealthier classes a superior education necessarily induces intellectual activity, and men of rank and affluence are ready to devote themselves to labour in the service of the state. The state is, indeed, almost the only career open to them. It is not surprising that a man of such a class, possessing ability or ambition, should desire to appear before the public in his own character, and to stand on his own merits: that he should look for fame and honour where such distinctions can be won, not priding himself on his rank, but his worth. When, as in the case of Lord Stanley, we observe a young nobleman devoting himself to the public service, actuated less by personal ambition than by a desire to be really useful in his generation, when we notice him giving his energies, not to party, but to mankind, we are ready to do him the honour which he deserves, rendering homage not to the virtue of nobility, but to the nobility of virtue.

The following brief outline of Lord Stanley's career will no doubt be interesting to our readers.

Edward Henry Lord Stanley is the eldest son of the Earl of Derby, and was born at Knowsley, July 21, 1826. Brought up at Rugby, he afterwards graduated in classical and mathematical honours at Cambridge. In 1848 he unsuccessfully contested the borough of Lancaster. The young patrician—far from seeking to avail himself of any extraneous advantages which he possessed, or to exercise unduly the political influence of his noble family—was content to take his stand in the arena of public life simply on his own merits. He is, it has been appropriately remarked, one of those men who, if left poor and friendless on Salisbury Plain, would inevitably find their way to wealth and fame. He resolved, as his sire had done before him, to make himself acquainted by personal observation with those questions of policy in which he felt most interest; and accordingly, in 1849, he visited the West Indies; and on his return was brought into public notice by the publication of a letter to Mr. Gladstone, on the "Claims and Resources of the West India Colonies." He also visited Canada and the United States, and during his absence had the honour of being elected member for Lynn. In 1853 the church-rate question was brought before the House of Commons. Previous to the debate Lord Stanley made public his views on the subject in a pamphlet, in which he advocated the entire abolition of church-rates throughout the kingdom, on the ground that "a prominent cause of dissension and heart-burning would disappear, and that from the English statute-book the stigma of an ancient and still existing injustice would be wiped out."

In the debates on the Newspaper Stamp Act, Lord Stanley proved himself a man of the people; he dwelt upon the great benefit to popular education which would follow the repeal of the newspaper stamp—the most injurious of the taxes on knowledge. And the result of the agitation in which he bore so conspicuous a part, has given to us a press unrestricted by a stamp, a press of which we confidently anticipate the complete emancipation in the repeal of the paper duty.

On the death of Sir W. Molesworth, in 1855, the colonial secretaryship was offered by Lord Palmerston to Lord Stanley. This office was, however, declined. This affair was alike honourable to Palmerston and Stanley. It was a recognition on the premier's part of Lord Stanley's talent, and his refusal was honourable to that young nobleman, as an evidence of his loyalty to the principles of his party. More recently, Lord Stanley has proposed a scheme for establishing public libraries and reading-rooms throughout the rural districts. Beginning with the county of Norfolk, it is recommended to establish five central libraries, each to contain about 5,000 volumes. The cost is estimated at 4s. a volume, which, with an allowance for furniture, &c., would imply an outlay of £1,200 for each library, or £6,000 for the whole. "When one considers," says Lord Stanley, "what sums are recklessly wasted by the richer classes in this country on objects of mere selfish luxury or pleasure, it is difficult to imagine that such a sum should not be forthcoming, if only the importance of the end to be gained were once duly estimated." He also proposes that every village should have a reading-room, supplied with books from the central dépôt, and to which the admission should be at a low rate. Other persons have suggested that coffee and tea should be supplied at cost price in the reading-room, and that it should approach, as closely as possible, to the character of a club, or place for social meeting and recreation. There is no reason whatever why the poor man should not have his club as well as the rich—why he should not have his newspaper and his coffee without being compelled to pay more than he can reasonably afford. We hope to see such a day arrive, and we believe that its arrival will be accelerated by the efforts of such men as Lord Stanley, who are working efficiently in the cause of social amelioration. In the last election Lord Stanley was again returned for Lynn, and was re-elected, without opposition, on accepting office under Lord Derby's administration.

Lord Stanley studiously devotes himself to statesmanship as the business of life. "It has been so long the fashion," says a recent writer, "to rate everything here by the parliamentary standard only, that statesmanship properly scarcely exists. We have debates in plenty, but no Metternichs or Chesterfields, while of the earlier and higher class of philosophic statesmen—men who studied history, and at the same time their own age as part of history—a specimen is as rare as the capercaillie is in Scotland. Without the pedantry of a doctinaire, Lord Stanley has the speculative seriousness of a student, and unites with that a most attentive observation of the living time, without which no man can be worth a straw as a practical politician."

THE BATHS OF EMS.

ONCE upon a time, before our amicable relations with the continent rendered it possible for tourists to go abroad in search of a summer tour, Bath, Cheltenham, and other English spas were acknowledged to have some attractions, and were, in fact, places of favourite resort. But the rage for travel has robbed our own country of its charm; and to go up the Rhine, to pass a season in Paris, to ascend Mont Blanc, and, above all, to visit the German watering places, is that which everybody who is anybody is expected to do.

The German spas have peculiar attractions of their own. It might be difficult to state in what manner those attractions exceed the picturesque beauty and comfortable accommodation of many a pleasant spot within the British islands. But all the world pronounces in favour of the spas, and to the spas goes the world of fashion in the fashionable season.

Among the spas of Germany Ems is becoming a favourite resort, and during the season its appearance is exceedingly animated, and presents an endless moving panorama, cosmopolitan in its character, but having an English Croesus for its centre. Of course, all sorts of people are there in search of everything; invalids in search of health; used-up people in search of quiet; people in search of novelty, of change, and of money—for there are sharpers there as at all the spas, and intriguers, and enterprising folk of all kinds, preying on the visitors, and bleeding Croesus sadly.

The locality is very agreeable, and one might search in vain for a pleasanter spot for a summer vacation. The air is soft and balmy. The properties of the water are said to be very useful in pulmonary diseases and nervous complaints. The ancient Romans were acquainted with their virtues in this respect, but by the moderns they were not recognised till within the last thirty years.

The waters are dispensed to the visitors in the Kurhaus, the old castle of the grand duke. A gallery of English shops unites the Kurhaus to the Kursaal, or grand casino. This building was erected in 1839, and contains a reading-room, a ball-room, refreshment rooms, and the never to be omitted, but ever to be lamented, gaming-tables. The principal building next to the Kurhaus is the Hotel of the Four Towers, an old and picturesque structure, affording capital accommodation to Milord Anglais, or any one else with plenty of money in his pockets—which money, on the continent, an Englishman is never supposed to be without.

In the neighbourhood of Ems there are several pleasant walks and drives. There is the garden—an Arcadia on a small scale—which conducts by a grove of linden trees to the Moorshutte mountain, bristling with craggy points, and having a rotunda on its summit; there is the old castle of Sporkenberg; Nassau, with its two castles and gothic tower; a delightful two-hours' trip along the banks of the Rhine brings you to Coblenz; a carriage will convey you to Ehrenbreitstein, Mayence, Frankfort, or Wiesbaden; while the pastoral districts and the valley of the Lahn offer every attraction to those who love the green wood, and the daisy-spangled meadow.

Ems has no historic interest; kings have not made it famous by their regal state, nor conquerors by their prowess. It has never been favoured by the one, nor ravaged by the other. Its career has been devoid of any startling incident, any remarkable event, and has flowed on as placidly as its own river. It is only as a spa that it is now becoming populous, but as a spa its popularity is on the increase.

HOPE EVERMORE;

SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER CXXIII.

Who can school the heart's affection?
Who can banish its regret
If you blame my deep dejection,
Teach, oh teach me to forget.—HAYNES BATLEY.

NESSY FITZ-DARRELL quitted Burnside with a very heavy heart, for she was as much in love with Greville as ever. Lady Arncliffe, on receiving the sad news of her mother's malady and her brother's death, had left her husband at home, where he was still in very delicate health, and had repaired to Burnside, but merely to find that, in such a case, affection can do nothing, and that time alone can heal such wounds as her mother's.

Lord Glenlonely had not recovered from his attack of gout, he was still confined to his bed, and Hope hovered about like a ministering angel; now watching over the bereaved mother, sometimes wild with agony, and anon all heartrending gentleness in her sorrow; then reading to, talking to, praying with the kind old lord, or communing with Ada of a happier world beyond the skies. It was thus that all was going on at Burnside, when one day Hope was sent for from Lady Glenlonely's room, where that miserable lady was sitting on the floor, talking, in fancy, with "her son—her Eaglescliff!" and drawing tears from Hope's eyes by the exquisite pathos which people thus afflicted seem to have at will.

It was so unusual to summon Hope from her ladyship's room, that she asked of the footman, who knocked at the door, if anything was the matter; and a vague, ominous dread, a presentiment of evil, blanched her cheeks and trembled at her heart.

The man said there was nothing now the matter as far as he knew, but that a gentleman on business had asked for his lordship. Hope knew that one of Lord Glenlonely's solicitors was daily expected, and she supposed it was he. She knocked gently at the door of the library, and on hearing a deep voice say "Come in," she obeyed.

Lady Arncliffe had that very morning left to return to her husband, but on the hearth-rug, with his back to the fire, stood that same stranger, with the glittering serpent eyes, the handsome sneering nose, the cruel mouth, and bird-like claws, whom she had seen with Greville on the morning after the news of Lord Eaglescliff's death had driven his mother mad.

Hope shuddered, she scarce knew why; the blood forsook her cheeks and lips.

The stranger showed his sharp white teeth from ear to ear, and stretched out his long arms with their claw-like fingers. He went towards Hope and said, "My child, behold your father. He is here to claim you; come to his bosom; see, his arms are open to receive you."

"No! no!" cried Hope, "it cannot be! What is your name?"

"Evermore," said the stranger, sternly.

"My father's name was Walter," faltered Hope.

"I have my poor mother's journal to prove it. She says Mr. Evermore was his evil genius."

"That was his cousin, Philip Evermore. Walter Evermore is my name. I was her husband. I am your father."

"But she was married under a feigned name," persisted Hope.

"She was married as Constance Morris, not Claverton, but I was married as what I am, Walter Evermore."

"And who was Sir Augustus?" groaned Hope.

"My father, Sir Augustus Evermore," said the ready liar.

Hope had read and re-read her mother's journal; but although to the reader it, of course, unravels the mystery of her birth, to her it afforded no clue. She had never known her patron but as Lord Glenlonely, never heard him spoken of as Sir Augustus, and though her mother spoke of her lover as Walter, yet she, in her humility and habitual reverence for the Glenlonely family, never dreamed that Walter Lord Eaglescliff could be the Walter of her mother's heart.

"Why should I claim you, were you not my child? You are poor, forlorn, dependent; none but a father would covet a creature so desolate. But I, I love you better than if you were an heiress! I long to atone for years of involuntary desertion. I am the Walter your mother loved. Oh, child, has your heart no instinct of affection? Come!"

Hope made one step forward as if to comply, but before she reached the stranger, who remained on the rug (his arms outstretched to embrace her), strength and consciousness forsook her, and she fell on the floor in a death-like swoon.

It was some time before Hope recovered, and when she did so, she was not like an orphan restored to a parent; she was more like a doomed one claimed by a malignant spirit—so bewildered, so pale, so trembling, so cold, rigid, and aghast did she sit and watch the pale, strange features of her newly-found father.

However, he had proved his claim to Lord Glenlonely. He had convinced him of his right to the sole guardianship of Hope; and he had established a sort of claim to the friendship of his lordship, by the irresistible and numerous letters and other proofs he had of his long and close intimacy with Eaglescliff, the beloved and lamented son. And now the greatest trial came. He wanted to take his daughter away with him. He said that she could be of no further use just then—he said it in his gentlest tone. But when Lady Glenlonely recovered—as he felt sure she would—enough to miss her, one line should bring her back to Burnside. At present his long-lost girl was necessary to him, to put his house in order, and establish something like a home.

A father's wishes were laws; and Hope, wildly weeping, tore herself from those kind early friends, accused herself of unnatural, unfeeling harshness when she felt herself shudder at the idea of home with such a father; and, after shedding floods of tears, was lifted by her father's long twining arms into a travelling carriage, and whirled away with him whither he would. All this time no line from Larky Grigg; no comfort, no trust, no hope but in Heaven! After they had travelled some hours in this elegant and well-appointed carriage, they came to a railway station; and Mr. Evermore remarking they were just in time, he hastily secured tickets, and handed Hope into a first-class carriage.

Mr. Evermore then took sundry papers from his pockets and gave himself up to their perusal, and Hope, worn out with sleepless nights and intense misery, fell fast asleep.

She did not wake till the train stopped, and Mr. Evermore told her that the rest of the journey would be performed in the carriage.

Hope had no idea where she was, but she had caught the word "Warkworth," as pronounced by a railway porter, and then she remembered Hotspur talks of "this our worm-eaten hold of Wark," and she recalled a ballad about the Hermit of Warkworth, and she knew she was near the borders and the sea, and not far from Ducal Alnwick, and in the cold, bleak Northumbria, where poor Corinne suffered so much.

"Well, my dear, how do you feel now?" asked Mr. Evermore, kissing Hope's cold cheek, and handing her a cup of tea, as he seated her on a sofa in the waiting-room.

"Better, I thank you, sir," faltered Hope.

"Will you never learn to call me 'papa,' my child?" said Mr. Evermore.

"I will try to do so, sir—papa, I mean," said poor Hope, while her tears almost choked her.

"Mind you do so, my love," said Mr. Evermore; "I am not strict or exacting, but I require prompt and implicit obedience: I exact it even from my nephew, how much more, then, from my own child."

"Is your nephew grown up, sir—I mean papa?" asked Hope, timidly.

"Silly child! Do you not know, then, who my nephew is?"

"No, papa."

"Well, then, you shall have a most delightful surprise when you get to the hall."

"Do I know him, sir—papa?"

"Yes, and love him, too, or I am much mistaken."

"Indeed, I love no gentleman, no man, but—"

"But whom?" asked Mr. Evermore, in a voice that made her start.

"But Larky Grigg," whispered her poor, desolate heart; but her trembling tongue faltered, "but you, papa; at least, there is no other gentleman I ought to love, is there, sir?"

"We'll see all about that," said Mr. Evermore, patting her cheek. "Come now, if you are rested and quite warm; here's the carriage."

Hope felt as if she was in a dream, but she let her father lift her into the carriage, and away they went through the dark night, and the wild, bleak country; and she saw, by the starlight, dark pines and the winding, beautiful Coquet, dancing and gliding along; and then they passed through open gates, and a long avenue of Scotch firs, and they approached a large, low building, like a manor-house, and dogs barked, and bells rang, and lights came, and doors flew open, and a gentleman lifted her out of the carriage into the hall, and as he kissed her cheek, and said, "Welcome to your home, sweet cousin," she recognised Rashleigh Greville.

Alas, poor Hope!

CHAPTER CXXIV.

From spot to spot they hurry me,
To banish my regret;
And if they win a smile from me,
They think that I forget.—HAYNES BATLEY.

THE reader must bear in mind that much of what we are about to narrate as the adventures of our dear Hope Evermore occurred while her true lover, Larky Grigg, was lying at Mrs. McDougal's sick, almost unto death; and that, in addition to all her other trials, she was overwhelmed by anxiety as to his fate, and could only suppose that letters which she imagined he must have addressed to her, and those which she constantly wrote to him, were suppressed or intercepted. But for this ever-haunting anxiety about one whose love and constancy she never for one moment permitted herself to doubt, Hope's life at Coquet Dale Hall would not have been an unpleasant one.

In a part of the country generally bleak and barren, and where nature does so little, art had created a garden of beauty and verdure. The hall was a long, quaint, ivy-grown, old-fashioned manor-house, low and roomy; the roof was of red tiles, as is the fashion in Northumberland, and the walls were completely draped with the dark ivy, the loveliest of parasites.

The estate boasted a great extent of moor, and wood, and water, spreading for miles along the banks of the Coquet; but there were flower-gardens, shrubberies, lawns, and kitchen-gardens, an old-fashioned parterre, a terrace, and a conservatory.

The furniture was in some of the rooms bright and modern, in some quaint, prim, and old.

Mr. Evermore had hired this hall with its right of fishing and shooting, and, to Hope's great relief, she found that these amusements served to fill up the days of her father and his nephew, and that, after an early breakfast, at which she was expected to preside, she saw nothing more of them till a late dinner. After dinner Mr. Evermore generally fell asleep in his arm-chair, and Captain Greville would propose music, chess, or backgammon, or sometimes read a touching poem or amusing novel aloud while Hope worked or drew. Certainly, as a companion, Rashleigh Greville was charming; and, as he now never made the slightest allusion to his love, Hope began to believe he had ceased to covet her affection or her hand, and now treated her with the affectionate familiarity of a sister.

Mr. Evermore was very reserved, rather haughty, stern, and passionate, and Hope was very much afraid of him; but Rashleigh Greville always threw himself into the breach in her defence: if anything she had done or ordered gave any offence, he took all the blame upon himself. He advised her in the gentlest, kindest manner possible, how to carry herself towards all so as least to avoid censure, and he shielded her in the most delicate and adroit manner from the ridicule and quizzing with which her father delighted to wound and alarm her.

Whatever she even hinted a wish for, whether a book, a piece of music, a flower, a toy, anything to wear, even anything to eat or drink, Rashleigh contrived to obtain it for her.

He was not as he had been at Burnside—often moody, jealous, watchful, and exacting; he was all kindness, gentleness, good-humour, and mirth.

Hope cordially liked so kind a cousin, and had not a deep and holy love for her affianced Larky filled her heart, she might easily have been won, not, perhaps, to feel for him any ardent love, but an affection that would have justified her in accepting his hand; but, as it was, no thought of Hope ever strayed from the dear absent object of her long and deep devotion.

About this time Mr. Evermore and Captain Greville were called to town on business, and Hope was left alone at the hall.

It was rather dull in this remote seclusion for the young girl, but Warkworth was only a mile distant, and close to the sea. A little pony phaeton had been left at Hope's disposal, and, as it was very fine, warm, sunny, autumnal weather, and some young ladies of Warkworth, with whom Hope was slightly acquainted, were in the habit of bathing in the sea, and sailing about, Hope resolved to bathe too, and to join them in an expedition, partaking of the nature of a pic-nic, to Coquet Island.

These young ladies (the Misses Merryweather) had called at the hall, and been cordially received by Mr. Evermore, who had taken Hope with him to return the visit. They were the daughters of a half-pay captain, of whom Mr. Evermore had known something in India. They were high-spirited, good-humoured, daring, rosy girls; and they took a great fancy to Hope, who found their company a relief from the monotony of solitary seclusion. Hope greatly enjoyed her baths in the open sea with these frank and cheerful girls; who used to pitch a tent by way of a bathing-machine, bring with them an old Northumbrian nurse to keep off all intruders, and then sport like naiads, or swim like mermaids, on the bosom of the great German Ocean.

One day, the birthday of the youngest Miss Merryweather, Annie, it was arranged that the whole party should hire a sailing-boat, and, taking baskets of provisions with them, sail to Coquet Island, and picnic there.

The Merryweather girls left Hope seated by the sea, while they went to engage a sailing-boat, and to procure the necessary refreshments. While Hope sat on a large sea-beaten mass of stone, watching the Merryweathers bargaining with some boatmen, she suddenly felt a strong hand laid upon her shoulder, and looking round, beheld a face which she recognised at once as that of her old schoolfellow, Meg Grimes—alias Carrotty Meg, alias Potato-heels; while at the same moment that she exclaimed "Meg!" the other threw her arms round her neck; and sobbed out "Hope, dear little, kind, motherly Hope! sweet Hope! good, kind, darling Hope, Hope Evermore!"

It was very touching to see the affectionate meeting (after long years of separation) of these two girls, whose bond dated from early childhood, and dear old ragged school days. How much they had to say, and how pleased Hope was to hear that Meg was grown "ever so steady," and was married to Stunning Steenie—Steenie Strutt, who had turned over a new leaf, given up bad company and evil courses, resisted temptation, even when hunger was on the tempter's side, and was become, as his bride said, with a flush of honest pride, as good as gold, all along of Mr. Stephen, Jem Goodman, and the dear old Green Fields' Ragged School.

Meg told Hope, to the great delight of the latter, that she had seen Larky—seen him the night before, quite well again after a severe illness, and that he was gone to Deal; and when Hope elicited that he was thinking of emigrating, and wept bitterly at the sad thought, Meg prophesied that such a bright, steady, likely lad would make his fortune out there, and soon return, a made man, to claim his bride.

Hope was much rejoiced to find that Meg—now Mrs. Steenie Strutt—was spending a month's leave, which Steenie had got for good behaviour and to get married, on a visit to an old mate, who had left the service, taken to himself a wife, and let out a sailing-boat, which he accompanied by way of a livelihood, having succeeded to the boat and a good connection in right of his wife, whose father for fifty years had owned the only pleasure-boat in the whole place.

"Then that is the boat we are going to sail in to the Coquet Island, I doubt not," said Hope.

"In course it is," said Meg, "and my Steenie, Stunning Steenie, and another lad'll take you there; so I must say good-bye: I'm no company for them fine ladies, tho' I be for you, as is fit to be their queen. Hope, do come and see us in Sal's little cottage—we must have a good long talk. You see that curious-looking little house?—that's he."

"I will come to-morrow morning," said Hope, "and then you must promise to come to the hall (where I am all alone), to see me."

"And my Steenie too?" asked Meg.

"Of course. I long to shake hands with Stunning Steenie—honest Steenie now."

Upon this, Meg put her two hands to her large vermilion mouth, and gave a loud and shrill halloo, which brought Steenie to her side.

Hope extended her little hand. It was so lady-like, so white, so delicate, that Steenie seemed afraid to touch it. He stood first on one leg, and then on the other, twirled his straw hat on his bent knuckles, and at last saying, "Why, thee ain't a bit changed, Hope, only bigger; and no pride, tho' thee's so beautiful and so raal a lady—the same kind, dear, blessed Hope!" and with the sleeve of his jacket he wiped away a tear.

The other lad now came to say the boat was ready, and Meg watched them all embark—

"Youth at the prow, and Pleasure at the helm."

They had a pleasant day on that barren little island, remarkable for nothing but its lighthouse, its desolation, and the countless nests, full of eggs, of the wildest sea-birds.

Meg was watching eagerly for the boat and her beloved Steenie, and Hope promised to come down soon, and have a long talk with her of old times, and better days to come; and said when she did come she should take Meg back with her to the hall.

CHAPTER CXXV.

His love to her more odious was Than hate.—OLD PLAY.

WHEN Hope arrived at the hall, she found that Mr. Evermore and Captain Greville had returned. She went at once to her own room to change her dress, and while thus engaged a servant came to summon her to the library, where her father and her cousin were expecting her to pour out their tea. Hope dispatched her toilet as rapidly as possible, and hastened to join them.

She thought they both looked flushed, excited, and pre-occupied; but they received her with marked affection, and told her they had brought her some very pretty things, which they would present to her after tea. Hope felt anxious and uncomfortable. She scarce knew why; but there was something mysterious and sinister in the glances they exchanged.

After tea, when the things were removed and the servant gone, Mr. Evermore suddenly produced a case of jewels. They were a very pretty and tasteful, but not a very expensive set of turquoise and pearls, with a few small central brilliants.

There were a tiara, ear-rings, necklace, bracelets, and Sevigné brooch. There was also a plain gold ring—a wedding-ring—of the small circumference of Hope's very slender finger.

Hope raised her large blue eyes to her father's face, and thence to Captain Greville's, while a terrible spasm of terror contracted her heart, and blanched her cheeks and lips.

"It is time to speak out, my dear Hope," said Mr. Evermore, but without looking at her; indeed, he never did look any one in the face—he always spoke (as insincere people often do) with averted eyes. "Of course you are prepared for this event, but may not have expected it to take place so soon. However, circumstances compel me to go abroad almost immediately, and I am resolved to see you both happy before I go. This is my bridal present; if my fortune equalled my love and your merits, dear child, it should have been ten times more splendid and more valuable. I have arranged everything so that your nuptials, my Hope, may be celebrated as privately as possible at Warkworth to-morrow morning. Your wedding-dress and trousseau you will find in your dressing-room, and I hope the little I have been able to do is well done. Speak, my dear Rashleigh, and tell your wondering cousin that though you may both marry in haste, it shall be your care that she shall not repent at leisure."

"Hope—dear, dear Hope!" said Greville, almost as deadly pale as herself, tears sparkling in his eyes, and his voice husky with emotion (for he was passionately in love with her). "Beloved Hope! It is not my fault that your father has named a day too early to be, I perceive, agreeable to you. I would serve seven years, like Jacob, in the expectation of your hand, and another seven for the blissful realisation of so sweet a dream; but as your father has decreed that we are to be married to-morrow morning—"

"At nine precisely," said Mr. Evermore.

"No father! no cousin!" at length gasped poor Hope; "neither to-morrow nor any other day. I told you, Captain Greville, when first you broached this subject, that I never could be yours. I repeat it now. And, in spite of my father's frown, I feel it my duty to say, I never will!"

"Your reason, if you please, most dutiful and obedient daughter!" hissed Mr. Evermore, white with passion.

"I am affianced to another, sir!" said Hope, the colour returning to her cheeks, and the love-light to her eyes; "one whom I have loved from my earliest infancy—one who, when I was a miserable, abandoned orphan, loved and cherished me—one to whose parents I owe everything—one to whom my hand and heart are solemnly pledged in the sight of the Father of the orphan—one for whom I will live or die as that Father shall appoint; but one whom I will never resign—never betray—never forsake!"

"And this fine suitor of yours, madam!" almost screamed Mr. Evermore, "is, if I mistake not, a low wretch; who was a ragged-school boy; then an iron-monger's apprentice; now a worthless, idle fellow, living by his wits—son of a woman who keeps, or kept, an apple-stall, and a man who beats carpets and goes on errands."

"Sir!" said Hope, her eyes flashing and her cheeks glowing, "that same applewoman and that poor porter saved me from the union. To that angel, in the homely garb of an applewoman, my poor mother, who died in a lying-in hospital, recommended me. She left me to her care from the hour of my hapless birth; for she said she had a prospective certainty that I should be that unhappy creature—a woman. She it was who begged Apple Blossom to take charge of me, her then unborn child; to bring me up in that rank of life in which woman is not merely a toy, and if she had a son to promote an attachment, as what she most dreaded for her daughter was the short-lived, selfish love of some man of fashion and pleasure; and all she exacted was a promise that her child should be secluded from all such peace-destroying, heart-breaking deceivers. Sir, this good, kind creature (a mother I shall ever esteem her) did what the dying lady asked of her. The poor have ever a morsel to spare for the utterly destitute. I was brought up by her as her own; I went to that noble Christian institution, which the angel of mercy put it into the hearts of good men to establish—the Green Fields' Ragged School; I learnt to read my Bible, and to love it, too; I learnt to love the noble, manly boy, my poor mother, on her deathbed, wished me to love; I became through that very ragged school known to the noble family in which you found me; I was educated by that family to be a companion to a lady of rank, but outward polish did not work any change in my inward heart. The more I saw of the rich and great, the more I loved and revered the poor and lowly. I would be content with the sort of home in which my happy childhood was spent, but my future husband—though a working man—has an ambition for me which I have not for myself. He has great genius—mechanical genius of the highest order—and with it, the lofty aspirations and innate consciousness of power, which true genius gives. He is a self-educated man, and therefore a man of power, will, energy. He will not claim my hand till he has achieved a position, a fame, and a fortune, which will make him eligible even in the world's eyes. I might say in those of my family, now. But when I plighted my troth I had no family. Such, father, such, cousin, is the history of my engagement, and I do not think that there exists that man of feeling so cold, or of honour so sullied, that he would not say, 'Be kind and true to him, who has been so kind and true to you.'"

"Mistaken and most romantic simpleton," said Mr. Evermore. "You see before you two men of nice feeling and high honour, who not only say you must forget this low, designing villain—"

"Stop, sir!" cried Hope. "I will not hear him thus maligned. He is my intended, and with God's blessing he shall be my husband!"

Mr. Evermore strode to a side table, on which stood a case. Hope, with distended eyes, pale lips, and panting breast, saw him take out two pistols. He came up to her, holding one in each hand, ready cocked.

"Now, mark me, girl," he said. "I am a proud man, and a desperate man; pride makes me resolve on your giving up this degrading connection with this clod, this knave, this costermonger. The desperate state of my affairs makes me resolve on your marriage with my nephew—an arrangement which, for reasons I cannot pause to explain, will prevent the ruin, and insure the prosperity of all parties. If you this moment promise to marry your cousin at nine o'clock to-morrow morning, I will forgive all, forget all, and take you back to my favour and my heart. If you persist in this indelicate, unfeminine, undutiful preference of a low wretch, I, with this pistol, will blow out your brains; and then, as I do not wish to trouble Calcraft, or put the government to unnecessary expense, with this I will put an end to a life which your low tastes must disgrace, and your undutiful behaviour render miserable. Now, wilful and perverted girl, make your selection. Your bridegroom is Death or Rashleigh Greville. Is he not fairer than his rival?"

"Oh, Hope!" cried Greville. "Have pity on me, on yourself, on your father!"

Hope stood pale, resolute, rigid as marble, and almost as white. It was impossible that she should not feel an agony of mortal terror at her poor woman heart, but she did not betray it. She looked Mr. Evermore steadily in the face, and his eyes, which he strove hard not to avert, quailed before her gaze. In one rapid moment it occurred to her that if she could gain time, she might yet escape from these ruffians. Father, or no father, she felt he was a ruffian: but yet she must temporise, parley—for Larky Grigg's sake, as well as her own, she must not exasperate this cruel, remorseless, terrible man!

So she said very gently, "I am agitated, overpowered, shaken—give me two hours to reflect, to collect my scattered senses, to recover my reasoning powers. I will not answer you while you intimidate me thus. Let me retire to my own room for two hours. It is now nine, at eleven come to fetch me; you may lock me in if you will, and surely my cousin would prefer a consent not wrung from me with a pistol at my ear!"

"Oh, uncle," said Greville, "let it be as Hope wishes. I see a relenting something in her eye; I hear a consenting softness in her voice. Give her the two hours she begs for. I know you will have reason, as all have, to rejoice in the results of the 'wisdom of mercy.'"

"Be it so," said Mr. Evermore, replacing the pistols. "Come then," and he took her hand and led her to her own room, and as he removed the key from the inside of the lock to the outside, he added, "Go to your dressing-room and look at your bridal-dress and trousseau, and let them speak for me."

He locked the door, and Hope was alone. A bright wood fire burned in the large grate. She lighted a candle, and went into the dressing-room (a small, light closet); but not to waste moments so precious on her bridal finery, though the orange wreath and veil, the white dress and bouquet were laid out with the trousseau. Hope remembered that the gardener had that very day been pruning the ivy, and as he had been suddenly called away to drive her to Warkworth, she hoped he had not yet had time or thought to remove the ladder.

It was so; there it stood. Rapidly Hope put on her bonnet and mantle, and took what money she had, and a few necessities, tying them up in a bundle. Then she softly opened the window, descended the ladder, and sped like one pursued by fiends, through the shrubbery and across the fields—a short cut to Warkworth.

CHAPTER CXXVI.

"Queen of the night, how I bless thy light!"
Cried the maid, as a wild hope rushed
Through her whirling brain, and again and again,
Her breast's quick throbbings she hushed.

THE moon, which had been behind a cloud, came out bright as day, to light the poor, persecuted, true-hearted girl.

She met with no living creature, no impediment on her lonely way, and never for one moment relaxed her speed, or ceased to hurry on, until she found herself face to face with the moonlit ocean, and at the door of the little cottage where Stunning Steenie and his bride, Meg, were staying on their bridal visit to his former mate.

The whole party were at supper when Hope knocked at the door. Red-herrings, fried onions, and, alas! grog, formed their repast.

With the ready sympathy of this kindly class, they drew Hope to the fire, and eagerly questioned her. Her tale was soon told, and deep and earnest was the pity she elicited; and loudly Stunning Steenie declared that Hope Evermore and Larky Grigg had been sweethearts from dear old ragged school days; and that, no fine, tawdry popinjay of a captain should put Larky's nose out of joint; and as for a father—a father who leaves his child to sink or swim for seventeen years, wasn't half so much of a father as he who fed, and clothed, and reared her like Bob Blossom had done; and the poorer and lower down Bob was, the more his good action raised him up; and he'd stand by and show fight to the last, rather than see true love crossed, and if ever there was genuine true love, it was the love of Hope Evermore and Larky Grigg.

This oration concluded—a council of war was held, and good, sweet Hope was equipped in the dress of a Northumbrian fish wife—there being, luckily, one belonging to a young girl, a niece of the mate's wife, lying in a chest in the adjoining room. Meg then hid Hope's abundance of golden hair under a thick white cap—clothed her delicate form in a red jacket and short blue cloth petticoat, which displayed her neat ankle and charming little foot—gave her a pair of plaid stockings, and shoes with buckles, and a large shepherd's plaid scarf, to throw over her head and round her person.

Stunning Steenie then proposed that Hope's bonnet and cloak should be thrown on the beach, so that when her flight was discovered, and her steps, perhaps, tracked down to the sea, it might seem as though she had thrown herself from the rude wooden pier, and thus escaped to that shore whither none would wish to follow her. "And now, Meg," said Stunning Steenie, "if we can but hide Hope up for to-night, I think, to-morrow, at dawn, we may smuggle her aboard the 'Fair Betsy,' bound for Poplar, and then she'll get to London easy. Then, may be, she'll go at on'st to Apple Blossom."

"No," said Hope, blushing deeply. "I shall go to Lady Arncliffe."

"In course," said Meg, "Hope wouldn't like to go seeking out Larky Grigg, 'tain't likely."

"Why, you seeked me out," said Steenie.

"I never done nothink of the sort," answered Meg, giving him a good sound "clout on the head," "so hold your jaw, and don't make your brags; or I'll learn you better."

Steenie laughed, and hugged his Meg.

Just at this moment, and when Hope was completely arrayed in her picturesque costume, there was a sound of voices and steps outside the door, and angrily a man desired to be let in. Hope, recognising her father's voice, grew deadly pale, and fainted away.

"The best thing she could have done," said Meg; "lift her on to that table in the next room; throw this white sheet over her, and we'll make 'em think she's a dead lodger of ours."

No sooner said than done. Hope, still insensible, was laid on a table covered with a sheet; and Meg, her head shrouded in her apron, sat at her head, pretending to cry, and rock herself in her grief.

After a short interval the door was opened.

"I have reason to believe my daughter, Miss Evermore, is here," said Mr. Evermore.

"There ain't no lady here but ourselves and our poor dead lodger in there," said Stunning Steenie. "We don't know no ladies: ladies ain't fit company for us."

"But you're welcome to look and satisfy your mind," sobbed Meg, from under her apron. "Would you like to see this here dear cretur? The small-pox made short work with her."

"Oh, by no means," said Mr. Evermore, who had a great horror of infection and of the dead; "I'm sorry I disturbed you—beg pardon, I was misinformed." And he hurried away just in time, as Hope began to recover, and, with a deep sigh, pushed away the sheet; and Meg, helping her to rise, having first secured the outer door, gave her a cup of tea, and what revived her still more—an account of her father's unsuccessful visit.

Hope remained with these kind friends till dawn, when Stunning Steenie and his Meg got her on board the "Fair Betsy," bound for Poplar. It was a collier's vessel, but the rough men were very kind to the delicate girl. They tended her as if she had been a sick child, and the captain's wife was as a mother to her.

No accident befell her, and the passage was a very good and quick one. She landed at Poplar, slept at a quiet little inn, and proceeded next morning to London.

Lady Arncliffe was not in town, nor was Miss St. Ange, so Hope hastened to the Green Fields Ragged School. There she heard from Mr. Stephen that Apple Blossom was lying very ill with low fever, brought on by anxiety about Larky, who had not been heard of for six weeks or more; and he so strongly advised Hope to go to her that Hope complied.

Apple Blossom was rejoiced to see Hope; and Hope nursed her as if she had been her daughter.

Some days passed, and Hope's excellent nursing and comforting conversation, and her recent tidings of Larky Grigg, did wonders for Apple Blossom.

Hope and Apple Blossom were sitting one evening reading the Bible, just before going to bed—Bob was away, on a gardening job in the country, and Merry Blossom, whose wedding day was fixed, was expected home on the morrow—when suddenly a clear, sweet whistle was heard—the air, "Sally in our Alley." Hope started to her feet, and listened eagerly; Apple Blossom clasped her hands and cried—

"Listen, listen! Hope, that's Larky's whistle—that's my boy—bless him, that's my darling son!"

The whistle drew nearer, clearer, louder, and the next moment the well-known step was heard, the dear hand lifted the latch, Larky Grigg rushed in, and falling on his knees before his mother, buried his face in her lap, and said—

"Mother, I did write. I meant to emigrate, but chance threw your advertisement in my way; and, though fortune beckoned me on, love and duty sent me back, and here I am! Mother! kiss me! bless me! oh, my mother!"

"There's some one else to kiss and bless thee, my son," sobbed Apple Blossom, as Hope knelt by his side, and put her arms round his neck, and her cheek close to his.

Who shall paint their joy?

"Ye who have said that this world has no pleasure,
Gaze on that mother who weeps o'er her boy;
Gaze on that maiden who smiles on her treasure,
And own that true love is a source of true joy."

CHAPTER CXXVII.

In early youth what heart has never known
Thought, feeling, taste, congenial to his own?
Who hath not felt with rapture-stricken frame,
The power of grace—the magic of a name?

CAMPBELL.

For some few happy days Larky Grigg and his beloved Hope shared the now pleasing task of nursing Apple Blossom. Stunning Steenie's crafty device of throwing Hope's bonnet and mantle on the beach had completely succeeded.

Mr. Evermore and Captain Greville beheld these relics (as they considered them) with horror and dismay—Evermore, on account of his bold and intricate plot, which was ruined by what he believed to be the death of Hope; and Captain Greville, who was passionately in love with this innocent, beautiful, and virtuous Hope, suffered all the anguish of disappointed affection; and, imagining that his suit had driven her to this act of desperation, found the late remorse of love for ever gnawing at his heart. All the delights of the present, all hopes for the future, all comfort in the past, were gone for him. A violent and dangerous attack of illness, brought on partly by exposure to the night air in search of Hope, and partly by anguish of mind—stretched him on a sick bed at the Hall. Mr. Evermore had not only to deplore the loss of Hope, but to watch in terror and anguish by the bedside of the only being he really loved on earth—Rashleigh Greville.

Hope was very happy in the company of her true and only love; but neither Larky Grigg nor Hope were content to be a burden on poor Apple Blossom.

Larky Grigg was delighted to hear that Jem Goodman and Mr. Stephen had heard of a situation likely to suit him, and one in which his great genius, and his acquired knowledge of mechanics, would be brought into play.

A great ironmaster, who was also a civil engineer, required a steady, gifted young man as a sort of foreman—a clear head, a steady hand, a spotless character, earnest piety, and good manners, were requisites for this situation, and all these our dear Larky possessed in an eminent degree.

Mr. Watson, apprised of Larky Grigg's arrival, appointed an interview; and Apple Blossom, now quite convalescent, proposed to go with him to the great man, and "speak up" (as she said to Hope) for one too bashful to "speak up" for himself.

How nice and clean and tidy the still pretty Apple Blossom made herself look! How sleek were the glossy bands of black hair, that contrasted with that motherly handsome face—pale from recent illness! How pretty the faint flush, that soon came fresh from a mother's heart, made her look! How delicately white and neat were the cap, collar, and cuffs which Hope washed, ironed, and plaited for this great occasion.

How appropriate and judicious were the black silk dress and white shawl, and the new lilac thread gloves! The little straw bonnet and fresh white ribbon, and the large, very white, linen handkerchief, folded up like a book, which, with a good silk umbrella, she kept in her large useful right hand.

Larky, too, was looking his best—at least his mother and Hope thought so. His Sunday best was not too good for this great day. He had as much of the gentleman about him as intellect, noble feeling, good breeding, neatness, and cleanliness can impart to the working man—and that is a great deal.

Hope watched Larky Grigg and Apple Blossom into a cab, and if he did pretend to have forgotten something quite indispensable, and did return in search of it, and that something was a kiss from the rosy lips of his affianced Hope—what youth of feeling and spirit would not have done the same? And what good, loving girl, so situated, would not, like pretty Hope, have hurried him off with that kiss on his lips?

Apple Blossom was a proud and happy woman on that bright autumn day. And well she deserved to be so. She had trained Larky Grigg up in the way he should go, and even when he is old he will not depart from it.

Mr. Watson was a clever-looking, reserved, rather proud man, and so abrupt and magisterial, that Larky felt very shy. But Apple Blossom, in spite of a good deal of "twitter and all-overishness," as she described it to Hope, "spoke up;" and the ice once broken, Larky Grigg took courage, and modestly and briefly answered Mr. Watson's very terse questions.

At the end of a quarter of an hour, Larky was engaged, and Apple Blossom, making a very low country curtsy, with her hands folded before her, and a "Thank you kindly, sir, he's been a good son to me, and I'm sure he'll be a good lad to you," hurried away to the cab, and both returned triumphant to anxious, loving Hope.

Larky's career was henceforth a most prosperous one. His mechanical genius was daily called into play, and his inventive and even creative powers—never speculative, but always under the control of strong common sense and sound judgment. Then, too, his modest, unassuming, but irresistible influence was felt in the workshop, whence, ere long, the force of his example, and the emulation untinted with envy which his endearing goodness excited, banished every coarse word and ribald jest; and where he established that mutual exchange of good offices, and that frank, kindly civility of speech and manners, in which the working man is too often deficient.

But more, far more, far better than this, was the high tone of morality and the earnest spirit of piety which Larky Grigg introduced, where some had been unbelievers, freethinkers, Deists, or at best only professing Christians while practical atheists.

Steddy—never called in Watson's workshop Stutter Steddy—was, through Larky's interest, engaged; and these two good young men persuaded their fellow workmen to join the Christian Young Men's Association, to abstain from all excess of every kind, to spend their money on the mind, not the body—to teach in Sunday schools, and to live as if there were a day of judgment and an eternity of bliss or misery.

Meanwhile, Hope Evermore, having written to Lady Arneliffe and to Ellen St. Ange, had entered into all the painful details of her supposed father's conduct—his determination to force on a marriage between herself and Greville, and the terror, and even horror with which his conduct had inspired her; and then she implored advice, and protection, and help, to enable her to obtain a situation as companion or governess in some remote place, where Mr. Evermore could never hear of her existence.

Lady Arneliffe, in reply, invited Hope at once to come and stay with her at Nice; and remarked that her own child required a governess, and Hope would be more acceptable to herself in that capacity, than any other person in the world. She inclosed money for the journey, and said that in a fortnight Ellen St. Ange and Mrs. Golightly, now quite sane, were coming to stay with her, and Hope could accompany them.

This arrangement met with the approbation of Larky Grigg and all to whom Hope was dear; and one happy holiday was all the lovers could expect to spend together for a long time. "It must be for years, and it may be for ever," sung Hope, while her beautiful blue eyes filled with tears; and Larky's manly cheek grew pale, and his broad chest heaved with a deep sigh.

This holiday was the wedding of Merry Blossom with Tom Trudge, now a partner, and therefore a master carpenter.

Merry, a good girl at heart, and a very pretty brunette into the bargain, was only coquettish and flighty when she did not think—reflection always sobered her. She had thought much and deeply on the responsibilities of her new state, and of her coming importance as mistress of a household, and of a "servant gal."

Merry was quite sedate. There were no "nods and becks," or "quips and cranks, and wreathed smiles" now,—no practical jokes.

Hope was her only bridesmaid; and the bright brunette and angelic blonde formed as lovely and striking a contrast on that nuptial day as they had done when first Ada saw them sitting side by side in their rosy childhood at the Green Fields Ragged School.

Tom Trudge, who was very steady, was charmed and awed by the majestic and matronly demeanour of Merry. And Hope and Larky did indeed "spend one day of parting love."

The lovers—who did not hurry away, as is the cold, selfish fashion of the higher circles—went, escorted by Hope and Larky, the Trudges, and Jem Goodman, to spend the day at Richmond; and they were returning late in the evening, expatiating on the delights of the day, to end it with a hot supper at Apple Blossom's, when, just as they entered her house, two gentlemen, followed by two police constables, stepped forward. One laid his hand on Hope, and said, "So, my tricky and most treacherous damsel, I have caught you at last. You have known the pleasure of a father's love; now you shall know the terrors of a father's wrath."

Hope grew deadly pale, and, with a faint shriek, threw herself into the strong arms which her true lover, Larky Grigg, stretched out to protect and support her!

"Ha!" cried Mr. Evermore, livid with rage, "is that the low-born villain, the ironmonger's journeyman, the ragged-school boy whom you, girl, in your degraded mind, prefer to this noble gentleman?"

"It is one nobler far," said Hope, looking steadily at the demoniacal face of Evermore. "It is my lover, my affianced husband. One who learnt in a ragged school (as I humbly trust I have myself done) those principles of religion and virtue which will be his guide through life; one with genius to achieve that greatness he was not born to; one who will do more than inherit an illustrious name, for he will make his own illustrious. The self-educated man, the son of the people, one of the million, one in a million, son of those who sheltered when all forsook me—one whom I (so help me heaven!) will never forsake, never cease to love and honour!"

"Really, Rashleigh," said Evermore, grinding his sharp teeth, "I do not know why we listen to the ravings of that maniac girl." Then, turning to Hope, he cried, "You are a minor, and as such, being my daughter, Hope Evermore, you are bound to obey me. I order you this moment to leave this low-born, vile company, and return with me to a home where you will find you have much to learn, and more still to unlearn. Come, Hope Evermore, as a father, I command; as a daughter, you must obey. I presume you learnt the commandments at your beloved ragged school. I am your father."

"That remains to be proved," said Jem Goodman, who for some time had been closely scrutinising Mr. Evermore.

"Time works wonders, I know; and India ain't behind-hand with him. But still those are not the features of him I remember as the husband of Constance; nor is yon them of the gentleman as called on me yesterday, saying he was her husband, and whom I remembered as such, and told all about Hope," said Mrs. Trudge.

"I have," said Jem Goodman, "in my possession many important papers connected with this young lady. They were left me by her mother; and I was desired to open the casket in which they are on Hope's coming of age, or earlier still in case of her marriage. If you will wait while I run home, I will bring them, and read them aloud now; for as this gentleman claiming to be Hope's father has, as I know from my friends here, tried to force on a marriage between Hope and his nephew, I think the time her hapless mother has specified is come."

"I have no time for this folly," said Evermore. "You can amuse yourselves with any romances left behind her by Mrs. Evermore, but I insist on Hope's accompanying her father!"

"And so do I!" said a voice—the voice of a gentleman wrapped in a military cloak, pale, strikingly handsome, and of very aristocratic appearance, and bearing a strong resemblance to Lord Glenlonely.

He had entered unperceived, and had been for some time watching this exciting scene.

"Fiend in the human shape!" he cried, thrusting the now pale and trembling Evermore aside. "I see now clearly through your vile and complicated plot! Friends of my orphan girl," he added, turning round to the Blossoms, and Jem Goodman and Mr. Stephen, "I am that Walter Pemberton who won the heart of Constance Claverton, and who, under the vile and treacherous influence of yon coward villain, privately married (in his abhorred name), and, deceived by his base lies, forsook her. I see now the vile and complicated plot he has devised. Himself deceived by the accounts of my death in battle, he—knowing that, in case of my death, my only daughter is heiress to the title and estates of my father, and would be in her own right, at his death, Countess of Glenlonely—has devised this scheme for claiming her, and marrying her to his base-born son, whom he calls his nephew; and, being shameless as he is false, he, when my father dies, of course would acknowledge the fraud, in order to see the only being his selfish heart ever loved—that son!—in possession, through his wife, of the Glenlonely estates, and the reflected honours of her title. I thank Heaven, whose great mercy put it into the heart of even a crafty and remorseless foe to spare my life."

"I have endured much, but a visible Providence has watched over me. I have seen my father at Burnside; he has blessed me—my mother, whose reason returned when she saw the face, and heard the voice of her son. My heart sent me to Mrs. Trudge, who directed me to the hospital, where my poor Constance gave birth to my daughter Hope; my parents sent me here, knowing Hope had escaped (but whether dead or alive they knew not) from that perjured villain; still here they told me I should learn much. They are in town, they await me, and how gladly will they receive my daughter! Friends who have reared her so kindly, and made her all that woman should be, I thank, I bless you; and I shall beg of Mr. Goodman that he will let me see the papers that contain the wishes of my poor martyred wife, the martyr of that man's lies and plots. If she wished this union, and if that noble youth has won Hope's love, the time may come when I myself shall say, 'Take her, pearl of price that she is, and wear her ever next your generous heart!'

"Hope, child of sorrow, trained in that school that makes our women angels and our men heroes, the school of adversity, come, come at last to a father's repentant, almost broken heart!"

There was no reluctance, no delay now. Surely there is a force in blood, an instinct of affection. Hope rushed into the arms of that noble father, sobbed on his bosom, knelt at his feet, and turning to Larky Grigg, said—

"Come, my own love, affianced husband, come, kneel with me to our father."

And while all eyes were fixed upon this harrowing scene, and Jem Goodman, in silent, fervent prayer, thanked Heaven for its special mercy to Constance's poor child, and Merry wept on her bridegroom's breast, and Apple Blossom sobbed on Bob's shoulder, slowly and noiselessly Evermore and his wretched son stole from that scene; and that vile father, having reached his hotel, unable to endure the sense of defeat and disgrace, and the sight of his son's anguish and despair, returned to his own room (the door of which he fastened), and when next day, as nothing was seen or heard of him, that door was broken open, the baffled villain was found hanging by the cord of one of his boxes to the tester of his bed.

His miserable but much less guilty son, after a severe illness, was ordered to go on the Continent for his health, before rejoining his regiment in India; and while at Paris he again met with Nussy Fitz-Darrell.

How it came to pass we know not; but, as a heart has often been caught in the rebound, so was Rashleigh Greville's, and they were married at the ambassador's chapel, Blue-eyed Baby Ben—now a fine young lad—coming over from Rugby to be present at the wedding.

It was some five years after the scene at Apple Blossom's when Walter Lord Eaglescliffe claimed his child, that Hope, who in the meantime, though affianced to and corresponding with Larky Grigg, was abroad with her father, whose health wounds in battle and subsequent hardships had undermined, at Nice fell in with Ellen St. Ange, who was, with our old friend, Mrs. Golightly, on a visit to Lord and Lady Arneliffe.

There the delicate health of Walter Lord Eaglescliffe brought his early friend, Ellen, to his side, to read to and comfort him. To her deep joy she found that light from on high, in the shape of grace and faith, had darted into his benighted soul while he stood by the death-bed of his little Indian son. It was an unspeakable comfort to Ellen, as she watched him growing weaker daily in body, to find his soul grow strong for immortality. And when no tender care of hers and Hope's could rescue him from death's dark angel—when they had also seen Lord Glenlonely die, full of years and honours, the mourners returned to England, and Hope, now Countess of Glenlonely, set about a pious and active stewardship of the great powers title and fortune bestow on a true Christian.

Ada, Lady Arneliffe, was with her to advise, and Mr. Stephen and Jem Goodman formed part of the pious council.

It was long before Hope, Ada, or Ellen entered at all into that society which is so hasty to court the high-born, the beautiful, and the wealthy; but at last they were induced to accept an invitation to a party at the house of a nobleman whose name is renowned for science and philanthropy.

Hope, who had always corresponded with Larky Grigg, was aware that his name was now first and foremost among the great and practical engineers of the day, and that recent valuable and brilliant suggestions of his, had induced the Home Secretary to recommend him to the Queen for the honour of knighthood. But Hope was not aware that that honour had been that very day conferred, for she believed that her beloved Larky Grigg was abroad on business of importance connected with his profession. It was, then, with a wildly-beating heart, that she heard at this, the first party, that she, Ada, and Ellen had honoured with their presence, the announcement of the name of Sir Gregory Blossom! Yes, there he was, Sir Gregory now—a great man—a lion, but still a lamb to her; still to her heart Larky Grigg.

There were the same clustering locks of glossy black, the same deep-set dark eyes, so full of light, beaming beneath that overhanging brow—the very throne of thought,—there the firm, sweet mouth, the white teeth, the dear old smile—the smile of the old ragged-school days, half love, half fun,—there the tall, manly form, the dignity, the grace, the self-possession, the proud humility which so well become the son of the people.

Of all who crowded round the beautiful young countess—Hope, Countess of Glenlonely—one only was received with smiles. Dandies, dressed to perfection, pink and white, polished, fragrant dandies were in despair, when they saw Hope's blue eyes smile in their upward gaze at Sir Gregory Blossom.

It was that same summer, that while the papers were full of "Marriages in High Life," and descriptions of bishops, brides, bridegrooms, and bridesmaids, and their grand attire, the most beautiful of youthful countesses quietly, at Burnside, gave her hand to the most eminent of the self-educated sons of science. A good old village clergyman performed the ceremony; the guests present were, besides old Lady Glenlonely, Lord and Lady Arncliffe, Ellen St. Ange, Mrs. Golightly, Mr. Stephen, Jem Goodman, Merry and her Tom, and last not least (for to them Hope owed her escape from her vile pretended father), Stunning Steenie and his Meg.

Hope was dressed in white muslin, and enveloped in a veil, spotless and light as her own pure heart, while the orange blossoms on her lovely brow, fresh from her own conservatory, had petals not whiter than her virgin forehead, or lustrous more golden than her happy prospects.

Larky Grigg, or rather Sir Gregory Blossom, looked worthy of his lovely bride; and when the blessed rite was over, and "they two were one flesh," he led her through the postern gate to that spot on the heath, beneath the gnome-like tree, where they had been so sorely tempted, and where he had said in his faith and agony, "Lead me not into temptation," and there they knelt together on the fragrant heather in prayer, fervent prayer, that they might prove worthy of the signal blessings of their happy lot.

Our tale is told, and if the reader feels one tithé of the regret in parting with these people of her fancy that the writer does, she will not have written, nor they have read, in vain.

To those who have richly and kindly encouraged (as so many have done) a tale whose chief object has been to enforce temperance, and revive interest in those heaven-suggested institutions, ragged schools, she returns her cordial thanks. Their sympathy has encouraged, their praise has inspired her. That those who worship the mis-named jolly god, and are opposed to the education of the masses, should attack and malign a story promotive of temperance and education, was only to be expected; and they do not shake the conviction of the author that, although much remains to be done, real good has already been effected by "Hope Evermore."

THE END OF "HOPE EVERMORE."

[Our next number will contain the opening chapters of a new tale of great power and deep pathos, entitled "WINNIE," by "Felix Stowe."]

The Matron.

NO. XLVII.

In the present chapter, I beg to offer to the attention of my readers the pattern of a shawl-cloak. I think it is exactly the kind of garment an elderly lady likes to throw around her, when sitting at home in very cold weather. Such a cloak or shawl would make a nice Christmas box or New Year's gift for "grandmamma;" and how precious it would be in her eyes if her granddaughter had assisted in making it! I will suppose, then, that "mamma" has furnished the "gros de Naples" silk for the cloak, and the sarsenet for the lining; and then I would recommend that, between the sarsenet and "gros de Naples," there should be a layer of flannel—lining-flannel, at about five-pence a yard. Recollect that when you have cut out all the materials—gros de Naples, sarsenet, and flannel—it is the said flannel and sarsenet lining that must be joined at the seams over the shoulder, not the outer silk. This must have cord, nicely covered with silk, neatly run all round it. When all is cut out there must be a good deal of time and care given to tacking together (with white reel cotton) the cloak and lining; then different parts of the former should be joined together with exquisite neatness: and of course with fine sewing silk corresponding with the colour of the cloak, which should be of any nice dark colour; but not black, unless the lady for whom it is intended is known to prefer black for habitual wear.

Many who have become widows late in life never lay aside their mourning, even outwardly; and where is the woman who has had a really kind husband, who ever ceases inwardly to regret him? But now to practical things—the use of the needle, which should be plied as closely for cloak and shawl work as it ought to be used lightly in millinery, caps, and bonnet, physically speaking, I should say that satins, laces, feathers are best suited for those whose station in life leads them a good deal into company, and who may have occasion to display the articles of dress we have mentioned, at balls, concerts, and evening parties. For others, I recommend a handsome dress of a more lasting nets. The reason is evident. There is no great drag on articles of millinery as on things which one wraps around one—tightly, and more tightly, as this wintry weather makes us rejoice in the comfort of warm clothing. I suppose the cloak in process has been placed on the working-table—and now I suppose you have tacked it, so as to prevent any danger of its bulging away from the lining. The silk frilling, which should have been about half a quarter of a yard in depth, is, of course, hemmed; for the frilling, measure the cloak all round, and allow half as much again for the silk frill, or flounce, whichever you choose to call it. Mind you halve and quarter the frill and the flounce according to previous directions for frilling and gathering—remember that after you have prepared the silk trimming, it is on the lining (turned in all round) that you should fasten it with strong, nice regular work, and then the "gros de Naples" cloak, nicely corded all round, is to be (with the edges very carefully turned in) joined to the double lining; the road for the stitches is between the piping and the silk of the cloak. Be very careful about the collar, and, in the turnings in, avoid puckering, as it spoils the fit. The ribbon quilling, but not the bow in front, may be omitted.

I now turn to a very different subject, the bridal veil, of which I gave an illustration in the last chapter. I can fancy I hear some of my young lady readers asking me whether I recommend a veil or a white bonnet for a bride's wedding-dress. I own I have a preference for a veil. The veil hanging down from the wreath and flowing over the shoulders is very graceful; but the Eastern mode of wearing the veil seems the most appropriate—covering the face, and thus hiding the bride's blushes. I believe we borrow the fashion of wearing veils, during the marriage ceremony, from the Jews, or rather the Jewesses. But then their veils were opaque, being of fine linen. Even this ancient people have in this respect departed a little from their ceremonies, and allow their brides a transparent veil; and a little while ago the daughter of that merchant prince, Baron Rothschild, appeared at her wedding in a long tulle veil. So much for veils.

The bridal bonnet has its advantages. In fact, the best dress for a bride is that which she can turn to account afterwards. But, morally speaking, the best ornaments are the inward adornings of the mind,

"Meekness and kindness, goodness, truth,
These are the best attire for youth;"

nature; such a dress, in short, as Goldsmith tells us the bride of the Vicar of Wakefield chose. One which she fixed upon "not for a fine glossy surface, but such qualities as would wear well." Thus I recommend a good rich-coloured English merino, and in the summer a silk that, whatever colour it may be, will either turn or wash. A good shawl from our own manufactories looks well at any season, and lasts for years. Therefore, I suggest a shawl as an important part of the attire of the bride belonging to the middle classes. And as for the bonnet, white is the only colour (if it can be called a colour) suited to a wedding. I recommend a fine Dunstable straw, trimmed according to the present fashion.

Chemical Experiments.

THIS paper will consist of a little batch of experiments: and, firstly, I shall describe how two solid things being rubbed together, a fluid will result.

Experiment 1.—Take equal parts by measure of sulphate of zinc (white vitriol) and acetate of lead; rub them together in a wedgwood or glass mortar, and both will become fluid.

Experiment 2. To prove that flame is hollow.—Take a small glass tube, about a fourth of an inch in diameter and about six inches long, wrapping a piece of paper round it to protect the fingers. Immerse one extremity of the glass rod in the flame of a spirit lamp, and apply another flame to the other end. Something will immediately begin to burn, and will continue burning so long as the other end of the tube is retained in the middle of the spirit-lamp flame. This experiment evidently proves that flame (the flame of a spirit lamp, at least) is hollow—the central portion of it containing gaseous matter waiting to be burned, which cannot occur until it is brought into contact with the external atmospheric air.

Though I have recommended a spirit-lamp to be employed in the preceding experiment, yet by employing a little more care the flame of an ordinary candle may be made to afford the necessary demonstration.

Experiment 3. The reason why flame is luminous.—How happens it that certain flames of extreme power, so far as mere heating is concerned, evolve so little light? The flame of a spirit lamp furnishes a very common example of this; but other examples, more extreme still, are known to the chemist. Common illuminative gas, as is well known, furnishes a flame of great luminosity when burned in the usual way; but if mingled with atmospheric air, and then burned,—though by this treatment the heat evolved is much more considerable,—the illuminative power of the flame is proportionately decreased. The following operations will explain the reason of the above apparent anomalies.

Pour a little spirit of wine on a dish or saucer, and light it, when the flame will be hardly visible, as always happens when spirit of wine is burned. Whilst the spirit is burning, strew in upon it some particles of powdered charcoal; if from a sieve, all the better; if not, a pinch let fall from between the finger and thumb will do. The particles no sooner come in contact with the flame, than igniting they evolve much light; whence the observer may be inclined to jump to the conclusion that flames of great luminosity hold much charcoal. Such is usually the case, but not invariably: burning phosphorus, for instance, throws off a flame of extreme brilliancy—there is hardly any other sort of flame so brilliant; nevertheless, not one particle of charcoal is there. Wherefore we arrive at the conclusion that the luminosity of flame must be attributable to some more general condition.

The real truth is, that the presence of any solid body (no matter what) in flame causes the latter to be luminous. If any powder at random be let drop into the flame of a spirit lamp, the explanation just given will be justified. A little magnesia, or lime, or powdered clay—any powder, in short, will impart increased luminosity to flame.

From the records of these experiments, we perceive that though combustion cannot be too perfect for the purpose of heat evolution, it may be too perfect for the purposes of illumination.

Small Change.

A WIT being told that an old acquaintance was married, exclaimed, "I am glad to hear it." But reflecting a moment, he added, in a tone of compassion and forgetfulness, "and yet I don't know why I should be—he never did me any harm."

If you cannot avoid a quarrel with a blackguard, let your lawyer manage it rather than yourself. No man sweeps his own chimney, but employs a chimney-sweep, who has no objection to dirty work, because it is his trade.

At a party once the conversation turned, as it naturally does among young folks, on marriage—the other convenient subject besides the weather, when every other fails. One of the belles, addressing a beau, quite unconsciously (as she explained) said, "If I were you, and you me, I would have married long ago."

RELIGION removes those little desires which are "the constant hectic of a fool."

A HERTFORD paper asks why the Atlantic cable is like a turnip? Because the thing never was beet!

MR. JOHN SMITH has discontinued eating crabs, as he had eaten them so long, that everything he undertook went backward. He had a brother who dug a well till he found he was getting down in the world, when he gave up the business and turned lamplighter. He then looked up a little.

AN Irishman, who had just landed, said, "The first bit of mate I ever ate in this country, was roasted potato—boiled yesterday. And if ye don't believe me, I can show it to ye, for I have it in my pocket."

A WAGGISH candidate coming, in the course of his canvass, to a tailor's shop, "What we look for here," said he, "are measures, not men."

The praises of others may be of use in teaching us not what we are, but what we ought to be.

A CURIOUS ADVERTISEMENT.—For Sale: A handsome young bird dog. Any sportsman in want of a good bred dog to swim after his own heart, can find such, cheap, by applying, &c.

The world may be divided into the sensual and the religious. The former think that the Creator owes them a happy life; the latter think that they owe him an infinite debt of duty.

We all need resistance to our errors on every side. Woe unto us when all men speak well of us; and woe unto us when all men shall give way to us!

ONE might as well attempt to calculate mathematically the contingent forms of the tinkling bits of glass in a kaleidoscope, as to look through the tube of the future and foretell its pattern.

SELF-LOVE exaggerates our faults as well as our virtues.

MIRTH should be the embroidery of the conversation, not the web; and wit the ornament of the mind, not the furniture.

A CRUST of bread, a pitcher of water, a thatched roof, and love—there is happiness for you, whether the day be rainy or sunny. It is the heart that makes the home, whether the eye rests on a potato-patch or a flower-garden. Heart makes home precious, and it is the only thing that can.

A WITTY dentist, having laboured in vain to extricate a decayed tooth from a lady's mouth, gave up the task with the felicitous apology, "The fact is, madam, it is impossible for anything bad to come from your mouth."

WHAT popular singer does crushed Indian corn steeped in vinegar remind you of? Pickle hominy! (Piccolomini!—Oh!)

As in literature we shall find some things that are true, and some that are new, but very few things that are both true and new; so also in life, we shall find some men that are great, and some that are good, but very few men that are both great and good.

"WELL, Mr. Richards, how does my son get along with his grammar lesson?" "He surpasses any pupils that ever I had." "In what does he chiefly excel, sir?" "In stupidity, sir. He surpasses any boy that ever I saw in that quality, sir."

A COUNTRY girl, coming from the field, was told by her cousin that she "looked as fresh as a daisy kissed with dew." "Well, it wasn't any feller by that name, but it was Steve Jones that kissed me; I told him that every one in town would find it out."

A YANKEE who had just come from Florence, being asked what he had seen and admired, and whether he was not in rapture with the Venus de Medici, replied, "Well, to tell the truth, I don't care about those stone gals."

It is easier to pretend to be what you are not, than to hide what you really are; he that can accomplish both, has little to learn in hypocrisy.

If you would know how a bull would look when his tail is twisted, just ask a man for that "little bill he owes you," when he is talking to a woman.

"Look here, Jim, there is a hole knocked out of this bottle you gave me." "Why, not at all; there's the hole in it now. If it was knocked out, how could it be there?"

THE virtue of paganism was strength; the virtue of Christianity is obedience.

"CESAR, what's become ob dat darkey who stole de taller?" "He has been taken up on an affidavit, and carried up to de sperm court to hab it tried." "On an affidavit, Caesar?" "Yes, I seed the handle ob it."

DOUGLAS JERROLD said there was no finer sight than a stream of human creatures passing from a Christian church.

THE moment a man is satisfied with himself, everybody else is dissatisfied with him.

THE WIDOW'S MITE.

The widow had an only one,
A puny and decrepit son;
But day and night,
Though fretful oft, and weak, and small,
A loving child, he was her all—
The widow's mite.

The widow's might—yes! so sustain'd,
She battled onward, nor complain'd
Though friends were fewer;
And cheerful at her daily care,
A little crutch upon the stair
Was music to her.

I saw her then, and now I see,
Though cheerful and resign'd, still she
Has sorrow'd much:
She has—He gave it tenderly—
Much faith—and carefully laid by
A little crutch.

AUGUSTUS FITZ-GERALD BINDON.—We are much surprised to find that Problems Nos. 78 and 79 puzzle our "clever young Irishman."

HENRY STRICKSON.—We shall feel much obliged if you will submit your Problems on diagrams. The proper forms can be forwarded to you on your favouring us with your address on a stamped envelope.

T. D. BUSTON.—The information which you require can be obtained on your addressing a note to Messrs. Petter and Galpin.

ALFRED HOLLOWAY.—Problem No. 4 can be solved in three moves, beginning with Kt to Q 7. In Problem No. 5 White's second move is P to Q 4. Mate follows next move by P takes P. The other Problems are neat, and shall appear shortly.

Solutions of Problems by T. Simpson, Nos. 76, 77, 78, and 79; Tennebecirp, No. 75; W. M'Kenzie, Nos. 76, 77, 78, and 79; Phelp, No. 78; F. G. Rainger, No. 80; Nemo, Nos. 79 and 80; J. IMPORTANT NOTICE.

TWO ENTIRELY NEW AND ORIGINAL TALES.

Our next number will contain the opening chapters of an entirely New and Original Tale, entitled,

"THE SUBSTANCE AND THE SHADOW,"

By J. F. SMITH,

Author of "Smiles and Tears," "Phases of Life," "Dick Tarleton," "Soldier of Fortune," &c., &c., surpassing in stirring interest and startling adventure the most popular and highly wrought productions of that justly celebrated author. Also, in the same number (53), will appear the opening chapters of a New and Original Tale of great power and deep pathos, entitled, "WINNIE," by "FELIX STOWE."

STELLA.—We believe the comet was not visible to the naked eye after the 29th of October. Up to the 15th the eight distinct envelopes were seen to separate themselves from the nucleus, commingle with the head, and, we suppose, become at length part of the tail of the comet. It seems evident that this was owing to the action of the sun. In Halley's comet, which appeared in 1835, the tail became visible on the same night that the ebullitions towards the sun were first seen. This was not the case with Donati's comet. In the beginning of September the tail was seen, but the light ascending towards the sun was remarked for the first time on the 13th of September. On October the 11th, when the appearance of our comet was most magnificent, it was estimated that it reached half-way between Beta and Epsilon Hercules. In fact, the tail was upwards of thirty-two degrees in length. On the 18th of October the tail of the comet was no longer so striking, but it was still thirty degrees in length, and at this period it bore a strong resemblance to the Milky Way. We have most of us heard of the great comet of 1811, and some among us have seen it. To appreciate Donati's comet, we must bear in mind that while the great comet of 1811 had a tail reaching only twenty-five degrees, the brilliant meteor that has recently disappeared from our admiring gaze, attained the inconceivable length of thirty-two degrees.

SHALLONES.—We dare say you are not the only one who has heard a great deal about "middle-class examination," and yet knows not what it means. Middle-class examination is the examination that youths of the middle-classes of society, educated at public or private schools, now undergo at Oxford by the examiners of this celebrated university. This test is voluntarily submitted to by the pupils of the commercial or proprietary schools, as the case may be; and some consider that an inexcusable degree of ignorance was elicited by the examination that took place at Oxford last summer. Then it is answered that the examination was a very severe one; so much so, that the younger sons of "Alma-mater" (the University) would have been puzzled by the questions. We wish to know our opinion of these examinations. We approve of them. We wish everything to be brought to light. The discovery of an evil is the first step towards its removal; and the greater the publicity given to what is good, the greater the benefit conferred on the community. We ourselves—intimately connected as we are with the great question of education—expect to find the first prizes at the middle-class examinations carried off by the students of "Cassell's Educational Course."

MANGE.—It is a popular error to suppose that the aloe blooms only once in a hundred years. The period of its arriving at maturity differs according to circumstances, from ten to fifty, or even seventy years. Having acquired its full growth, it produces its gigantic flower stem, after which it perishes. This stem is sometimes as high as forty feet, and is surrounded by a multitude of branches, arranged in a pyramidal form, with perfect symmetry. Of this curious plant a fine specimen in bloom has recently been exhibited in the Botanic Gardens, Regent's Park. The aloe is an American plant, and it is from the New World that it has been transplanted to Europe. In the warm climes of Italy, Spain, and Sicily it gives (in conjunction with the palmetto) an almost tropical appearance to the scenery.

JOHN DROHAN.—Mungo Park, the enterprising traveller, was born near Selkirk, in Scotland, September 10, 1771. He was educated for the medical profession. After visiting the East Indies, and some portion of Africa, he engaged in a second expedition of discovery, to trace the course of the river Niger. This was in 1803. No certain intelligence of his fate has ever been received, but a vague report was that he was drowned in attempting to avoid the pursuit of a barbarian chief. An account of his journey and a memoir of his life was published in 1815.

MUSIDORA.—Holly and ivy seem to have been associated with the idea of Christmas even before mistletoe was mixed up with it, but as you seem to take so much interest in mistletoe we will speak of it in detail. The mystic uses of mistletoe are traced to the Pagan times, not only to those of the Druids, the priests of the Ancient Britons, but even in the religious ceremonies of the Greeks and Romans it was used. Virgil refers to it, and calls it "the golden branch." The fruit, which is covered with a viscid pulp, is now made into a kind of birdlime in Italy, and it is also a favourite food of the mistle thrush. But we believe its berries are poisonous for human beings; and we warn our younger readers against putting them into their mouths. Such a caution is hardly necessary to those who have reached years of discretion. Mistletoe grows luxuriantly upon the oak, and also upon yew and pear trees. Mistletoe is mentioned by the writer Cæsar, in 1656. He says: "It is carried many miles to set up in houses about Christmas time, when it is adorned with a white glistening berry;" and in a little work, called "Round about our Coal-fire; or, Christmas Entertainments," written early in the last century, it is thus introduced: "The rooms were embowered with holly, ivy, cypress, bays, laurel, and mistletoe, and a bouncing Christmas log in the chimney." Our favourite poet Gay also refers to it, in the following lively rhymes:—

"When rosemary and bays, the poet's crown,
Are baw'd in frequent cries through all the town,
Then judge the festival of Christmas near—
Christmas the joyous period of the year.
Now with bright holly all the temples strew,
With laurel green and sacred mistletoe."

A LOVER OF ANTIQUITIES.—Ludgate derived its name from King Lud, who encompassed his town by a strong stone wall, and is said to have called it Lud-din, the city of Lud, or Luds town, hence Londin, or London. We know there are other supposed etymologies for the name of London, but that which assigns it to the word Lud's town appears to us a probable derivation. It was in the reign of Cassivelaunus, brother and successor of King Lud, that Julius Cæsar made his first descent on Britain. Immense forests nearly reached the walls of ancient London; and even as late as the reign of Henry the Second they covered the northern neighbourhood of the city, and were filled with various species of beasts of the chase. London was naturally defended by fosses, or deep ditches. One formed by the creek which ran along Fleet ditch; the other by Walbrook, a winding stream, that emptied itself into the Thames at Dowgate. These are now arched over, and they form serviceable sewers, to receive and carry into the river the contributions from numerous smaller ones. The south side of the city was protected by the Thames, and the north by the adjacent forest. The original boundaries of London seem to have been Ludgate Hill on the west; a spot near the site of the Tower, on the east; Cripplegate, on the north; and Thames Street on the south. Newgate, Cripplegate, Aldgate, and Dowgate, were more ancient than Moorgate, Aldersgate, Bishopsgate, and Bridgegate. Most of these still give names to the localities surrounding the spot where they stood, but they have all been demolished, as well as the walls that (as we have observed) had their origin in the enterprising spirit of King Lud.

B. MERTON.—You say you hear a great deal about a dearth of cotton, and have been told that now that the manufacturing interests of the United States are so extensive, we cannot reckon on such supplies as we have hitherto received. All you have heard is correct, yet there is no ground for alarm. The soil of many of our colonies is favourable to the growth of cotton. From India, and in due time from Australia, we may look for this commodity, we might almost say necessary, of life; and nearer home, countries with which we trade have soils peculiarly favourable for the growth of the cotton tree; for instance, in Turkey, both European and Asiatic, in Egypt, and in the States of Barbary, cotton can be cultivated with success. A damp, but not a wet soil, should be chosen for cotton. The picking takes place about the middle of September. The culture of cotton is expensive and laborious, and calls for great attention.

JULIAN.—Though living in a neighbourhood where extensive excavations are going on, and spending hour after hour in digging for curiosities and antiquities, you say you have found nothing, and you begin to suspect that all the hidden treasures of olden times have been ransacked and carried off by others. In reply to your communication we cannot advise you to spend so many precious hours of your youth in hunting after what you may never find; but as a mere diversion we advise you not entirely to give up your search. And we are of opinion that you may yet find something valuable or interesting. We constantly hear of the discovery of curiosities in such districts as that you have described. Only the other day, in the neighbourhood of Driffield, as some labourers were ploughing, the sock of the plough displaced a piece of slate from the mouth of a vessel, which, on examination, proved to be a beautiful Roman vase, containing a great quantity of coins, struck about 235 A.D., by Magnus, the governor of Britain. We do not say that these coins were silver or gold, but a quantity of copper coins are worth finding.

TO THE INGENIOUS.—We are happy to be able to comply with the request of our correspondents, and to furnish them with the directions for procuring the skeletons of leaves. The beautiful fabric presented to the eye by what are called skeleton leaves can be obtained by two different processes. By the first, you steep the leaves in rain water, contained in some open vessel left exposed to the air and sun. Recollect to add water now and then, to make up for loss caused by evaporation. Watch the leaves; and when they decay, you will see that their membranes begin to open. Then lay them on a white plate, containing clean water, and, with delicate touches, take off the external membranes, and be very careful to separate them cautiously, near the middle rib; and when there is an opening towards the latter, the whole membrane separates easily. With this process you must not be in a hurry, but must give ample time for the vegetable matter to decay. The other method of procuring skeleton leaves is more expeditious. Take a table-spoonful of chloride of lime, in a liquid state, and mix it with a quart of pure spring water. Soak the leaves or seed-vessels, in this mixture for about four hours; then take them out, and wash them well in a large basin, filled with water; then expose them to the light and the air, and leave them to dry. Supposing you wish to procure the skeletons of large forest leaves, or of leaves having very strong ribs, leave them in the mixture for four hours and a half.

CALIGRAPHY.—What is commonly called "gold ink," is made by mixing precipitated gold powder with weak gum water. But you may accomplish your object by forming your capitals, &c., with gum-water, and then applying, with a bit of cotton wool, a portion of gold leaf.

THE VOICE OF TRUTH.—Obey that voice; and do not trust to the possibility of converting your partner to your opinions after marriage.

R. A.—The mode of staining gun-barrels is described in No. 47, page 336.

A NEW SUBSCRIBER.—The cordial about which you inquire is a patent medicine, containing a large proportion of opium, and its use is attended with danger, especially to infants and young children, to whom it is but too frequently administered. Furniture paste may be made thus:—Digest half an ounce of alkanet root in one pint of spirits of turpentine, till it is sufficiently coloured; then add a quarter of a pound of beeswax scraped small. Put the vessel into hot water, and stir till it is dissolved. If you wish it pale, omit the alkanet, or use less.

T. S. (Bristol).—The uniform penny postage came into operation January 10, 1840, in consequence of the praiseworthy and persevering efforts of Mr. Rowland Hill, who is now secretary to the Post-office. Previous to the introduction of the penny postage, a letter to the remotest parts of the kingdom (if a single sheet), cost 1s. 10d.; but the smallest scrap inclosed, or more than a single sheet, subjected a letter to a double, and, in some cases, a treble charge.

R. A. N. P.—A wisp (from the German or Danish wisch) is a small bundle of straw, hay, or herbs. A bundle of thin twigs, such as is used by cooks, is called a whisk.

CAPTAIN BLAND.—It is not for us to give advice in a case in "which several medical gentlemen have failed to afford relief."

HARRY M'WHIMSEY.—You challenged a man for an imaginary affront, and instead of meeting you he has wisely bound you over to keep the peace. You still brand him with opprobrious epithets, vilify the law which has thus bound you, and ask us what you are to do. We say, be grateful for the remainder of your life to Providence, and to the laws of England, for thus preventing you from committing murder, or from being murdered. We trust the time is not far distant, when duelling, that relic of barbarous ages, will be regarded as a foul infraction of the sixth commandment.

FLORA ROTHSAY.—We can hardly promise you happiness with a suitor who is so often "offended without cause," and "refuses to assign a reason" for his anger.

MADÉLINE.—Put your congratulations to your newly-married friends in as plain and simple form upon paper, as you would if addressing them by word of mouth on your first meeting with them.

LUCY LONG.—Under the circumstances you have stated, you and the children should take your husband's real name.

CAUTION.—Your labour in collecting old postage stamps "to get a boy into a blind school," will be labour in vain: old postage stamps are worthless. George Fox was the founder of the sect commonly called Quakers, about the year 1650.

RUSTICUS.—Artesian Wells, fountains made by boring into the ground till water is reached, which then springs up spontaneously, are so named, it is said, from their having been first used in Artois, a district in the North of France.

UN GARGON.—Of the plays you have named, only three are to be found in the authorised editions of Shakespeare's works—namely, "Antony and Cleopatra," "Cymbeline," and "Pericles." The other six have been attributed to him, but, as the best commentators imagine, without sufficient foundation.

EXCELSIOR (Bridport).—It is not for us to discuss the merits of the journal to which you allude. We believe the number stated to be very considerably beyond the mark. On the contrary, our circulation far exceeds your statement, and is constantly on the increase. See Lord Brougham's speech at Liverpool.

DON PEDRO.—The number of words in the English language is variously estimated. Todd's edition of Johnson contained 58,000 words; Webster increased the number to 70,000. According to the last estimate, the number is about 85,000.

Z. Z. Z.—We have so many questions put to us respecting arms, fingers, rings, &c., that we own ourselves now and then rather puzzled. However, we can furnish "Treble Z" with a good reason why the fourth finger is chosen for the marriage ring. The fourth finger is less used than any of the rest, and it is more capable of preserving a ring from bruises, for it cannot be extended but in company with some other finger; thus it always has a protector.

A FRENCH SCHOLAR.—We can give you no better directions than those furnished in the "French Lessons."

JUDITH.—What you deplore, is considered by some a beauty; but, were it otherwise, we know of no remedy that is not worse than the evil.

MACBETH.—In the word "Psyche" the first consonant is not sounded at all. The y has the sound of the long i, as in "irate," and the final e that of the short y, as in "fancy."

L. H.—Considering the circumstances, the verses do you credit. The hair you send is of a decidedly light colour.

SOPHIA commits no impropriety in being the first to open the conversation.

G. H. WILLIAMS.—The richest and finest red ink for shop-window tickets may be obtained by mixing two-thirds carmine powder and one-third Chinese vermilion powder in as much gum-water as will make the mixture about the consistency of cream. If there be too much gum, it will be apt to crack.

LITTLE INQUISITIVE.—A bullein is, properly speaking, a letter with an official seal attached. The word is a diminutive of bulle, a little round ornament or amulet worn about the neck of Roman children, and afterwards applied to a seal, an official letter; a bull, or decree of the Pope. It is now used chiefly to describe an official report by physicians respecting the health of the sovereign.

THE SUBSTANCE AND THE SHADOW.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "SMILES AND TEARS," "DICK TARTLETON,"
"PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE,"
"THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

Far from the madd'ning crowd's ignoble strife,
Their sober wishes never learned to stray;
Along the cool, sequestered vale of life,
They kept the noiseless tenor of their way.
Nor you, ye proud, impute to them the fault,
If memory o'er their tomb no trophies raise,
Where, through the long-drawn aisle and fretted vault,
The pealing anthem swells the note of praise.

GRAY.

PLAXTED—vide Fancy's map—situated in a locality regarded by common consent as the garden of England—the fertile vale of Kent—was an exceedingly pretty spot. What railroads and modern improvements have made it, we dare not think; far less visit it to ascertain, lest we should destroy some of the most pleasing recollections of our boyhood.

"Pretty" really is the word by which we can best describe it, for there was little if anything that, strictly speaking, could be called picturesque, either in the village or its neighbourhood. No stately hall or baronial keep looked down with an aristocratic, patronising air upon the humble cottages, which had clubbed themselves together, as it were, in the ambitious hope of being mistaken for a street—no ruined abbey or convent cell, where disappointment and sorrow, mistaking the extinction of passion for sanctity, or apathy for resignation, once found shelter from the world, contrasted their shattered pinnacles with the comfortable homesteads that dotted the fields, which gradually exchanged the rich colour of their soil for a sickly, marly hue, as they gently undulated towards the chalk cliffs guarding the coast. Everything, on the contrary, appeared plain and matter-of-fact about the place, it was simply one of those sunny nooks where, after battling with the storms of life, the tired spirit might seek and find repose.

Not even the church, the poet's and painter's last hope, could boast of any great antiquity, as it had been erected shortly after the Reformation, in a style as simple as the faith to which it was dedicated. The only attempts at ornamentation were the arms of James the First in the centre of the gallery, directly opposite the east window, and the Ten Commandments in gilt letters over the communion table—literally a table, and not an altar.

The edifice next in importance to the church was undoubtedly the parsonage, a long, straggling building with bay windows, tall slender chimneys, clustering together as if for mutual support, and quaintly-carved gables, beneath whose shelter that guest of summer, the swallow, loved to build its pendent nest and airy cradle.

Despite the great irregularity of the parsonage—of course, we are speaking in an architectural point of view—there was an air highly suggestive of comfort, and learned—we had almost said monkish—ease about the place. The sun-dial over the porch, half buried in woodbine and honeysuckle, as if old Time itself felt inclined to sleep amid their sweets, the walls matted with ivy, which served as a cloak to keep them warm in winter, the well-trimmed garden, with the stately elms and curiously-clipped yew trees, added to its quiet dignity; in short, it was just one of those houses in which one would expect to find snug, out-of-the-way recesses, filled with cabinets, rare books, and here and there a picture worth examining, to say nothing of an excellently-furnished dining-room and a cellar whose contents were orthodox as the faith of the reverend incumbent, who, at the period our tale commences, 1773, had lately exchanged his fellowship for the College living of Plaxted.

Dr. Titlow was not only a sound divine, but a profound scholar. True, he was somewhat absent at times, and, as a preacher, unmindful of the fitness of his hearers. This last peculiarity displayed itself on the very first Sunday of his taking possession of the pulpit, when he favoured his astonished congregation with a sermon, in which he most effectually demolished the Pelagian heresy. To be sure, his hearers had never heard of it before, but what of that? He had preached it before the heads of the university with great success, and never doubted for an instant but it would prove equally instructive to the honest farmers and simple rustics of Plaxted, who, if they failed to estimate the learning of their somewhat eccentric pastor, soon learnt to appreciate his benevolence as a man, and uprightness as a magistrate, in which latter capacity, it is only right to add, he was not very frequently called upon to act.

The chief offence of which he had to take cognisance was smuggling—never regarded as a very serious one in Kent; still he resolved, if possible, to put it down, simply because it was his duty to do so, little imagining that his own butler, Fitch, who had been his gyp at college, purchased the Bordeaux his master found so palatable, and the exquisite Cogniac, a slight suspicion of which flavoured his evening cup of coffee, of Jorrocks and Joe Kerl, two of the most notorious offenders against the excise laws on that part of the coast. Some even went so far as to say—people would talk in those days, as well as in our own—that these men occasionally followed a yet more questionable calling. If such really were the case, we can only observe, that it had never been proved against them; not that it would have detracted materially from their respectability, in an age when the road was regarded as a semi-genteel resource for younger sons and nephews, whom providence had neglected to provide with a banker in the person of a rich uncle or maiden aunt, idlers, too proud to work, and too ignorant to enter on a profession.

Jorrocks was a tall, wiry man, with a bullet-head and resolute expression of countenance, apparently about forty years of age. There was nothing of the ruffian in his appearance. In all probability, a mere casual observer would have set him down as a respectable trader well to do in the world. An impression his quiet suit of gray cloth, cut in the fashion of the day—that is to say, with square skirts—and a waistcoat descending nearly to the knees, three-cornered hat, plain lawn ruffles, and cravat, might have confirmed.

One of those short swords named a whinyard, worn more for ornament than defence, completed his dress.

His partner Joe Kerl, who was nearly twenty years younger, affected, on the contrary, a sea-faring costume. Instead of stockings, with shoes and silver buckles, he invariably wore heavy boots reaching more than half-way up his legs, where they were met by a canvas garment, in fashion not unlike a Highlander's kilt—his coat, broad-skirted and adorned with a double row of gilt buttons, somewhat resembled the jacket of a Thames waterman.

Although there was something cunning, not to say cruel, in the glance of his small round eye, and a sensual expression about his mouth, we would rather have trusted ourselves—had we been driven to the necessity of making such a choice—to the mercy of Joe than to the forbearance of Jorrocks. There might have been a forlorn hope with the one, but not the slightest with the other.

Jorrocks, we beg leave to observe, is not an ideal character: there are many still living in Kent who recollect the notorious guinea smuggler, as he was afterwards called, who, during the war with Napoleon, made a large fortune by carrying English gold to France, where it fetched a considerable premium. More than once during his perilous career, his boat—ostensibly a fishing smack—was overhauled by the channel cruisers; but no evidence was ever found to criminate him. He had been known to throw as many as three thousand guineas overboard, a proof that, when it did succeed, the speculation paid enormously.

It was a fine moonlight night in the month of September when the two worthies, whose portraits we have thus roughly sketched, started from Plaxted to Folkestone, then an obscure village about eight miles distant, inhabited chiefly by fishermen and smugglers. It had neither pier nor custom house. The pavilion had not yet reared its imposing front; there was only one public-house in the place, the Dolphin, and that so near the beach, the side facing the sea had to be protected by an embankment of sand and shingle, to prevent its being flooded at the spring tides.

It was a wild, desolate spot,—few who knew it then would recognise it now; and the inhabitants, a hardy, ignorant race. Gas, steam, the electric telegraph, mechanics' institutes, and national schools, were unheard of; things still in the womb of Time, which as yet had given no sign of parturition.

The two men had walked at a rapid pace for some distance in silence, which Jorrocks was the first to break by observing that he felt uneasy in his mind.

"About the boat?"

"No. She must be in long before this, and the cargo safely stowed."

"What is it, then?" demanded his companion, with a stare of surprise.

"The woman who, for the last five days, has walked regularly from Plaxted to the Dolphin, to watch the arrival of the cutter, no matter what hour," answered the elder speaker.

"She expects some one."

"So she says."

"And you don't believe her?"

"No; besides, how should she hit the exact time?"

"Guesses it, I suppose."

"Pooh!" exclaimed Jorrocks, in a tone of contempt at what he considered the stupidity of his partner; "that you may make fools believe. I suspect that she is neither more nor less than a spy upon our proceedings. Should we meet her," he added, in the tone of one deliberately weighing the impression his words produced, "I shall feel half tempted to—you understand—to—"

"Ascertain whether your fears are well grounded or not," said Kerl, finishing the sentence for him.

"Yes, just so."

"Well," resumed the former speaker, after a pause, "I shouldn't so much mind if I thought as you do; but I don't. In the first place, she is a stranger in this part of the country."

"The more likely to be in the pay of the coast guard," said Jorrocks. "The new lieutenant, Elvey, is not half so reasonable as his predecessor; he knew what business meant. The fool talks of duty, and what is worse means it. Ephraim Sleek offered him fairly, and was all but tossed out of the cabin-window of the 'Wren' for his pains. It will end badly," he added—and here the hand of the speaker, as if by an involuntary movement, grasped the handle of his whinyard—"it will end badly."

"That won't be our fault," observed Joe, philosophically; "we were willing to act liberally," he added. "But don't you think if Elvey has set this woman as a spy upon our task, he has taken means to secure her against harm?"

"The first sensible words you have spoken to-night," exclaimed the eldest smuggler; "and that is the thought that restrains me. There is danger looming," he continued, after a few moments' silence.

"May be; but I don't exactly see it," replied Joe.

"Did you never, when the sky was clear, and the wind calm as an infant's breath,—long before the waves began to raise their hissing crests,—feel the signs of an approaching storm?" demanded his partner. "Have you never, when all was still, heard the yards and spars of your vessel creak as if they felt the coming strain, just as an old man's bones shoot with pain before a change of weather?"

"Perhaps I have," answered Kerl, looking very much surprised; "though how you, a landsman, who have never been at sea, barring a trip to Calais, can talk in such sailor-like fashion, puts me out of my reckoning."

To this observation his companion made no answer, unless the mocking smile that flitted for an instant over his saturnine features might be intended for one; but if so, it passed unnoticed.

On reaching Folkestone, the speakers hurried to the beach, and found to their surprise that for once they had been out in their calculation: the boat, to all appearance an ordinary fishing smack, although nearing the shore, had not yet arrived.

"Stevens is late," said Jorrocks. "No ill-luck, I hope."

"Not a bit of it—not another craft in sight," said his partner.

"There is a craft I'd like to know wrecked at the bottom of the sea," muttered Jorrocks, at the same time pointing to a female at a short distance from them. "I tell you she is a rock-a-head—a bird of worse omen than the 'Wren'—the name of the revenue cutter."

"That's Katty!" exclaimed Kerl.

Jorrocks eyed him suspiciously.

"So you know her name?" he muttered.

"Yes; the landlady at Plaxted told me."

"Katty, Katty!" repeated his partner several times; "an Irishwoman."

"You may swear to that," answered his informant, with a laugh; "whatever else she may be, she can't hide that."

His friend gave an inarticulate umph!

"What do you mean by umph?" demanded his companion. "That's a land signal, I suppose? Why don't you throw out one a plain man can understand?"

"Lieutenant Elvey was stationed for two years upon the Irish coast," replied the former speaker, "before he got command of the Wren. Can you understand that?"

"Plain as the compass," said Joe, looking exceedingly blank at the information.

Instead of advancing further on the beach, the two men withdrew beneath the shadow cast by a neighbouring cliff, in order to watch the proceedings of the female at their leisure, and unobserved.

The supposed spy, whose presence in that part of the country had so excited the suspicions of Jorrocks, was a tall, commanding woman, of about two-and-twenty; a more faultless figure—which the dark gray cloth gown and kirtle she wore displayed to advantage—had rarely been seen. Any one well acquainted with Ireland would not only at once have pronounced it as the land of her birth, but recognised her as a native of Galway, so remarkable for the Spanish style of beauty of its daughters. A profusion of glossy black hair, falling in massive curls like a cluster of half-torpid snakes, partially hid her features, which were regular and delicate, with a singular expression of firmness about the mouth. The eyes—it would have been impossible to have mistaken the country of their possessor—were almond-shaped, of a deep violet hue, shaded by long silken fringes, through which they sometimes flashed with mirth, or the yet stronger passions of the south.

As she stood with her gaze intently fixed upon the boat now rapidly approaching the shore, Kate Cassidy—or Katty, the name she generally went by—might have served as a model for the sculptor or the painter.

"Spy, or no spy," said Joe Kerl, "she is a woman, and no mistake."

It was the first time the smuggler had seen her without the large cloth shawl she generally wore, thrown like a plaid over her head, enveloping in its folds the upper portion of the figure.

In her anxiety, for there was no mistaking the feeling with which she watched the rakish-looking craft, it had fallen unnoticed by her on the sands.

Several seafaring men now made their appearance from the Dolphin, and gathered in a group upon the beach.

The instant the little vessel grounded, Katty dashed through the surf with a cry wild as a curlew's suddenly startled from its nest. Evidently she had recognised the girlish figure standing on the deck. With a strength that excited the admiration of the sailors, she mounted the sides in almost as brief a space of time as it has taken us to describe the action, and clasped her in her arms, covered her hands with kisses, and gave expression to her joy in half-stifled sobs and broken expressions.

"Ellen, aushla! it's the heart of your poor Katty that beats to see the light of your sweet face agin. Many is the weary hour she has thought of you, and prayed for you, alone, in the old place; but you are pale, darlin'; sure sorrow is an envious thing, to steal the roses from your young cheeks," she added, gazing wistfully on the features of the traveller, whose eyes were dimmed with tears at the meeting.

"I knew you would not fail me," observed the lady, for such evidently was her rank, in a mournful tone.

"Fail you!" repeated the woman, passionately.

"The heart of me would break first. The day after your letter reached me, I bade good-bye to Phelim—I should have hated him, had he said a word to keep me back—and came to this place, where there was not a livin' thing to bid God's welcome to the stranger—left him and the babe, that already begins to look into my eyes and smile at me. Quitted both," she added—"husband and child—and good right to do so, for Katty owes you everything."

Here the being whom the speaker addressed with such fervent expressions of fidelity and love, suddenly placed her hand upon her heart like one in pain.

"It's the sea, darlin'," said the woman, encouragingly; "to think of him letting you cross the salt waters alone, after all his—"

Ellen, or Elleen, as her foster-sister called her, interrupted her.

"Not a word, Katty," she murmured; "I cannot bear it now—before I die you shall know all."

The word "die" seemed to produce an electric shock upon the woman, so strongly did it convulse her frame. With a powerful effort she at last suppressed the rising sob that nearly choked her, and descended from the deck once more into the surf in order to assist the speaker to land.

Two of the crew lowered their passenger carefully into her arms. Katty received the precious burden tenderly as if it had been her own infant, and carrying her to the door of the Dolphin, placed her in the little chaise cart she had hired of the landlord to return to Plaxted. The light baggage was soon landed, and after wrapping her own shawl round the feet of Ellen, they prepared to start.

"You will take cold, Katty," observed her foster-sister.

"Not while the heart of me is warm as it feels now," replied the latter, as the horse, a powerful one, which the landlord of the Dolphin frequently found other uses for besides letting it out to travellers, started towards Plaxted.

"Well," said Joe Kerl, as the vehicle passed them, "I hope you are satisfied now that the woman is no spy."

Jorrocks admitted that he was, but did not appear the less curious about her on that account; for the first questions he addressed to the captain of the boat were respecting her.

"Can't tell you her name," answered Stevens; "never heard it. Old Chomont brought her on board, after we had cleared the Custom-house. He arranged for her passage."

"Did he state his reasons?" demanded the smuggler.

"Twenty-five guineas," answered the captain.

"Pshaw!" interrupted the questioner. "I mean the reasons for his precaution in bringing her on board without the knowledge of the French authorities."

"Why didn't you ask me so at once?" exclaimed the man. "Let me see: I think I did hear something about it. The King of the Mounseers had sent an order not to allow her to quit Calais."

Jorrocks asked no further questions; but after satisfying himself that the cargo had been safely stowed, retraced his steps towards the village.

To the great surprise of Joe Kerl he could not extort a single word from him on their way back to Plaxted.

It is now time to introduce the pale traveller and her foster-sister, for such was the tie between the two females, more particularly to the notice of our readers.

Ellen St. Clair had been left an orphan at a very tender age, to the guardianship of her nearest relative, a maiden aunt, the Honourable Miss Tabitha Macnamara, the possessor of an estate in the county Galway, the disproportionate amount of whose rental, compared with its extent, would very much astonish an Irish landowner of the present day.

Somehow—it never could be accounted for—one dreadful misfortune or another was always befalling her tenantry. If the crop proved excellent, the murrain was certain to break out among the cattle, or the sheep—stupid things, to require looking after!—to get drowned in the bog.

"Sure then, my lady," as the wives of the defaulters—who cunningly trusted to the eloquence of their better halves—used to urge, "it wasn't our fault if the pigs would die, or the rain spoil the whate, which had only been left a week or so on the land after being cut, till Tim, Patrick, or Teddy," as the case might be, "could get the boys to help him to stack it."

The plea generally proved successful, although Tim, Patrick, or Teddy might have done the work himself without help, in less than half the time he had been waiting for it.

"Well just spake wid the mistress herself," was the invariable reply cast into the teeth of Kene, the agent, whenever he hinted at anything stronger than a remonstrance; "she is one of the owld stock—the rale lady,—and won't see the poor put upon."

What could their landlady do? A Macnamara had never been known to drive or eject their tenantry; added to which, she felt a pride in keeping up her name in the county.

The natural consequence of this forbearance was, that Lady Tab, as she was familiarly called, although supposed to possess "lashins" of money, had never been able to put the family mansion in thorough repair—re-furnish the principal rooms, or do a dozen other things which she had firmly made up her mind to accomplish. She was perfectly idolised by her warm-hearted, enthusiastic, but improvident tenantry, who would have fought—but any Irishman will do that—have died, had it been necessary, in her defence; in short, have done anything except the thing they did not do—work upon their farms to pay the rents.

The extraordinary influence Miss Macnamara's benevolent but excessive forbearance obtained over them produced at least one excellent effect. During the troubles that periodically distracted the country, not a man upon her baronies stirred; outrage was unknown in her immediate neighbourhood. With the tact peculiar to her sex, she played the tactics of her farmers and cottiers off against themselves, by pointing out to their wives, mothers, and sisters the fatal consequences that must follow if their husbands, brothers, and sons were led into joining any of those dangerous secret societies, so long the curse of Ireland.

The females upon her estate were her police; and she found them a most efficient one.

Her nearest neighbour, Sir Patrick O'Neil, the chief—we question if antiquaries can decide of how ancient a sept—had not been equally prudent. He was one of those recklessly-hospitable, large-hearted men who delight in keeping open house; whose claret—although it paid no duty—was unexceptionable; and whose word, unless when qualified by a promise to pay, might be religiously depended on.

Many persons doubted the common sense and prudence, but no man ever questioned the courage or honour of the O'Neil.

It was a sad blow to Ellen, when, two years before we have the pleasure of introducing her to our readers, the nephews of the baronet, Redmond and his cousin Ulic, were obliged by political reasons to fly the country, and take service in one of those gallant Irish regiments, whose exploits form a brilliant page in the history of France. Their uncle had many friends, some in power. Every one who knew him loved Sir Patrick; and the government of the day, satisfied with the voluntary banishment of the young men, far more dangerous than their relative, abstained from all proceedings against the latter.

Perhaps the authorities considered they had a sufficient guarantee for his future conduct in the proofs of his past, which they held over him in terrorem.

Redmond O'Neil, the lover of Ellen, possessed all those manly qualities to which the love of woman clings as to its natural support. Cold, and perhaps somewhat haughty with those of his own sex, to women he was frank as boyhood, tender and respectful as the worship of the heart. His father, a younger brother of Sir Patrick, had died in command of the Irish Brigade.

Ulic Blake, the son of the baronet's sister, resembled his uncle in his reckless, passionate temper, imprudence, and disregard to consequences; but, unhappily, not in those nobler qualities which redeemed them. His recklessness extended only to the means of gratifying his passions, and his disregard of consequences, to a selfish indifference of the happiness of others. Had he remained in Ireland, much, perhaps, that was bad in his nature, might have been corrected, or withered for want of opportunity to develop itself; but the court of Louis XV. was a hotbed, in which evil passions found a genial soil.

Previous to quitting his country, even those who disliked him most, admitted one disinterested trait in his character—the strong affection he displayed for Redmond.

It would have been strange, indeed, if the heart of Ulic had not possessed one healthy feeling. Gold, or mica, which very much resembles it, may be found even in granite.

Redmond O'Neil made a promise that he would return within a year to make Ellen his wife, and kept it, despite the reward still offered for his apprehension, he wedded her publicly—it would have required an army to have arrested him in Galway—and immediately after the marriage returned with his bride to France.

This was a sad blow to the Hon. Miss Macnamara, who strongly opposed the match, and refused to sanction it by her presence; but the grief of the aunt was sunshine compared with the passionate sorrow of Katty, the foster-sister of Ellen, who had never before been separated from her a single day. Phelim Cassiday, the boy with whom she had broken the silver coin and plighted her troth, had, as he used to say, a bad time of it for weeks afterwards; but Phelim was not the only obstacle that prevented Katty from accompanying her young mistress to France, she had a blind mother, Ellen's nurse, whom she loved dearly, so she at last consented to remain, and finally married the patient and long-enduring Phelim.

For more than a year the letters of Redmond's wife bore witness to her happiness. But at last came one that wrung the heart of her faithful Katty; misery appeared in every line of it—hopeless misery, although it entered into no particular detail.

The writer entreated her foster-sister to be, by a certain day, at Folkestone to receive her, and cautioned her against mentioning a word respecting the journey to her aunt.

"I shall die if you fail me," were the last words of her letter.

We have seen how Katty answered it.

CHAPTER II.

Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting:
The soul that rises with us, our life's star,
Hath had elsewhere its setting;
And cometh from afar,
Not in entire forgetfulness,
And not in utter nakedness—
But trailing clouds of glory do we come
From God, who is our home.

WORDSWORTH.

It soon became evident to the anxious Katty that her foster-sister would never travel farther than the village inn of Plaxted. When Ellen spoke of dying, the affectionate creature could only answer her with tears and kisses. The fragile form, hourly wasting before her sight; the crushing sorrow, too proud for words, too deep for tears; the sense of unmerited wrong, which, like a fever of the blood, dried up the life-springs of the victim it had fallen upon—forbade all hope; and she looked forward with terror to the moment—evidently not far distant—that was to make the unhappy wife of Redmond O'Neil a mother.

"It's in the heart of her," she murmured, in answer to some question which Dr. Challoner, the only medical practitioner in Plaxted, addressed to her—"wirrestrue, it's in the heart of her. Bad was the day she first beheld the face of him, and left the friends who loved her for a home in a strange land!"

"Whose face?" inquired the gentleman, with a feeling of curiosity which did not escape the quick-witted Irishwoman.

"His whose name she bears—who took God's oath to protect and love her."

"Ah! she is married, then?"

The words had no sooner passed his lips than the eyes of Katty flashed fiercely at the insulting doubt they conveyed; and had she been a man the speaker might have received cause to repent having uttered them.

"Married!" she repeated; "isn't she all but a mother? Blessed saints! and a St. Clair, too! Would my darlin' foster-sister be the first to bring scorn upon the name cut on the death stones in the owld church at Galway? You can never have looked in her sweet innocent face to ask that question," she added. "Married! yes, she is married in the sight of Heaven and man, and the fool or villain who has destroyed her is her husband."

"Well, well," observed the village Æsculapius, good-naturedly, for he really felt interested in his patient, "married or not, rich or poor, we must do our best for her."

"Ochone that the red gowld could save her!" sobbed the faithful creature, rocking herself to and fro in her despair, "I'd coin the life's blood of me."

"My good woman," said Dr. Challoner, "if you value the life of your mistress, you must suppress this violent sorrow in her presence."

"Sure the heart of me is breaking."

"Will you break hers? destroy the last faint hope of saving her?"

At the word "hope," the foster-sister of Ellen uttered a cry of joy, wild as a long-imprisoned bird's that had just regained its liberty.

"The blessings of the saints and a poor distracted creature's be upon you," she exclaimed, "for the first words of comfort I have heard in this strange land. They have brought life to the desolate heart of me agin. Thry me!" she added; "cut the flesh of me! and see if Katty sheds a tear or utters a cry to add to the sorrow of her darlin' mistress."

Three days after the above conversation, the wife of Redmond O'Neil gave birth to a son. The infant, born under such inauspicious circumstances, proved a strong and healthy one; but for nearly an hour it continued doubtful whether the unhappy Ellen would ever regain sufficient consciousness to bless her offspring.

Doctor Challoner himself doubted it, although he directed the nurse to continue rubbing the wasted arms and clenched hands of his patient. As a last resource, Katty placed the new-born infant on the cold bosom of its mother, whose eyes unclosed at the warm contact, and a smile, bright as the redeemed soul's just winged for heaven, flitted for an instant over her pale features, as she pressed him closer and closer to her beating heart.

"Remember that his name is Redmond," she murmured faintly, in the ears of her foster-sister.

"And good right to it, avourneen," answered Katty; "isn't he the living picture of his father?"

Ellen gazed upon her boy, and as she traced, or fancied that she traced, the lineaments of her once kind husband, the tears fell fast upon his innocent face. It was nature's baptism, and only less precious than that holier one, which seals earth's children for a nobler heritage.

The faint hope Doctor Challoner had entertained that the birth of her child might produce a beneficial change in his patient, quickly vanished. The unhappy wife no longer struggled against the bitter regrets, the destroying sorrow maternal instinct had taught her to suppress, but poured forth her misery in the ear of her foster-sister, whose simple affection cheered her last hour, whose promise, to be a mother to her boy, robbed the approach of death of half its terrors.

It was a sad tale; and, even to her who told it, a most inexplicable one.

For nearly a year after their marriage, Redmond O'Neil had treated his young bride with manly tenderness and devoted love. He appeared proud of the sensation which the beauty of La Belle Irlandaise, as Louis XV. had named her, created in the circle at Versailles. The courtiers pronounced her perfect, and envied the happy husband; the women hated her, and sought to estrange him from her. It piqued their pride that a girlish stranger, who had received in cutting silence the advances of Madame du Barry, the reigning favourite, should pretend to read them a lesson of virtue. It was pronounced prudery, affectation, a desire of creating a sensation; and they determined on being revenged.

Redmond approved the conduct of his wife, and their happiness appeared daily to increase.

The change which destroyed this state of mutual bliss occurred about a month before the commencement of our tale. Ellen, who already counted the days that were to make her mother, was terrified by her husband rushing unexpectedly into her dressing-room, loading her with reproaches, and accusing her of being unfaithful to him. The child she was about to give birth to he declared was none of his. In his madness he vowed the infant should never bear his name. He would consign it to obscurity—destroy it, rather than bring dishonour upon the race of the O'Neils.

"The fool!" ejaculated Katty, when her foster-sister related this part of her story.

"Nearer," added Ellen, lowering her voice and drawing her foster-sister closer to her, as if she feared the walls might repeat the words that followed, "he branded me with the name of—I cannot speak it. He whom I so fondly loved, whom I still love with all the heart's first tenderness, called me wanton. It was my death-blow—that word has killed me."

"The villain—the ruthless villain! God will requite him."

"Pray that He may restore him to his reason, and pardon him," continued the weeping wife; "pardon him, as I do; for he is mad, Katty—mad! His love I feel is unchanged; he could not deceive me in that. He is haunted by the burning conviction that I have been faithless to him—dishonoured him. I, who would have died rather than have given him one moment's pang."

"That would ye!" exclaimed her hearer, with passionate grief.

"The rest is soon told," continued the sufferer; "my once happy home became my prison. Redmond refused to see me—returned my letters unopened. I trembled, not for my own life, that had become valueless, but for the unborn babe's within my bosom. With the assistance of a servant, the daughter of the man who owns the vessel in which I quitted France, I escaped. You know the rest, my own dear Katty."

The faithful creature threw her arms around the neck of her young mistress, and wept over her in silence.

A few hours after the sad confidence had been made, a change took place in the appearance of Ellen, which for awhile deluded her foster-sister with a false hope of returning strength. The traces of sorrow and mental suffering seemed to disappear, and the pale, emaciated features to become radiant, as if the shadow of their former beauty rested on them.

"You will love him?" said Ellen, fixing her eyes with a mother's tenderness, and perhaps with a mother's envy, upon her infant, as he lay nestling at the breast of Katty.

"Isn't he drawing the heart's love of me?" sobbed the affectionate nurse, "and won't he share it with my own little Phelim?"

"Place him in my arms," murmured the dying woman, "that I may once more feel his innocent caress, and bless him. He will have no memory of his mother," she added, with a burst of maternal regret. "Remember that his name is Redmond, the name of his father."

Katty promised.

Ellen prayed long and fervently, both for her boy and her misguided husband. Her lips, at last, moved only at intervals; and the tired spirit fled so gently and imperceptibly that even the eyes of affection could not discover the exact moment when it passed away.

Kneeling by the remains of the being she had so dearly loved, the foster-sister breathed a vow to prove a mother to the child committed to her care. No hand, save hers, arranged the remains of Ellen for the grave. The task of affection performed, she passed the rest of the night in prayer by the side of the body.

There are circumstances under which, from the impossibility of indulging it, grief becomes a luxury. Katty felt this, and subduing, as far as nature permitted her, the sobs and exclamations which, despite her resolution, would rise, she left the inn on the following morning, to seek an interview with the clergyman, to arrange for the funeral. She had also another duty to perform—the christening of the child; which Doctor Titlow performed.

"Redmond O'Neil," replied his nurse, firmly, when asked by what name the motherless infant was to be admitted to the Christian fold.

It was duly registered and witnessed, and a certificate given to Katty, who, to the astonishment of the rector, placed a piece of gold within his hand.

"You mistake," he observed; "the fee is only a shilling; and even that is unnecessary," he added.

"I have just heard of the melancholy death at the inn, and was on the point of calling, to ascertain whether my services or assistance would be of use to you. Take back the money."

"Who ever heard of an O'Neil being baptised that red gold was not paid for the rite?" replied the woman, proudly. "I thank you, sir; but she was not a beggar!"

"Do not misconceive me," said Dr. Titlow, struck by her manner: "the service I spoke of was the expression of sympathy for your sorrow. The—"

"Hush! hush!" interrupted Katty. "Don't soften the heart of me when I have to see her laid in the cold grave in a strange land, and bear back the heavy tidings to her own people. I am not ungrateful, but I daren't listen to kind words now."

The clergyman pressed no further. He saw that sympathy, however well meant, would only add to her sorrow, and wisely forbore from pressing it.

"There is no fear," added the speaker, anxiously, and at the same time pointing to the book in which the birth of the little Redmond had been registered, "that will be lost?"

"Not the slightest."

"Or be played false with?"

"Equally improbable," replied the clergyman. "The chest in which the books are kept is fire-proof, and the keys never for an instant out of my possession."

Katty eyed him earnestly for a few seconds, as if to read in his features how far she might rely upon his word; then, as if satisfied with the scrutiny, proceeded to arrange for the funeral, which it was settled should take place in two days.

On her return to the inn, the landlady, who had taken a fancy to her singular guest, and felt a woman's pity for her loneliness, met her at the door, and informed her that a strange gentleman had arrived during her absence.

The foster-sister of Ellen instinctively pressed the infant, whom she carried in her arms, nearer to her bosom.

"A fine, tall, handsome man," continued the woman, "as ever stepped, although he does appear half-mad or heartstricken. Jorrocks, who brought him over from Folkestone, says he must be some great lord, for he scatters his gold like pebbles."

"Where is he?"

"That is the strangest thing of all," replied her informant. "Despite all we could say to prevent him, he made his way upstairs, into the room where the body is lying."

Katty asked no further questions. There was but one man in the world who could have acted thus—the husband of the hapless Ellen.

On entering the chamber her conjectures were confirmed. A tall, military-looking man, in the full pride of manhood, was seated at the foot of the bed, contemplating the dead.

At one time he must have been strikingly handsome; but sorrow had done the work of years—not slowly, but suddenly, as the lightning scathes the oak without depriving it of vitality; the stately tree still rears its head, but the thunder scars remain indelibly imprinted on its front.

Just so with Redmond.

"And o'er that fair broad brow were wrought
The intersected lines of thought;
Those furrows which the burning share
Of sorrow leaves untimely there:
Scars of the lacerated mind,
Which the soul's war doth leave behind."

Never had mental agony been more strongly depicted than on the features of Redmond O'Neil. It was traceable in every line: the sunken eye, lustreless as if it had taken its last look at happiness, the firmly-compressed lips and death-like hue of the stained cheek; the dark hair, free from powder, hanging like the shattered fragments of an ebony frame, partially encircled the portrait.

"Ay, weep," said Katty, after contemplating him for several minutes in silence; "weep till the salt tears blind ye, and sigh the heart of ye away; ye can't recall the dead. The fool," she added, bitterly, "the fool, to cast the sweetest flower away that ever bloomed out of heaven's own paradise."

Redmond started to his feet, as if ashamed that human eyes had gazed upon his weakness.

"I loved her," he murmured, hoarsely.

"And murdered her," replied the foster-sister, sternly. "I know what the love of the red O'Neil means."

"She dishonoured me."

"If I were a man, I'd tear your tongue out for that word!" exclaimed the woman, passionately; "in her presence, too," she added, bursting into tears. "Does not her pale face give you back the black, wicked lie? The criminal does not die of a broken heart; it is only the victim."

"Strange, wild, maddening as it is," answered the now widowed husband, "it is not less the truth. Mine is not the ear to listen to a slanderer's word. No! I trusted to the evidence of my senses—and almost doubted them," he added, "so pure and truthful did my heart hold her love."

Katty smiled scornfully, and pointed to the dead, as if that was a proof no evidence could shake.

"Would you have me disbelieve my own eyes?"

"If they told ye that she was false, you should have torn them out as false witnesses," replied the woman; "for they lied to the sickly brain of the jealous fool who owns them."

"Redmond O'Neil," she added, "I know the oath you have taken, and the bad purpose that brings you here; but you shall take my life before you have her boy."

"She has told you all, then?" groaned the unhappy man.

"All," said Katty, "except how she came by the half-healed scar upon her innocent breast."

"The child lives?" demanded Redmond, with a look that sent the blood to the heart of its nurse, and blanched her cheek. "I no longer seek its life," he added; "but he must never bear my name."

"He bears it already!" answered the foster-sister of Ellen, pressing the infant close to her bosom.

The madman—for such the torturing pangs of jealousy, wounded pride, and despair had made him—attempted to tear his son from the arms of its protectress, who defended her charge with desperate strength. Suddenly the horror of the scene, the guilt of such an outrage in the presence of the dead, struck him, and, appalled by the shrieks of Katty, he fled from the house.

"I have saved him, Ellen, darlin'," sobbed the woman, kneeling by the side of the corpse—"I have saved him, and will again," she added, "though the red blood of him you loved should pay the price."

When Redmond O'Neil quitted the inn, he was joined by Jorrocks and Kerl, through whom he had succeeded in tracing his unhappy wife. He had brought a letter with him from their correspondent in Calais, instructing them to follow in everything the instructions of the bearer; adding, that such was his influence at the court of Versailles, the very existence of the firm, so far as the writer was concerned, depended on their conciliating him.

No wonder the two smugglers, after reading it, felt willing to serve him.

He had not proceeded far before they overtook him.

"Do you prize the yellow metal for which men sell themselves, which can purchase all the gauds of this life, except happiness and honour?" demanded Redmond. "Gold," he added, seeing they did not comprehend his meaning—"gold—accursed gold."

Kerl broke into a hearty laugh, at what appeared to him the absurdity of such a question; but a significant glance from his companion soon checked his mirth.

"We are poor," replied Jorrocks, "and willing to earn, provided the means are not too venturesome."

"You have heard of the birth of a child, and the death of its mother, in yonder village inn?"

The two partners nodded in the affirmative.

"I must obtain possession of that child," continued the gentleman, "living and uninjured: I would not have the blood of the helpless little wretch upon my soul. Will you undertake the task?"

"Name your price," he continued, in a tone of contempt, seeing that the men hesitated: "I am ready to count down the hire of your services. Name it quickly; I shall not act the huckster with you."

Jorrocks and Joe Kerl consulted for a few moments together. The female—the only obstacle to the accomplishment of the task—was a friendless stranger in the place: it did not seem very difficult.

"Two hundred guineas," said the former.

"And you will bring the infant to me to-night, to the Dolphin," added Redmond.

This, too, was agreed to; and the insensate father gave them a weighty earnest of the promised recompense.

"But how about the woman?" demanded Kerl.

"Harm her not, as you value your lives," replied Redmond; "respect her, as you would respect those scarce qualities—disinterested love and faith, no gold can purchase."

(To be continued.)

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

HOME.

THE French have no word into which the English word home may be legitimately translated. Yet it is sufficiently evident that many of the French people have the thing without the name, while a large portion of the English people have the name without the thing. There are comparatively few who have an adequate idea of home as an institution. It is recognised as a house, containing convenient furniture—a place to eat, drink, and sleep in; but such a place is very far from being a home.

Home, properly regarded, is the grand institution of social life. Like all institutions, it has its external form and internal significance. It is the birthplace of the affections, the centre of every genial influence; and in building up a home, regard should be had to all that can contribute to its happiness and comfort.

It is not the elm before the door of home that the sailor pines for when tossing on the distant sea. It is not the roof that sheltered his childhood, the well that gave him drink, nor the humble bed where he used to lie and dream. These may be the objects that come to his vision as he paces the lonely deck, but the heart within him longs for the sweet influences which came through all these things, or were associated with them; the heart clings to the institution which develops it, to that beautiful tree of which it is the fruit. Whenever, therefore, the heart wanders, it carries the thought of home with it. Whenever, by the rivers of Babylon, the heart feels lone and sad, it hangs its harp on the willow and weeps; it prefers home above any other joy. It will never forget it. There swelled its first throb, there were developed its first affections; there a mother's eyes looked into it; there a mother's voice spoke to it; there a mother's prayer ascended for it; there the love of parents, brothers, and sisters, gave it precious entertainment; there bubbled up from unseen fountains life's earliest hopes; there life took form, and colour, and consistence; from that centre went out all its young ambitions; to that focus return its concentrated memories; there it took form and fitted itself to loving natures and pleasant natural scenes, and it will carry that impress wherever it may go, unless it become perverted by vice or crime.

'Tis in the little communities that we call homes that the hopes of England rest. It is here that subordination to wholesome restraint, and respect for laws are inculcated; it is here, if anywhere, that the affections receive their culture, that amiable dispositions are developed, that the amenities of life are learned, that mind and body are established on healthful principles, that mutual respect for mutual rights is engendered, and here that all those faculties and qualities are nurtured which enter into the structure of worthy characters. In the homes of England are born the children of England, and from them go out into English life English men and women. They go out with the stamp of their homes upon them; and only as these homes are what they should be, will they be what they should be. It is with this in view that we offer the following suggestions touching the establishment of a home:—

The greatest danger of home life springs from its familiarity. Kindred hearts gathered at a common fireside are far too apt to relax from the proprieties of social life. Careless language and careless attire are too often indulged in, when the eye of the world is shut out, and the ear of the world cannot hear. The courtesies of social life belong to home. Politeness is essential at home. We must remember what is due to one another; and not reserve all our civilities for strangers. A home, in which politeness reigns, is a home from which polite men and women go out; and they go out from no other.

Home should be a happy place, a pleasant place. Much can be done by making it as neat and orderly, as, and as ornamental as possible. There should be home amusements, so that one need not go far from home to seek enjoyment. There are homes, or places so called, which have no attractive feature about them; places in which no evening is to be spent, no leisure hour beguiled; and it is from such homes that the young, naturally enough, fly off to a more genial clime. But there are homes, and every home should be of this description, which exercise a charm possessed by no other place on the face of the earth; homes in which the greatest pleasure and happiness are found, and which yield in innocent recreation a solid and a lasting good. How much can books do to while away a winter's night; how pleasant it is to cultivate vocal, or, it may be, instrumental music; how much joy can music add to the family circle! When the day's work is done what can be more cheerful, more consistent than to find a family gathered together, finding in each other's company a delight which no other company can give.

"Six things," says a recent writer, "are requisite to create a home. Integrity must be the architect, and tidiness the upholsterer. It must be warmed by affection, and lighted up by cheerfulness, and industry must be the ventilator, renewing the atmosphere, and bringing in fresh salubrity day by day; whilst over all, as a protecting canopy and defending glory, nothing will suffice except the blessing of God."

Indeed, to make a home happy, industry and integrity are essential qualities. No home can be happy of which the members are conscious that they have not fairly earned the comforts by which they are surrounded. But, where there is the consciousness that duties are humbly discharged, that the good things which add to its comfort are the legitimate results of honest industry, the pleasure is solid and satisfactory. To make a home happy a man must be industrious and frugal, and a woman thrifty and tidy. A slattern, or an idler, could undo the best of homes; but, where there is honest labour on the one hand and honest thrift on the other, a little money will go a long way in making a comfortable home. One thing is exceedingly important, namely, sobriety. Nothing will make amends for the want of that. Sobriety is an element that must not be left out, for without that industry will lose its energy, frugality its forethought, affection its tenderness, and home its charm. Sobriety has saved from ruin many a home, and the want of it has destroyed still more.

Now, as home is the place where we should find our greatest happiness, it is incumbent on us to see that we do all we can in our several relationships to make it as happy as we can. Have we done this? Are we doing it? Is there nothing more we can do?

For there are his heavens sweet,
Both made of love—one inconceivable
Even by the other, so divine it is;
The other far on this side of the stars,
By men called Home.

FRENCH LESSONS;

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH.

CHAPTER XXXI.

"I AM glad to find you recollect all the words relating to good cheer," said George, with a smile. "I think you can now ask for a great deal more than you would allow yourself to partake of, in a general way. But a feast is very well now and then, and only now and then. As the French themselves justly observe, 'Il faut manger pour vivre, et pas vivre pour manger.'"

"Do not say the English of that, George," eagerly exclaimed Robert, "I want to show you I understand it: 'One should eat to live, and not live to eat.'"

"Very well indeed," said the preceptor, "and I am the more pleased with you, because you were not puzzled by the idiom 'il faut.' But there are still a few necessary words relating to dinner. I had forgotten them myself. I mean 'cheese' and 'biscuits.' As you know, these things precede dessert. The word biscuit we have imported from France. 'Un biscuit,' 'a biscuit,' 'des biscuits,' 'biscuits.'"

"In Paris you may have great variety in cheese, and you may rely on all the following cheeses being very nice indeed. 'Du fromage à la crème,' 'cream cheese.' 'Du fromage de Gruyère,' 'Gruyère cheese.' 'Du fromage de Brie,' 'Brie cheese.' As to the last I shall mention, 'Du fromage de Hollande,' 'Dutch cheese,' this would be no novelty to you. I am aware of your eating it often, and liking it very much."

"And now we may suppose dinner and dessert over at last. The next thing a Frenchman thinks of is his cup of coffee, technically called 'La demi-tasse.' Now, observe, though tasse, 'cup,' is feminine, demi, 'half,' remains undeclined, and the agreement is between the article la and the substantive cup.

"Those who do not know when they have had enough call, after coffee, for a 'chasse café,' in the shape of 'un petit verre,' 'a little glass,' and this little glass is either 'un petit verre de liqueur,' 'ou d'eau de vie,' 'ou de rhum.' I need not translate these words, as you have had them in your vocabulary."

"Recollect, I do not recommend the 'petit verre.' I advise you to stop at the 'demi-tasse,' and then to ask for the 'carte à payer,' viz., the bill. You need only say to the waiter, 'La carte à payer, s'il vous plaît'—'the bill, if you please.' The waiter will probably answer, 'La voici, messieurs, ayez la bonté de payer au comptoir'—'Here it is, gentlemen, please pay at the counter.' You, perhaps, having found the said waiter very civil and attentive, will say, 'Très bien, merci pour vous'—'Very well, here is something for yourself.'"

"And now, Robert," said George, "I hope you are in a good grammatical mood; and that you will be very attentive, while we consider a few more peculiarities relating to the agreement of the adjective. You recollect that in the word 'demi-tasse' (small cup of coffee), the 'demi' did not agree with 'tasse,' which is feminine, otherwise, it would have become 'demie.' In like manner you must say 'demi-heure' for a half hour, not 'demie-heure.' This is because 'demi,' placed before the word, becomes part of the word itself. If it follows a feminine noun, it agrees with it; though indeclinable when it precedes it. The same rule applies to the following words, 'franc de port' (free of postage), 'ci-inclus' (here included), 'excepté' (excepted), 'passé' (past), 'supposé' (supposed), 'vu' (considering), 'cy compris' (here comprised)."

"When, in French, an adjective is used to qualify a verb, it remains invariable."

"When one adjective gives a quality to another, both are invariable. I must give you an illustration of this: 'Ses yeux sont bleu-foncé' (his eyes are dark blue). 'Ses yeux sont (d'un) bleu-foncé,' is understood."

"In the word nouveau-né, 'new-born,' nouveau remains indeclinable; that is to say, nouveau takes no plural. It is not used in the feminine. You would say 'Un fils nouveau-né,' 'A new-born son,' and 'Une fille nouvellement née,' 'A new-born daughter.' But if nouveau is not used as an adverb, then it declines; for instance, 'Les nouveaux mariés,' 'The new-married couple.'"

"'Avoir l'air,' to appear, offers difficulties respecting which grammarians differ. We consider that when the adjective may reasonably qualify the word air, 'appearance,' it should agree with air; but when the said adjective cannot apply to the word air, it should agree with that word which it evidently does qualify. I think I had better give you an illustration of the last-mentioned case—'Cette demoiselle a l'air bien faite,' 'This young lady appears well made.' Of course, the faite applies to the demoiselle, not to her air; and, in such cases as the following, 'Cette viande a l'air très bonne,' 'This meat appears very good,' your own reason will tell you that the agreement of the adjective must be with viande and not with air.

"Adjectives in the comparative and superlative degree are as declinable as in the positive."

"I suppose, Robert, you remember that our travellers were talking about the early days of Paris?"

"Indeed I do," replied the pupil, "and I long to hear more of their conversation."

FRENCH.

How is it that Gaul is now called France?
It is so called from the Gauls who called France?
Des Français qui s'y établirent

Franks who established themselves there at the decay of Rome's power. Something in the same way as the Saxons established themselves in our country? Yes. Pharamond was the first king of France, but Clovis, the fifth king, was the first Christian monarch. Was Clovis a great conqueror? He was, and after having vanquished and killed Alaric, king of the Visigoths, he established his residence at Paris, and in 510 A.D. he made it the capital of his conquests. Who succeeded him? His son Childibert, who laid the foundation of the church of "Notre Dame." He was an excellent king. I shall think of him when I see the church that he founded. Many of the successive kings had abbays built beyond the walls. And, doubtless, these abbays were gradually surrounded by houses? Exactly so; and they afterwards formed small boroughs or "bourgs." Such were the Bourg Saint Marcel, the Bourg Nouveau, the Bourg l'Abbé, and the Beau Bourg, near the Temple. Oh, how well you explain it. I fancy I see the increase of "Paris, the beautiful City."

dans la décadence du pouvoir Romain.

A-peu-près comme les Saxons se sont établis chez nous?

A-peu-près. Le premier roi de France fut Pharamond, mais Clovis, le cinquième roi, fut le premier roi Chrétien.*

Clovis, était-il grand conquérant?

Oui; et après avoir vaincu et tué Alaric roi des Visigoths, il établit sa résidence à Paris, et en 510 A.D.† il en fit la capitale de ses conquêtes.

Qui lui succéda?

Son fils Childibert, qui fonda l'église de Notre Dame, et qui fut l'un des meilleurs des rois.

Je penserai à lui quand je vois l'église qu'il a fondé.

Plusieurs rois qui régnerent ensuite firent construire des abbayes hors des murs.

Et sans doute ces abbayes furent peu-à-peu environnées de maisons.

Précisément, et elles formèrent ensuite de petits bourgs. Tels furent le Bourg Saint Marcel, le Bourg Nouveau, le Bourg l'Abbé, et le Beau Bourg auprès du Temple.

Ah, que vous l'expliquez bien. Je crois voir l'accroissement de "Paris la belle ville."

* For the history of the Franks, their incursions, and their original geographical position, we must refer our readers to the history of France. We have merely taken a glimpse at this history with a view to render "Le Voyage à Paris" more completely interesting and instructive.

† It is perhaps superfluous to observe that A.D. is used both in French and English for the Latin words "Anno Domini," the year of our Lord.

LESSONS IN DRAWING.

ANY one who can learn to write can learn to draw, and, as writing is not taught to those only who are destined to become authors, but as forming an essential part of general education, so is drawing equally important to others besides professional artists. To write—to draw a form or figure that shall be recognised as the representative of a letter or word, is one thing; and to be able to design, draw, or write such forms, upon principles of grace and accuracy—to understand the art of writing—is another. Thus it is also with drawing, another mode of expressing ourselves, not less useful or necessary than that by letters or words. To draw a horse, that shall not be mistaken for a man, is one step; but to draw a horse, with all his just proportions and developments, movement and expression, is an art to be acquired. Any one can make something on paper to look like a tree, a cottage, a road, or a mountain; but art goes farther, and, as if to compensate for what it falls short of, invests the whole with a charm more impressive than the reality, even to the most simple-minded cow-boy, who may have gone that road, or waded that brook, a thousand times, unconscious of the beauty that surrounded him, until it was developed by the hand of art.

Who has ever hesitated to teach a child to write, because it was not intended that he should be an author? How many regard the art of drawing as being of no practical importance, as a branch of education, to any but professional artists; and consider it, in its most favourable light, as a mere accomplishment—a pursuit only for the man of leisure? The resources of our schools are often exhausted in "finishing" our youth with "every accomplishment;" laid on so lightly, that, for all real and practical purposes, they are as ephemeral as the gay tints of the painted butterfly. Smatterings of languages, living and dead, are heaped upon them, while the great, universal language, the language of design, is forgotten; or only thought of in the production of some huge "castle and ruins, with a man and a boy with a stick, and a dog"—painted by the teacher, under the scholar's direction, to hang in the parlour, as the veritable, first, and last, and only production of the latter: who at once assumes, therefrom, an oracular authority in all matters connected with the fine arts, and leaves admiring friends in wonder, at what "he might have done, had he not have given it up." To such, it may be said, "You have never begun."

It is not only as a beautiful accomplishment, or a source of amusement for leisure moments, that the art of drawing should be cultivated. It has its practical uses in every occupation of life. It opens to all inexhaustible sources of utility as well as pleasure; practices the eye to observe, and the hand to record, the ever-varying beauty with which nature abounds, and spreads a charm around every object of God's beautiful creation, unfelt and unknown to those who have failed or neglected its cultivation. It does more: it gives strength to the arm of the mechanic, and taste and skill to the producer, not only of the embellishments, but actual necessities of life. From the anvil of the smith and the workbench of the joiner, to the manufacturer of the most costly productions of ornamental art, it is ever at hand with its powerful aid in strengthening invention and execution, and qualifying the mind and hand to design and produce whatever the wants or the tastes of society may require.

In the elementary portions of the following lessons, the smile of the professional artist may be moved when he finds the author dwelling on what some may think trifles, and giving instruction in the methods of sharpening a pencil and making a pen. But let him remember the day in which that instruction might have helped even him. When the pupil in drawing has attained a proficiency to place him in the position of an artist, his course of study will require a direction beyond the means of these pages to afford him. This he must obtain elsewhere, and pursue, with that fixed determination and singleness of purpose, by which alone excellence is to be achieved; and he will find that, could all that he requires be placed at once within his reach, it would be, in a measure, valueless, for want of that strength to appreciate and appropriate such advantages which is best acquired by patient search and progressive attainment. Short-cuts and easy roads to knowledge give but little real aid to him who has a long and arduous journey to pursue; though it is scarcely worth while to hazard an experiment, by which the spirit may be broken down with toil, in a path into which we occasionally diverge, as a recreation, or an accessory to other pursuits.

From the delight, as well as profit, that awaits them, all may be safely invited and tempted to the study of drawing. They may find difficulties, but they will find pleasures, also, of the richest kind. They will find flowers blooming along their way, and wonders opening before them at every step: nature unfolding her ample volumes, and displaying combinations of beauty and delight, beyond the power of words to tell them of. It will be theirs, to record the everchanging pictures of earth and heaven; to give them body and form, in which others, less favoured than themselves, may participate through them: theirs, to preserve the image of some cherished object long after it has ceased, in its reality, to exist—or, perhaps, to call forth some priceless treasure from the world of poetry and thought.

To those who have in view more than mere pleasure and amusement in the pursuit of the art of drawing, may be fairly promised advantages that they will surely realise; and a portion of this work will be devoted especially to those who look to the application of the art to its most practical purposes. Most of the difficulties constantly felt by artificers in the execution of their handiwork will be obviated when the same hand that executes can design. Let our mechanics have their apprentices instructed in drawing, and the effects will be soon evident in their workshops. They will no longer depend upon foreign inventions, that are, after all, little adapted to the wants, tastes, and habits of our people. Let these wants be supplied by articles, at once more useful and equally ornamental, of home production. Let them learn to use their own strength, and their reward will follow.

The manufacturers of Europe are drawing closer and closer the connection between the artist and the workman. At first they borrowed aid; now they are acquiring knowledge for themselves. For the promotion of this object, schools have been long established on the continent, under government protection and support, so much importance is attached to their existence as a measure of national policy. The influence of these schools was so strongly felt in England, to the detriment of our industrial art, that it became a subject of alarm to our statesmen. All the capital, energy, and strength, the superiority in material and mechanical facilities of England, could not contend against the higher excellence of her foreign rivals. As the voice of one man, our mechanics and manufacturers confessed the truth, and demanded protection from the government—not by tariffs, but by education. Our legislators saw the evil, and at once applied the remedy by the establishment of government schools of design. These have been attended with such beneficial results, that there is now scarcely a manufacturing town in England that has not claimed and shared the advantages of provincial branches. Our mechanics can, and must now carry on the work for themselves. The trouble which this may occasion—a trouble which is indeed a pleasure—in all will be amply repaid. Without it, even if the workman may have a vague idea in his mind of what is wanted, he cannot give it form: perhaps he may have the spirit to make the attempt, but he cannot satisfy himself—all goes wrong—his pattern-books fail him; he looks around for something to begin from, and gives it up in despair; or, what is worse, produces some deformity that disgusts his employer, who will not venture on a second experiment, but sends abroad, and gets what he desires. Can the mechanic complain that home manufactures are not encouraged? Had he possessed even an elementary knowledge of design, he would have done better; had he cultivated and perfected that elementary knowledge, his difficulties would have all vanished, and the beginning and end of his labour would have been placed at once before him. Make them artists, or, better still, artist-workmen, and, with their proverbial energy, intelligence, and enterprise, no limit can be placed to what our mechanics may achieve.

A knowledge of design, even in copying, gives great advantages. If he understands the principles upon which the original is produced, there is no fear of the workman committing offensive variations. How often do we see the most beautiful designs distorted into deformity by the variation of a single line—an error of ignorance that must continually occur, until our mechanics are better instructed in this branch of education. It is a vain hope that a work so limited as this will supply all the information the artisan should require; but should it lead him to make a beginning, he will so soon find his advantage in it, that he will be induced to pursue it farther. He will have his children and apprentices instructed; he will urge the establishment of schools and collections of models, to which they can be directed; and he will in his own time see the fruits, in the advancement of our manufactures to a degree of perfection that can never exist without an intimate connection between them and the arts of design.

There are those, of another class of society, to whom education in drawing may prove a real blessing; whose painful and ill-repaid labours, to earn a scanty provision for themselves and families, have so often called forth our sympathies; and, while public feeling loudly declaims against the evil, no efficient remedy has been applied. Of the thousands of dependent females who are compelled to toil, night as well as day, to the destruction of health and life, and who are often tempted into paths of vice and misery by absolute necessity, how many there are who possess talent that needs but cultivation to secure them both respectability and support. The natural refinement and delicacy of the female mind renders it a fruitful soil, that should not be neglected or allowed to run to waste, when its cultivation might realise such rich advantages, not only to themselves but to their country. Give them the advantage of education in drawing; begin in your public schools; let them carry it to their looms, to the manufacture of articles of taste and fancy, to their firesides, to the early education of their children: and more, if they possess the talent, let them take the pencil, the chisel, or the burin. Give them strength, by proper education, to feel what they can accomplish, and we shall soon see the broken-hearted victims of incessant toil worth the wages of men, in departments of industry and usefulness for which they are by nature so well adapted.

That a general taste for the fine arts does exist, however uncultivated it may be, is evident. Where is there the humblest cottage that has not its walls or mantelpiece decorated with a picture or plaster figure? However rude may be the work of art which hangs as "the bright Palladium" of the cottage, yet the household care bestowed upon its preservation, and the pleasure it affords by its possession and contemplation, show an appreciation of its worth, a decided taste, that, if cultivated, would lead to better productions; for the supply would assuredly be improved in character, in proportion to the demand. A wooden clock sells the readier for its picture, and more especially if that picture touch a chord of national pride.

What village school-girl is there, whose ambition does not reach to the imitation of natural objects in needlework? and, although it may often puzzle the most acute to discover a rose from a tulip, or a cat from a squirrel, in her worsted picture, yet the taste and the inclination to try are there. Could she be able to select subjects for imitation from the boundless resources of nature with which she is surrounded—could she have the means and opportunity afforded her, by proper instruction, of perpetuating, by her pencil or brush, the flower she has reared, the home in which she has been happy, the resemblance of friends she has loved, what a new source of intellectual enjoyment would be opened to her. And not to her alone. The influence of that refinement of sentiment and taste, that must ever follow, will extend throughout her life, and spread a charm about her, which will be seen and felt in all her associations, whatever be her destiny.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON XXX. MAGNETISM.

772. Can a piece of iron or steel be magnetised in any other way than by touching it or rubbing it with a magnet?—It can be more effectually magnetised by placing it within a coil of copper wire through which an electric current is made to pass.

773. What is an electro-magnet?—An electro-magnet is a piece of soft iron, generally in the shape of a horse-shoe, with a coil of copper wire around its ends. The iron is temporarily magnetised, by passing through the coil an electric current from a galvanic battery.

Fig. 48.

774. How does the power of an electro-magnet compare with that of a permanent horse-shoe magnet?—It is vastly greater; the largest horse-shoe steel magnets support from 50 to 100 lbs.; but large electro-magnets may be made to sustain more than a ton. The electro-magnet represented in Fig. 48 was constructed by Professor Henry, and was capable of sustaining about a ton weight.

TERRESTRIAL MAGNETISM.

775. What is a magnetic or compass needle?—It is a thin magnetised bar of steel, poised on a pivot, about which it turns freely.

Fig. 49.

776. What important fact does it make known, by the position which it takes up and obstinately retains?—It points out, as if by instinct, in what direction north lies.

777. What is the most important application of the magnetic needle?—The mariner's compass, as a guide to the mariner in steering his course across the trackless ocean. By night and by day, in storms and in calms, the compass needle is ever true to the pole.

778. When was this directive property, as it is called, of the magnetic needle first discovered?—It was known to the Chinese more than a thousand years before the commencement of the Christian era.

779. When was the mariner's compass first used?—The Chinese appear to have steered vessels by the compass early in the Christian era, but it was not known in Europe until about the twelfth century.

780. Who was the first European navigator that is known to have sailed by the compass?—Vasco de Gama, in his first expedition into India.

781. Does the compass always point due north at all parts of the earth?—It deviates, or declines, more or less from the true north at almost every place.

782. In which direction, to the east or to the west of north?—At some places to the east and at other places to the west of north.

783. Suppose an imaginary line to be traced through a series of places at which the needle points due north, what is such a line called?—A line of no variation. The western line of no variation begins to the west of Hudson's Bay, passes in a south direction through the American lakes to the West Indies, and the extreme eastern point of South America. The eastern line of variation begins on the north in the White Sea, descends south until it reaches latitude 71°; it then passes along the sea of Japan, goes westward across China and India to Bombay, it then bends east, touching Australia, and goes south.

784. How does the mariner, when he is out at sea, know where the true north lies?—He has the means of ascertaining how far the needle declines from the due north, by making an astronomical observation.

785. Can he do so in any other way?—Yes, by consulting a chart on which are recorded the results of previous observation on the direction of the needle.

786. In what direction does the compass needle point in high northern latitudes?—At most localities very much to the west or east of north.

787. In what direction at Barrow's Straits and Melville Island?—What we call the north pole of the needle points toward the south.

788. Are the same differences in the position taken up by the compass needle, observed in the Southern as in the Northern Hemisphere?—They are, and it is the same pole of the needle that points south in the two hemispheres.

789. If a magnetic needle be freely suspended by its centre of gravity, so that either end can move up or down, in what position will it settle?—In a position such as is represented in Fig. 50, in which the north end dips very much below a horizontal line.

Fig. 50.

790. How is the ordinary compass needle brought into a horizontal position?—By making the south end heavier than the other.

791. In travelling north does the dip increase or decrease?—It increases; and in going south it decreases.

792. Is the dipping needle horizontal in any part of the earth?—It is horizontal in the vicinity of the equator; all along a certain line running round the earth, and lying partly to the north and partly to the south of the equator.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

PROFESSOR OWEN, M.D., F.R.S., ETC., ETC.

PROFESSOR OWEN, M.D., D.C.L., LL.D.

WITHIN the last half century, science has made extraordinary advance in every department of natural philosophy. Among the discoveries effected, and the researches diligently and indefatigably carried on, the study of zoology takes an important place. The wonders of creation in all the marvellous forms of animated nature have been brought under public notice. The popular ignorance which prevailed on this interesting topic, has in a great measure been removed, and by the zealous labours and persevering application of men who have thoroughly devoted themselves to this pursuit, so that we are now in a position both to understand and to appreciate the construction, habits, and distribution of animals on the face of the earth. Our ancestors knew nothing of these things; a lion, an elephant, a giraffe, were to them creatures which excited their surprise, but never induced any curious investigations. What else could indeed have been expected from those who were ignorant of the structure of their own bodies, and to whom anatomy and physiology were unknown sciences. In our age, however, the spirit of inquiry has been aroused. We have sought to know the points of identity and points of difference observable in animal life, and the lancet and the microscope have rendered us essential service. Thanks to the patient labour and untiring exertions of our scientific men, we are taught to regard organic nature as one complete system governed by the same laws, marked by the same phenomena, exhibiting the same principles in all its ramifications. We are taught to regard it as a system so complete, that a single bone of an animal is sufficient to establish the size, structure, character, habits of that animal, as well as the description of country to which it belonged; and thus we have seen small vestiges of organic remains become eloquent of primeval time—of a state of things utterly different from that which our eyes have seen or the pen of the historian has recorded.

Foremost amongst those scientific men, who have chiefly distinguished themselves as naturalists, we place the subject of our sketch. "Science," says a recent writer, "is indebted largely to Professor Owen. His share in the re-introduction of the microscope as an essential instrument in anatomical and physiological investigations; his establishment on a firm basis, as the result of the most profound microscopical research, of the main modifications which have been made in the Cuvierian theories; and his deductions, accurate as those of the mathematician, and worthy of a philosopher of any age, have raised comparative anatomy to a position which it never before attained, and elevated England as its school in the estimation of the literati of the world."

We have much pleasure, therefore, in presenting the accompanying portrait—a faithful likeness of this celebrated man—and in offering the following brief outlines of the services which he has rendered to science.

Richard Owen was born at Lancaster in the year 1804. In his early days he entertained a strong predilection for a nautical life. The great naval victories which had been achieved by our brave admirals fired his heart with enthusiasm, and, while still very young, he was sent afloat as a midshipman, with the idea doubtless before him of rivalling that great sea-king Nelson. But opportunity for naval prowess was soon brought to an end. Peace was proclaimed, and promotion became worse than doubtful. So young Owen left his berth and the cockpit to become the pupil of Mr. Baxendale, a surgeon, at Lancaster. He subsequently studied at Edinburgh, where he matriculated in 1824, and where, under the eminent Dr. Barclay, his taste for comparative anatomy was much strengthened. From Edinburgh he came to London, to walk the hospital, and at St. Bartholomew's attracted the notice of Abernethy. This good-hearted, though eccentric man conceived a strong liking for the young student, and endeavoured to obtain for him a position in the Anatomical School. In this effort, however, he failed; and, when Owen passed his examination in the College of Surgeons, in 1826, he was at a loss to know how to employ his talents. The old love for the sea had not altogether died out in his breast. He therefore availed himself of the interest he still possessed at the Admiralty, and obtained the promise of the post of assistant surgeon, on board one of his Majesty's ships. The matter so far arranged, he called on Abernethy to bid him farewell and thank him for all his kind offices.

"What is all this?" said Abernethy. "Where are you going?"

"Going to sea, sir."

"Going to sea—going to ruin!"

"I hope not, sir."

"Go to sea; you had better go to ruin at once."

And Abernethy debated, in his own peculiar way, the difficulties, temptations, and loss of time which such a step must inevitably occasion. He would listen to nothing in excuse or extenuation; but insisted on having another interview in a week. By that time he had secured for his protégé an appointment at the College of Surgeons; and thus, says the narrator of this anecdote, "the navy lost a good officer, and science gained one of her brightest ornaments."

Amongst the first labours of Mr. Owen on entering on his appointment, were those of the preparation of a catalogue in connection with Mr. Clift, of the museum of the college. Those labours, on the part of Mr. Owen, have been continued for the last thirty years—the last volume of that catalogue being completed in 1856.

In 1835 Mr. Owen married the only daughter of his co-adjutor, Mr. Clift.

In 1836 Mr. Owen succeeded Sir Charles Bell as Hunterian Professor and Conservator of the Museum of the College of Surgeons, a position which he has honourably and efficiently maintained to the present time. The peaceful career of this indefatigable man has been characterised by one continued series of labours for the promotion of scientific truth, and its practical application to the well-being of mankind. His scientific aid has always been readily placed at the service of the government in any inquiry involving considerations of a physiological nature. He was an active member of the Commission of Inquiry into the Health of Towns, of the Health of the Metropolis, and into the condition of Smithfield market. He also assisted in the establishment of the Board of Health, the organisation of which has been the chief result of the Sanitary Commission. He likewise rendered most valuable assistance in the development of the Great Industrial Exhibition of 1851.

The contributions of Professor Owen to the literature of Natural History are both voluminous and valuable. A mere enumeration of their titles would occupy a considerable space. From the sponge to the man, no form of organised life has escaped his researches, and he has thrown new light upon each.

And Professor Owen has not been without his reward. Royalty recognised his services. The residence of the late King of Hanover, at Kew, was granted to him by her Majesty. The King of Prussia conferred on him the distinction of Chevalier of the Order of Merit. He was awarded the Royal Medal in 1848, and the Copley Medal in 1851. He was appointed Chief of the Natural History Department at the British Museum in 1856. He is a corresponding member of every learned society of eminence in Europe; a Knight of the Legion of Honour; a D.C.L. of Oxford; an LL.D. of Edinburgh; an F.R.S., F.L.S., F.G.S., VP.Z.S., and the founder and first President of the Microscopical Society. The graceful tribute of other learned men to the abilities of Professor Owen are also exceedingly gratifying. Humboldt styles him the "greatest anatomist of the century;" and he is described by another writer as "the Newton of Natural History."

TARRAGONA.

TARRAGONA (a city and seaport of Catalonia) affords, of all cities in Spain, the most agreeable employment to the antiquary. Here he may admire the remains of an amphitheatre and a circus, and, in imagination, fill them again with spectators of a more exciting combat than the bull fight. Here he may visit the palace of Augustus, old classic temples, and the remains of an extensive aqueduct. He may make pilgrimage to the tomb of the Scipios, and picture to himself the grand struggle between Rome and Carthage for the empire of the world. But these ancient relics—the amphitheatre, the palace, and the tomb—are much dilapidated; and while they may excite the interest of the student, or gratify the humour of the antiquarian, have little claim on the architect, or the seeker after the picturesque.

But Tarragona has attraction for those who can admire beautiful architecture. It has several fine edifices, and one of the noblest cathedral churches in the province. The accompanying illustration represents the principal entrance to the cathedral. The nave is very large, and is divided into three parts, separated by five arches, supported by massive Corinthian pillars. The style of the vaulted roof is Gothic. A dome, raised in the centre of the transept, is exceedingly heavy, and out of keeping with the rest of the building. The high altar is enriched with marble bas reliefs, representing different events in the life of St. Thecle. In the chapel of St. Cecilia is the tomb of Cervantes Tantiño, Cardinal Archbishop of Tarragona; and in the chapel of the Holy Sacrament is that of the celebrated Spanish historian, Antonio Augustus, also Archbishop of Tarragona, and papal legate in Spain. The chapel of St. Thecle is remarkable for the richness of its decorations and the originality of its design.

The Archbishop of Tarragona bears the title of Prince. It was formerly his province to consecrate the kings of Arragon. There have been fifteen councils held in Tarragona. In 1229, a congress was there assembled concerning the marriage of James I. of Arragon with Eleanor of Castile. The city is said to have been founded by the Scipios; it was the capital of Spain under the Romans. For a short time it was the residence of Augustus. Its harbour was enlarged, and a mole erected by Hadrian. It was taken by the Goths in 467; seized by the Moors in 714; retaken by Alphonso of Arragon in 1220; captured by the English in 1705; taken by the French in 1811. It is now under Spanish authority.

OR,

THE BALANCE OF POWER AT THE FIRESIDE.

A Tale, in Three Parts.

PART I.—CHAPTER I.

THE BLUGMANS.

BLUGMAN, the father, is in the shop.

The shop is in a little street, in one of the lower parts of the city of Westminster; and to this shop—anything but full of goods—whosoever cannot afford to buy better vegetables, and larger quantities of coal, is forced to come.

The vegetables are very stringy, and the coal might be almost taken by the little babies for powders.

Blugman the father is in the shop,—and so is Blugman the son.

Not that the concern requires a partnership, or a Co. By no means. But Blugman the elder received the greengrocery line as a family heirloom, and therefore sticks to it. Blugman the younger has been tried at everything else, and been found wanting. Generally, however, he was not found at all,—for he ran away.

He is now at home with his father, to learn the business; and this he does by sitting down on the coal-sacks, up in the corner of the shop, and eating, alternately, the carrots and the turnips, when his father's back is turned.

It so happens that Ben, the son, has many opportunities for learning the business in this way; for his father pursues, for the most part, the migratory or peripatetic system of trade, and goes about with a cart and a donkey, to sell the vegetables that are not quite so stringy; and take orders for the coals that are not quite so small.

Blugman the elder has just come in from his second round; and is consequently hoarse, hot, and hungry.

There is this remarkable peculiarity about Blugman the elder, and that is, an assumption, among his customers, of the manner, and the voice, and even the face of a half-wit. He has a couple of manners, a couple of voices, and a couple of faces; one of each for the "nobility, gentry, and the public," who patronise him,—the other of each for the shop and the family circle.

To hear him, with his cart—if you may call three or four bits of wood, very indiscriminately put upon wheels, by that name—you would be afraid of paying him a ha'penny too little, lest you should make him cry. He never ventured on the loud, drawingl bawl of the common London costermonger; and never even dared to put his hand to his mouth when he called "Greens!"

"Greens," indeed, he never did call.

But in a shrill, almost deprecatory, nearly melancholy sing-song, Blugman piped, from street to street, an inarticulate sentence, which we can only compare to what a cat would do, if trying to say the first bar of the multiplication table. He addressed the maids-of-all-work in the same whining, nasal tone, and was always very humble indeed. So much so that the servants used to call him "Poor Peter" (his name was Peter), and touched their foreheads to the policemen as the cart jolted by, to demonstrate their opinion of Peter's condition.

It was a very different thing when the greengrocer was under the family roof.

On the day we are thinking of at present, Ben, learning the business, is just come to the last cut of a turnip, and sits munching, knife in hand, elbows on knees, up in the corner of the shop.

It would have been a great consolation to many a poor girl on Peter's "rounds," who thought him silly, if she had heard the strong voice with which Peter shouted to his son and heir—

"What, you're at it again, are yer, ye young scaramouch? Do yer think I buy turnips for your convenience? Come out o' that, I say!"

And the man threw his old, stiff, low-crowned hat at the boy with such force, that, catching him on the forehead with its hard edge, it raised a black mark there within a few seconds.

"What's turnips for but to eat, I should like to know?" said Ben, finishing the last bite, and throwing away the green top, without altering his posture for an instant.

"What's they for!" replied his parent. "Not for pigs like you, I should guess; leastways at their present price, you young warmint!"

"Mother and I's much obliged for the name, guv'nor," said Ben, as he wiped his knife on his trousers, and shut it up. "Pig!—then there's three on us, at all events."

And the greengrocer cursed both his wife and his son.

Mrs. Blugman was a confirmed invalid; and was lying at this moment on a sort of shakedown, in an apartment, with very little else in it, at the back of the shop.

She had heard the voice of her lord, in the above scene, and they soon heard her, in return, coughing violently on her bed, as if she would choke.

Mrs. Blugman was, in all respects, a miserable object to look upon. She might have subsisted for years on the refuse of the establishment, and upon nothing else: she was so thin, and so yellow, and so stringy.

But the worst thing was to talk with her.

Her mouth had no palate to speak of, so that no one understood her when she spoke.

No one, except Ben; and he knew, in a moment, what his mother said, and made haste always to attend to her.

She would have been dead long ago, but for Ben. He was nurse, doctor, and everything else his mother wanted, except cashier; and that department his father took, and, for the most part, kept it to himself.

It was very odd, and very affecting, to see that rough, uncouth boy, who was a great plague and persecutor to his father—(small blame to the son for that; his father had made him what he was),—it was very curious to see that boy so gentle and delicate in his attentions to the sick woman.

On this occasion, when the coughing fit was heard in the shop, Ben was up in a twinkling, and rushed to his mother's side, and his left arm was round her shoulders, and his hand in hers, till the fit was over.

"What did he say, Ben?" she asked, as she wiped her forehead with the coarse, dirty sheet.

"Said turnips wasn't to be eaten—that's what he said," and Ben muttered something else, all to himself, at the same time, which sick women ought not to hear.

"Nor more they should, Ben. How can he sell 'em if you eat 'em?"

"What is a cove to eat?" said the boy.

And he left the bedside, and began looking out into the little horrid yard at the back. It was one of those yards in which it is said you couldn't swing a cat, though what one loses by that circumstance has never, so far as we know, been mentioned.

Ben thought his mother didn't see him, but she did, as he rubbed his coat-cuff very hard into one of his eyes, while pretending to look into the yard.

For it was a very fair question—

"What is a cove to eat?"

He had eaten nothing but a turnip or two since twelve o'clock on the day before. There had been little enough money coming in at all, and that his father had drunk, as usual, except a few pence he had flung to them, which pence Ben had laid out in two or three eggs for his mother. The doctor had ordered them, and the boy bought them.

What was a cove to eat?

"Ben, you're hungry!" said his mother.

And she almost leapt up in the bed as she said it.

"How can a feller be 'ungry when he's just been blowed up for eatin' turnips, I should like to know. Lie still, mother—lie still—there's a dear old soul. Bless'd if it ain't rather hard to 'ave 'ats shied at yer for gettin' your dinner, and then to be scolded for being 'ungry!"

But Mrs. Blugman was not to be caught with this kind of chaff, and when Ben turned round, his mother was sitting up, with both hands on her knees, and her thin face, red with crying, buried in her hands.

Just then, her husband pushed open the glass door (i. e., glass and paper), and lolled into the room, smoking his black pipe.

"No dinner!" said the man. "Is it comin' through the winder, you young 'un?" he added, running up to Ben, and twisting his ear, till Ben, who never cried out (and wouldn't if he were on a gridiron), wriggled involuntarily with the pain.

"Where's the dinner, monkey?"

"Smoked and drunk," growled Ben.

"What?"

"Drunk and smoked," repeated the boy.

"Who by, you scoundrel?"

"You!" said the scoundrel, in a moment.

And then, amidst the alternate shriekings and coughings of the poor sick woman, Blugman administered to Ben (as Ben knew he would) the thrashing to which he was accustomed, "within an inch of his life."

When it was over, Ben sank down in a corner of the room, and, with all the strength that the fists of his father had left him, said—

"It's drunk and smoked, for all that!"

But Blugman was tired; beside which, a customer just then came into the shop, and it was only just in time that the greengrocer got his face arranged into the silly smile, and tuned his windpipe into the proper squeak, to say—

"Now, my dear, what's for you?"

And while his wife and son were sitting apart, nursing their separate woes—woes of his making—heaped the idiot in the shop, to the mingled amusement and compassion of his ragged patrons.

"I wish he was dead," said Ben, after a while.

"Hush, dear, hush!" whispered his mother. "Go to the cupboard, Ben, and eat that bit of bread that's there. Oh, if I'd known, I wouldn't have touched one of those eggs! Boil the other and eat it, Ben, there's a dear! I'm really tired of eggs, Ben—I am, indeed."

"Keep it till you ain't, then," said her son; and he never moved from his place.

And the gnawings of hunger in one corner of that room, and the tears of anguish in another corner, had no one to pity them.

Who knows but that, on the other side of the lath and plaster wall, there were more mothers in tears, and more sons aching with hunger?

CHAPTER II.

CLOSE BY.

"ONE half the world," says the proverb, "doesn't know how the other half lives."

If any one could furnish the information, there would be more of contentment, more of compassion, more of charity on the side of the brighter half; but perhaps there would be more of misery, and more of murmuring, on the darker side.

Who knows? Let us believe, at all events, that it would do the children of the light no harm to think oftener about the children of the shadow.

While the greengrocer's son was learning the business—a very hard lesson—up in the back street of Westminster, there was going on a somewhat different business in a house which Ben could have reached in seven minutes' walk from his father's door.

This was the town house of a young Suffolk baronet, who on that day came of age.

"The family," indeed (as they called, for custom's sake, the baronet and his sister), were not there. They were away down in the country, whither we shall follow them in good time. But the servants (only two or three), who remained in the square, determined to celebrate the happy event by imitating their betters, and giving a humble entertainment to a few friends at their master's expense. There was the coachman of the Honourable Miss Caroline Quince, the footman of the old Marquis of Turtleford, and one or two others,—gentlemen of less importance,—all of whom sat down at seven o'clock in the evening, in the servants' hall, to a commemorative feast, of which it was not too much to say, as Miss Quince's coachman really did say, that it was "a pity as us frail mortals couldn't always be hungry."

When the cloth was removed, and glasses duly deposited all round, the chairman, who was the servant left in charge of the establishment, knocked with his knuckles just once on the table, and rose to speak.

This gentleman's name was Bartholomew; but, during the many years he had lived in the Gascoigne family, he had been called Barty in the parlour, and Mr. Barty downstairs.

He was a rather short, rotund, plethoric individual, with iron-gray hair, which had always disdained powder, and a most impressive bass voice, which carried either terror, veneration, or ridicule along with it, according to his hearers.

At present it commanded veneration.

Mr. Barty stood with his left hand in his waistcoat against his frill-fronted shirt, and with the tips of his right-hand fingers he surrounded the tumbler of smoking punch that stood beside him on the table.

"Ladies and gentlemen," said Mr. Barty—the ladies were the two housemaids of the establishment, and one or two favourites whom the guests had been allowed, or asked, to bring.

"Ladies and gentlemen—ahem! Ladies and gentlemen! It would, I am certain sure, be a grievous far po on our parts, ladies and gentlemen, if we over-missed the sacred and solemn dooty, on the present occasion, of remembering, gentlemen, who we are, and where we have the 'appiness to be born. Ahem! Gentlemen,—ladies and gentlemen,—there are such individuals—yes, I deplore them while I say it—such individuals, if I may call them so, as foreigners—parties, my friends, which live, I may say, in Spain or Portugal, or even in France." (Cries of "Shame!" and some hisses.) Here Mr. Barty struck the table very hard with his waistcoat hand, which made the spoons rattle again in the glasses. "Let us be, my friends, I was going to say, thankful to Providence, that she knew better than—I mean that she scorned to make us here present either red, or brown, or black whiskered and bearded foreigners!" (Loud applause.)

"But to come to the point: we was born and bred under His Most Gracious Majesty King George!" (Bravo!) "I have heard tell, that in foreign parts there are such contemptuous people called Publicans—though I'm certain sure they don't keep an 'ouse like the 'Red Lion,' or the 'White Stag,' which we meanwhiles patronise in this neighbourhood—Publicans! who's against parliaments, and kings, and even, I may say, baronets!" (Loud cheers and groans.) "Gentlemen, these Publicans thinks that the public must be master. I was going to say, if you would forgive me the strong expression of my feelings—I wish them joy! How's the public to make the laws, I should like to know?" (Hear! hear!) "Where's the public to meet together, gentlemen? Which is the chairman? Tell me his name! It's a base delusion of the Wicked One, my friends! The public must have a governor! Down with foreigners! anywhere out of, I may say, Scotland, or, at the very farthest, Ireland! Three cheers, and three-times-three, for good King George! Hip, hip, hurrah!" And the whole company stood up, and shouted, and waved their glasses to this loyal toast, so loyally given.

Then there followed, in due order, the royal family, the army and navy, and even the bishop and clergy; upon each of which topics the chairman enlarged with the same happy combination of caution and of emphasis that will be observed in the specimen we have given.

"Fill a bumper!" said Mr. Barty.

And the bumpers were filled.

"Are we all charged?"

Every one assured him such was the fact.

"Ladies and gentlemen,—I'm sorry to say we can't put up any profession this night to be members of the honourable state of matrimony!" (Laughter.)

"We're all spinsters, or else widowers, or else young men." (Cries of "No, no!") "Well, one of us is a widow; but it's all the same. We can't be called married, without a lapsus lingus, as they say. What then? Is that, ladies and gentlemen, any just cause or impediment why we mayn't speak of a young man who's come of age? I say, must bachelors hold their tongues, because they've no olive-branches of their own to bring up in pinafores? I hope and trust not! Gentlemen! the unworthy dust who has the honour to stand where I now do, has been with the Gascoigne family from a page. Twelve year and nine months was Bartlemy Bracegirdle when he put on buttons in this present establishment. Gentlemen! I'm now in the serious yellow leaf of fifty-nine!" (One or two apron-corners here went to the fair faces of the ladies; and, as the three glasses of punch began to tell somewhat, even the harder sex seemed to suffer some emotion.) "It's, now, three baronets as I have followed to the silent grave; and that young gentleman, who is twenty-one this night, will be the fourth!" (Cries of "No, no.")

Here Mr. Barty saw that he had made a slip; but he got out of it very cleverly.

"No! Did I hear 'No?' One of us must follow; I suppose you wish Sir Lionel to follow me. Thank you!" (cries of "No, no," amidst which the chairman laughed, and enjoyed the point he had made.)

"Well, then, we'll not cast our shadows before. Let coming events be coming events." (Hear, hear.)

"But what I was premeditating to say, gentlemen, was this—May Sir Lionel be as good a man as his father, his grandfather, and his great-uncle. Their silent graves is telling him to be so." (A slight laugh.) "I repeat, their silent graves is telling him to be a better man than his posterity. And so he will; leastways, I hope so—I can't say, as yet—we don't know. There is two or three things about him—Well, never mind, ladies and gentlemen; he's very young, very; and, let me say, he's not got a strong, staminous body—we all know he's afflicted in his back, and never was otherways. But that was, I think I may say, no fault of his—especially as he was born so. Anyhow, he's a Gascoigne, and that's the man for my money; though, I must say, I've always wished Gascoigne hadn't quite such a foreign sound with it. It smells a leetle of parley-voo, I must admit. But, then, that's like his hump in the back—Sir Lionel can't help it. It's his misfortune, not his fault. Now, gentlemen, they're doing the same thing, no doubt, as us down at 'The Nunnery,' away in Suffolk. Some of the best blood in the county, I'll be wagered, is gettin' hot at this moment with wine and good wishes, in the old Hall. Let us fancy this humble punch is mulled Burgundy, gentlemen, if you please; it's humbler where there's none. What we miss in the quality, we'll make up for in the quantity." (Hear, hear.) "So, ladies and gentlemen, I give you—Long life and happiness, and many happy returns to Sir Lionel Gascoigne, Baronet, of the United Kingdom. Nine times nine! Hip! hip! Hurrah!"

And people stopped outside the railings to listen to the cheering, and wondered what it was all about; and taking up the shout, cheered themselves with it as they walked away.

After this, there followed many other eloquent addresses, in reply to the drinking of everybody's health in turn.

Miss Quince's coachman was particularly happy in his allusions to Lord Turtleford's footman, and delivered himself somewhat after this manner:—

"Bein' as the chairman is so obliging as to grant me a toast, I can only say what I'm sure is upmost in everybody's bosom at this 'appy opportunity,—health and 'appiness to Mr. Ralph Tassels, of Turtleford House; I can only say, to know him, is to love him" (loud applause). "It's not such a very long time ago, ladies and gentlemen, since—if you'll excuse my liberty and licence—I was driving along in the Mall, as true as I stand here,—my lady, she was inside; leastways, if she wasn't, she ought to have been; and I, as I say, was a driving. Who should come up, right over again my near hos, a stepping off the pavement, but Miss Patty Robinson."

(This young lady sat next to Mr. Tassels, and was regarded by the company as standing to Mr. T. in a peculiar and interesting relation; her name was, therefore, received with roars and cheering, and pleasant laughter.)

"Says I, as I passed her, 'appy gal, 'appy gal!' And I can only say, I repeat it, now, here face to face; and if I was only three or four years older, Mr. Chairman, I'd jine them—hand in hand here, before all on ye, for better, for worse—that I would!" (Great cheering.)

"Well, but where was I? Oh, missus was in the carriage. Well, just when Miss Robinson comes up, the missus, she pulls the check; if you believe me, I can only say, she well nigh did for my near little finger. Why, 'cos she thought I was ogling Mrs. Ralph Tassels; that is the—that's why." (Loud laughter.) "And served me right. So I was—and here beg leave, friend Tassels—"

And here the coachman began to move from his seat toward Mr. Tassels, who sat two or three persons from him, but in doing it he stumbled sadly, though, from his face, you would have judged that he was going as straight as a sentinel.

"I beg leave, friend Tassels, to apol—pol—gise to you, my dear feller, for the—for the favour—you did—for the injury I—received, at the time—I have mentioned" (loud cries of "Hear, hear," amid which Tassels took the coachman's hand and shook it heartily.)

Then the coachman asked Miss Robinson to forgive—that is, he told Miss Robinson he forgave her—if he might be so bold and bare-faced; and if he was wrong, it was Miss Quince's fault in pulling his little finger—he meant her's—so 'nation tight, and he could only say (and now his eyes looked very fishy, and his chin began to lean towards his check waistcoat), "'Appy gal, 'appy gal!" and "May I be there to see!"

And the coachman sat down.

"Your health, Mr. Tassels!" said the better-seasoned chairman.

A few responded.

But not many; and, if we may be allowed "liberty and licence," we must add that Miss Robinson was manifesting a little of that truth which, they say, dwells in wine, and had taken hold of Mr. Tassels's arm, so that he had to pull himself away when he rose to return thanks.

That gentleman steadied himself, on one side with Miss Patty's shoulder, and on the other on nothing particular, while he thus responded:—

"Here's all your very good healths, and the same to you, and many of 'em. I've known my friend who's jist sit down since he was—since I was—for a long time; and I beg to 'sure you, ladies and gentlemen, that a greater brick never touched the ribbins."

Here Mr. Tassels was much affected, and, quite overcome, sat down.

Then there was a song or two, beginning with "We won't go home till morning," and ending with some other which was not heard sufficiently to justify a title. In fact, it was like the trial in a law report of which the reporter says, when he has been absent or asleep, that it was "not of any public interest whatever."

And so, just when the greengrocer's wife was dropping asleep, after a night of coughing that kept every one but her husband awake, and just when that excellent man himself was harnessing the donkey to try to get a few things "on tick" at Covent Garden, the party in the square fulfilled the promise they had made in the song, and went home in the morning.

CHAPTER III.

"THE NUNNERY."

It is the morning after the little entertainment in the London square.

And we have followed "the family" down to their "place in the country"—an old, square, and rather ugly pile of red brick, dating from the Commonwealth, in the middle of a park very well kept, full of splendid timber and with plenty of deer.

Why it was called "The Nunnery," even its present proprietor didn't know; we can therefore hardly be expected to tell. But it's not at all unlikely that, some time or another, the name may have been strictly appropriate.

There had, however, been nothing monastic in the proceedings of the day before, as was evident by the general appearance of the establishment on this particular morning—a very winy aroma in the dining-hall, and a most jaded and used-up aspect (with symptoms of head-ache) on every servant's countenance, of every degree.

In fact, it is not at all certain that the wishes of the household, for the young baronet's future happiness, were as enthusiastic and as universal as they had been overnight.

Sir Lionel Gascoigne is in his library.

Let us look at him as he sits waiting for his steward, with whom he has an appointment which is almost due.

Mr. Barty had done him ample justice, in the very gentle terms he had used about his master's personal appearance.

He seemed, when sitting, to be sitting on his shoulders. In fact, there seemed nothing of him to sit. His head came always considerably below the top of any chair he might occupy. What height he had—which was not five feet—was therefore almost all in his lower limbs. What back there was pursued a very tortuous course indeed. He was, in truth, one of the most unsightly of deformities, as he sat that day in his library.

Then when he spoke, it was worse than ever. He had the most formidable tusk-like teeth, which were all completely exposed whenever he opened his mouth; but (what was considerably more trying to the spectator) he had one of those mouths which seem unable to move without developing the entire gums, above and below, almost from ear to ear. Add to this a very disorderly head of unbrushed hair, fingers like talons, and feet like (not soles, but) small turbot, and you have a very fair picture of Sir Lionel Gascoigne, of Gascoigne, in the county of Suffolk.

"Mr. Weston," said the servant.

And he introduced a visitor of middle height, of more than middle age, of a frank, open countenance, gentlemanly bearing, and dressed as an honest country yeoman was sure to be in those times—blue coat and bright buttons, nankeen waistcoat, short tights, and top-boots of a brilliant polish.

Mr. Weston was decidedly bald, excepting a tolerably broad shaggy ring of iron-gray hair that went round the back and sides of the head, and curled itself up over the temples in an easy sort of way.

Altogether, with his fine white linen, and his large bunch of seals at his fob, Mr. Weston was exactly the sort of man we should like to engage, when we assume a baronetcy and a large estate away down in Suffolk.

"Morning, Weston; glad to see you're out o' that confounded black. I was expecting you to come in like an undertaker. When did this daughter of yours die—eh?"

"It's not more than a few weeks ago, Sir Lionel," the honest man answered, in rather a thick voice. "But I peared to think it might be better—that is, more proper not to come to 'The Nunnery' in mourning on a day like this. I'm sure I wish you joy, Sir Lionel, and long life at Gascoigne."

"No doubt, no doubt," said the baronet. "And so she left two children, did she? Boys or girls, Weston?"

"Both girls, sir."

And the steward turned away for a moment, almost as much hurt by the manner of his master, as by the recollection of his loss.

"Both girls, sir; one just born when she died, and the other two years old."

"Oh, well, it's what we must all come to, I suppose, Weston—all come to, all come to."

The man had a stupid habit of repeating the ends of his sentences, a habit the more to be deprecated because he rarely said anything that was worth saying even once.

We fear we are, most of us, very indifferent hands at comforting a survivor under the loss of dear relations. But, if there is one way of adding to a fellow-creature's agony more certain than another, it is the making careless and trite reflections like those of Sir Lionel, when the hearer's heart is bleeding and breaking with sorrow.

The good old yeoman took out his yellow silk handkerchief, and fairly sobbed, and, for the moment, wished he had "come to it," according to the baronet's empty reflection.

"Well, now, Weston, about the future. That's what I've sent for you to talk about. You've been a good many years in the family—a good many years in the family," drawled out the baronet, as he twisted his talons together, and sat lower than ever in his chair.

"Matter o' forty years, Sir Lionel, I'm proud to say. I came on to this estate, Sir Lionel, afore I was of age; and, says my father to me, when I came to be valet to the dear old baronet your grandfather, said he, 'You're made a man of now, boy! Act up to it!' and so I've tried, Sir Lionel, I'm sure I've tried, since here I've been."

"No doubt, no doubt. There's no doubt about that, Weston," and Sir Lionel began coughing, and stood up in front of the fireplace, and put his coat-tails under his arms, and swung his miserable figure from side to side.

"I was one-and-twenty years old yesterday," said the baronet, showing every tooth, and every place to which every tooth belonged.

"Yes, sir," said the steward, "and many happy returns of the day, with all my heart!"

"Not so sure about that, my fine fellow, not so sure about that."

And Sir Lionel chuckled, and looked the faithful old steward in the face, with a broad grin over his own mouth.

"I haven't always been one-and-twenty, Weston."

"Lor! no, sir; I remember you, sir, if you'll forgive me, when you were no higher than that, when you 'peard' to be very unlikely to come to the title, you were so feeble and sickly. Dear me!"

"I used to be six years younger once, wasn't I, Weston?"

"Ay, sir; but by that time, ye know, ye began to be a bit stronger. Danger was pretty well over, Sir Lionel, by the time ye were fifteen."

The baronet's brow grew darker.

"I think I used to play sometimes, Weston, when I was about that age; didn't I, Weston?"

"Play, sir! cer—tain—ly. You could run and leap with anybody by the time you were fifteen or sixteen. I remember—"

"Go on, Weston; what do you remember?"

"I was going to say, sir, I remember your getting the better of three other lads out yonder in the great avenue, the Fortescues, I think they were, and beating the best of 'em by a good three feet in a race—and the youngest was older than you, Sir Lionel, that he was."

"Indeed; and do you remember anything else that happened, Weston, when I was about fifteen? Eh?"

"No," said the other, "nothing particular; nothing very particular."

And Weston stared from his seat into the baronet's face, while the latter swayed to and fro, with his feet on the hearthrug.

"Don't remember poking your nose into my games one day in the stable, eh, Weston? Don't remember getting me a thrashing, I suppose in this very room, just six years ago? By the powers! it was on my birthday, too; six years' yesterday! Don't remember it, eh?"

And the baronet set his tusks together, and showed even his back teeth, as if he would grind the bones of his companion between them with infinite relish.

"Really, Sir Lionel, it's gone from my memory," said the old steward. "I think you must be mistaken. But suppose it was so?"

"Suppose it was so!" almost shrieked the baronet.

"Will you dare, sir, to look the man in the face who gave you the very coat on your back, and who feeds those greasy old chops with his own meat, and tell him you blabbed upon him, and got him beaten nearly to death. Suppose it was so, indeed! Aha! aha!"

And the little object laughed a hideous, fiendish laugh, till his face grew purple, and deep went the claws of his talons into the palms of his hands, as he clenched them in his rage.

"Oh, Sir Lionel! don't, don't refer to it. I remember it all now—everything about it. You were only a child then, you know. I'm sure you wouldn't do it now. You can't justify it, I think; can you, sir? I think not."

And Mr. Weston spoke very humbly, and in a deprecating tone, as if afraid that his young master would fly at him like a polecat, as he seemed very likely indeed to do.

"Remember, sir! what do you remember?"

"Well, you know, it was about poor little Biscuit."

"Well, sir, and what about her?"

"The gunpowder, you know, sir."

And Weston hardly spoke above a whisper.

(To be continued.)

The Matron.

NO. XLVIII.

I SHALL begin this chapter with a few directions about bonnets. Trimming bonnets is almost as useful an art as making them. I shall in the first instance speak of trimming bonnets.

The bonnet that requires a simpler trimming than any other is a straw bonnet, with a curtain of the same material as itself. Even in the winter a bonnet of this kind, trimmed with brown, purple, or crimson sarsenet ribbon, looks very nice and appropriate; but, how simply soever you may trim your bonnet, never omit a head-piece of muslin, or sarsenet, according to the style of the bonnet. This head-piece consists merely of a straight piece of the width and depth of the crown. It should be neatly tacked into the bonnet, and have a bit of white cord or bobbin run into the hem, to fit the bonnet to the size of the head; and do not be satisfied merely with a head-piece, have also a bonnet preserver in every bonnet. You can purchase one of them for fourpence or sixpence at the haberdasher's, and, without this precaution, the oil, which ladies wear on their hair, soon spoils a bonnet that may have cost twenty or thirty times as much as a bonnet preserver.

Perhaps you may say I have begun by the least important part of the bonnet. I am of a different opinion; and now I proceed to the trimming. To cross over the crown, and to afford long strings in front, and to make a nice bow behind, you will find four yards and a half of ribbon quite sufficient.

Supposing you were to undertake the making of a bonnet, and that you have a shape you wish to imitate, proceed in this manner:—Procure about a yard and a half of silk, a yard of stiff net, and three yards of ribbon wire. Tack some of the last-mentioned article on to the edge of the pattern bonnet. Carry the wire round the edge and the crown, and also round the part where the head-piece is put in. This done, and the wire being pinched into the right shape, and you will have, on un-tacking it, the skeleton of the bonnet. You have then only to cover it with the stiff net, taking care to securely fasten the wires where they meet and cross.

Tack the silk over the bonnet before you attempt to cut it. Secure the large piece for the bonnet itself first, then the lining and curtain, and finally the crown piece. Let it all be cut bias. No piping is necessary. A light hand, and light, but effective work, secures success in bonnet-making; and the silk or other material, when tightly and exactly fitted to the bonnet-shape, turns in at the edges with surprising facility and good effect. The French, who are such excellent bonnet-makers, show great skill in this part of the work, and though they never spare the needle where it is required, they use few stitches in bonnet-making. Mind, in cutting the curtain, that the centre is deeper than the ends. Three-quarters of a yard of the fashionable feather trimming would be quite sufficient for the outside of a bonnet. A full blonde cap should be worn inside. For the strings you will require a yard and a half of ribbon, and these, as well as the feather trimming, should correspond in colour with the silk chosen for the bonnet.

The bonnet which we offer as an illustration, is a very tasteful one. In imitating it, you have only to proceed according to the general rules we have given you. Three pieces of wire must run from the edge to the crown, to maintain the shape in which the wire is used in drawn bonnets.

In plate No. 1, the foundation of the bonnet, which is of stiff muslin, is increased in size towards the front, by a wire, between which and the foundation there is an insertion of tulle.

The silk which composes both the bonnet covering, curtains, and strings, is of purple "gros de Naples," and the bows of the side and behind are of black satin ribbon; the bonnet-curians and strings are finished off with black edging. This bonnet would look very well made in plain black silk, with the assistance of a little black tulle edging, and with scarlet bows before and behind. It would make a remarkably handsome winter bonnet; and for in-door wear, the following "pelerine," or tippet, would be in equally good taste if worn over a silk dress.

This tippet, as represented in plate No. 2, is made of black tulle. The ribbon that ornaments it is of black satin; the two rows of quilling are of black lace, and a scarlet satin bow finishes it off at the collar.

JAPAN AND THE JAPANESE.

JAPAN, called by the Japanese Nippon, and by the Chinese Yang-hon, is an insular empire off the coast of the Asiatic Continent, about which, until very recently, we knew nothing absolutely. Once upon a time the Portuguese were admitted into this exclusive empire; but their conduct occasioned their own expulsion, and brought about jealous antipathy to strangers on the part of the Japanese authorities. They suspected everybody, and shut out the world. The Dutch, indeed, were allowed to hold a limited commerce with the people, and yearly visited the port of Nagasaki. The Americans have also within the last few years established commercial relations with the Japanese; but the most successful results never carried the foreigner beyond the frontier of the empire. The interior of the country, the extent and wealth of its cities, were only known by hearsay, and Japan proper was a terra incognita to the rest of the world. China was regarded as isolated and exclusive; but China was familiar to us all when compared to our acquaintance with Japan. Over those islands there hung an impenetrable mystery.

Our recent brush with the Chinese has produced an unexpected result. The report of our successes spread with rapidity, and was heard within the sacred walls of Jeddo. That report produced a panic—a panic of which Russian and American plenipotentiaries were the first to reap the harvest. But, thanks to the energy and determination of Lord Elgin, we have obtained something more than the mere gleaning of what others have spared. For our own country, as well as for the rest of the world, Lord Elgin has achieved more than even the Yankees had ventured to anticipate; and the clouds which have hidden Japan from our sight have rolled away at the near approach of progressive civilisation.

We have been admitted to Jeddo. European eyes have beheld what they have never seen before: its interminable streets—its comfortable houses—its spacious bazaars—its white temples—its high thatched cottages—its green batteries—its gigantic palace—its pleasant tea-houses—its square-rigged junks—all have been suddenly disclosed. We have made the acquaintance of Jeddo in a day, and have been favourably received by its people. So Japan is open to us, and the sooner we improve the acquaintance the better.

The empire of Japan comprises five large and a great number of small islands. The three principal islands have a very uneven surface, the plains covering no great space, and the hilly country being extensive and rocky. Nippon is the largest of these islands, and has Jeddo for its capital. The empire has two emperors—one temporal, the other spiritual.

The spiritual emperor resides at Miaco, and is the descendant of the old race, who were dethroned by the ancestors of the temporal emperor (1583). He has the entire superintendence of religion and education, but no further connection with government. He passes his life in seclusion, surrounded by numerous officials, who treat him with divine honours. He never eats twice off the same plate, as the vessels used in his repast are immediately destroyed, lest they should fall into unhallowed hands. He never wears the same clothes twice, as the robe he lays aside at night is destroyed immediately, and a new one placed ready for him in the morning. The descent of the spiritual emperor, it is said, can be traced for 2,500 years.

The temporal emperor of Japan, having his chief residence at Jeddo, exercises control over every department of government, except those of religion and education. The office of emperor is theoretically elective, but is practically a family heir-loom. The chief nobles engage in a sort of election; the certain result is that the son succeeds his father. The nobles owe feudal duty to the reigning emperor, who obliges them to reside for six months in the year at Jeddo, with their families; during the other six months, he allows them to visit their estates, but retains their families as hostages at Jeddo. This practice is intended to prevent the nobles obtaining too much influence over the people—a very wise precaution, when we learn that some of these peers arrive at the capital during the season with ten or fifteen thousand retainers.

The Chinese and the Japanese have sometimes been supposed to be almost identical in their manners, but nothing can be further from the truth. The Chinese are stereotyped in all their principles and practices: the Japanese, on the contrary, are a progressive people. Their mental machinery is in motion, not at a dead standstill, like that of the Celestials. Many valuable lessons may be learned from the Japanese, even by the vaunted civilisation of the west. Our own metropolis is in many particulars inferior to Jeddo. The people of that city carry out complete sanitary arrangements, and their homes are consequently healthful and agreeable. Everybody is clean, so that the eye is not offended at every turn by rags, and wretchedness, and filth. Baths and washhouses are regular institutions: there are no beggars, no cripples, no poverty, no squalor, no fighting, no drunkenness, to be seen. Everywhere are the indications of thrift and industry. We are brought suddenly face to face with an advanced and advancing people—a people who know how to build comfortable and commodious houses, and to furnish them with taste and elegance; a people who know how to plan a city that shall contain an immense population, and which shall be greater in its extent than London, and yet be carefully and symmetrically arranged; and a people, moreover, who—not satisfied with the civilisation which they have attained already—are anxious to avail themselves of every improvement that may be suggested. They turn out of their yards at Nagasaki locomotive engines; they understand the principle of the electric telegraph; they manufacture thermometers and barometers, theodolites, microscopes, &c. &c. It is astonishing how rapidly they pick up information, how thoroughly they appreciate all they learn, and how practical they are in turning everything to account.

Jeddo, the capital, extends for miles round the bay of Kanagawa, and is said to be the largest city in the world. Its population approaches 3,000,000. Its streets are broad and good, paved in the centre, the houses excellent. The residences of the princes and nobles are palaces capable of containing 10,000 men. They are built in regular order forming wide streets, forty yards broad, and kept in perfect order. An immense courtyard with trees and shrubs is placed in the centre of the inclosure, formed by the barracks or out-houses for the retainers, in the midst of which is the house of the proprietor. The gateways leading to the courtyard are exceedingly handsome. But the royal palace, or castle, as it is called, surpasses, both in extent and grandeur, any other building in the city. It is entirely surrounded by a moat seventy or eighty yards broad, faced with a smooth green escarpment as many feet in height, above which runs a massive stone wall, crowned in its turn by a lofty palisade. Above this wall and palisade are seen the spreading arms of giant cedars, proudly displaying themselves, denoting an extensive park within these formidable walls.

The opportunities which Lord Elgin and his suite enjoyed of observing the habits and manners of the people seemed to convince them of their intelligence and industry. Japan is a fine country, and the Japanese a fine people, whose exclusiveness has not arisen from an assumption of superiority over the rest of mankind, but from a conviction that the well-being and happiness of the community would not be increased by the introduction of foreign tastes. Most striking of all, is the fact that the Japanese are a "go-ahead" race—a people bent on improvement—thoroughly imbued with the spirit of popular progress. Great and grand results may be fully anticipated from the opening up of this interesting country to the other nations of the world, and we owe a debt of gratitude to Lord Elgin for the prompt and successful service which he has rendered.

The principal points in the treaty have already transpired. It provides for a resident minister at the court of Jeddo, for the opening of the ports of Kanagawa (which has not inappropriately been called the Whampoa of Jeddo), of, Nagasaki, and of Hakodadi within the term of one year from the date of signature; at later periods a port on the west coast and another on the east coast called Hiogo, which is the port of Ohosaka, are to be opened to the commerce of the west, while the principal cities of Jeddo and Ohosaka are to be thrown open to trade. For the present, Europeans, with the exception of the minister at Jeddo, are not allowed to travel in the interior. The peculiar internal organisation of the country, which is divided by 360 feudal princes into separate and almost independent principalities, will account for this restriction.

The commercial arrangements are on the most liberal possible scale. All exports, with the exception of a few prohibited articles, are subject to a duty of 5 per cent. Imports are charged with a duty of 10 per cent, but as there are no tonnage or other duties this does not seem an unreasonable amount. A list of articles on which there is an import duty of only 5 per cent, is excepted from this general provision, and one of the most important concessions which we are informed was obtained by Lord Elgin was the insertion in this latter list of cotton and woollen goods. We are much mistaken if, from what we hear of the Japanese, the market thus created for our home manufactures will not rival that afforded by the vast empire lately thrown open by the treaty of Tien-sin. Another important provision, and one which we believe is not contained in the American treaty, is that by which it is agreed that the tariff shall be subject to revision at the end of five years. This is a most necessary precaution in the case of an unknown and uncreated trade.

ROBBERY AND MYSTERY.

Soon after entering the capital of the so-called Mexican Republic, as was my usual custom while sojourning in a foreign city, I hired for my servant a man capable of acting as my cicerone about the town. At this time I had in my possession a bill of exchange upon a wealthy house; but not caring to have it honoured before my departure, I thought it best to retain it till the last moment, as the care of a large sum of money would be troublesome to one whose desire was to be free from standing guard over his own effects.

For this reason I did not even call upon the drawee of the bill; and as I was a stranger to them personally, I thus exposed myself to a total loss, in the event of the same falling into the possession of some dishonest individual, who might represent himself as the proper payee. That I committed a great error in thus neglecting to secure myself against false representation—an error by which my money and life might have been forfeited—the peruser of this transcript from my note-book will clearly perceive.

I had been some three or four days in the city, promenade through its principal thoroughfares and drives, glancing modestly at the dark, lustrous-eyed beauties whom I continually met and passed, when I said to my man Pablo, that he must now take me in hand and show me everything that could possibly interest a foreign traveller. Pablo, I may remark, by the way, was one of the keenest rogues that ever dodged the police and kept his worthy neck outside of a halter—though this I learned too late to save myself some trouble—and he had the reputation of having once been an indifferent actor, which will account for his mode of putting his questions.

"Does your worship wish to go behind the scenes?" he quietly inquired.

"Even into the 'green room' of the town, Pablo," laughed I, "and observe, if possible, the 'make up' of the actors."

"The best time for that, then, senor, is at night, while the dramatic corps are preparing for their parts."

"We will begin to-night, Pablo."

We did begin that night; and before the bell tolled the hour of twelve I fancied I had seen the city of nobles and beggars turned inside out. At least I had seen enough to content me; and as we issued from a splendid gambling saloon, where a beautiful and fascinating senorita was dealing monte for the benefit of herself and numerous admirers, I said—

"Now then, for our hotel, Pablo."

"One adventure more, senor, and your worship shall retire with the wisdom of a Solomon."

"One adventure more," I assented.

With this Pablo began to lead the way through a dark, narrow street; when suddenly, as I turned a sharp corner, a heavy mantle was thrown over my head, and my person at the same moment seized by two powerful ruffians, one of whom forced a gag into my mouth, while the other pinioned my arms.

"Senor," said a calm, quiet voice, "it were easier for us to kill than take you alive; but your life we do not seek; so be governed by policy, and make no resistance, and you shall not be harmed. We will tell you presently what we require of you. Pray follow as we lead."

I did so—for I was in their power and could do nothing better—and in the course of a couple of minutes I found myself alongside of a carriage, with a request that I would enter it. I still obeyed—not with the best grace and most pleasant feelings—but quiescently and without disturbance. My kidnappers entered with me, still keeping me pinioned and gagged, and away we whirled.

Fifteen minutes—or less time it might have been—brought us to a halt beneath some dark archway.

"Senor," said the spokesman, "have the goodness to alight, and suffer me to conduct your worship into a private apartment."

I got out of the carriage, and was led down some ten or a dozen steps, into what I fancied, from the change of atmosphere, to be a damp stone vault, beneath the surface of the earth. The cloak was still over my eyes; but presently I could see the reflection of a light, and immediately after this the mantle was removed, and two masked men, dressed in black, one of them holding a sort of dark-lantern, were revealed to my view. I glanced quickly around the apartment, and saw that it was small, having rough stone walls, and only one outlet, the door through which we had entered. Save two or three rough benches, it was empty also; and pointing me to one of these, the same person who had before addressed me said—

"Pray be seated, senor, and we will give you liberty to speak."

I complied with his request, and he at once stepped forward and removed the gag. As soon as I found I could use my voice, I sternly demanded the meaning of such treatment.

"Be calm, senor, do not get excited, and we will inform you," was the cool reply, spoken in an ordinary business tone. "The fact is, senor," he went on, "you are a stranger in Mexico, with more means at your command than strangers generally have, or any honest man may have immediate use for; and we, being less blessed in this respect than your worthy self, have taken the liberty of inviting you hither to negotiate a loan."

"In other words, to rob me," said I.

"That is a harsh word, senor, which we seldom make use of—we call our mode of acquiring means a new way of borrowing; and for this reason: that, instead of giving the person from whom we borrow security of our own, we leave him safely housed for the security of ourselves. In short, senor, not to waste words, let me inform you in brief that we want all your weapons, jewellery, and ready funds, with the exception of sufficient to support you till you can raise more; and, once possessed of these, we will quietly depart, and leave you here for such time as will be necessary to make our escape certain—say till to-morrow night—when you will be set at liberty in a very harmless way. You see, at once, senor, you have providentially fallen into honest hands, for which you should thank the saints—for had you fallen into the hands of villains, your life might have been the forfeit."

"Oh, I am deeply and profoundly thankful, of course!" returned I, ironically. And then I quickly added: "By your accent and mode of speaking, I judge you are no Mexican."

"So much the better for our purpose," replied the villain; "for you have a bill of exchange on a house here which you have never visited; and if I can personate a respectable foreigner—say yourself, for instance—I can get it honoured as well as another."

I saw that I was really caught by robbers at last—that it would be useless to waste words—that perhaps it would be best to yield with a good grace to what I had not the power to avert—and so I informed the gentleman that he was at liberty to do what he thought proper, only I would pray him to give me my liberty in a reasonable time, and not leave me entirely destitute.

"By San Marco!" he rejoined; "your worship is the most sensible gentleman I have had dealings with for years! and I assure you I am one not unacquainted with the customs of the road. We will deal as gently by you as by an infant, and ever remember you gratefully in our prayers."

With this he coolly proceeded to rifle my pockets and person, taking from me my revolvers, knife, jewellery, purse, and pocket-book, in the latter of which he found the afore-mentioned bill of exchange, the amount of which caused his eyes to glisten, as I could see even through the mask.

"Pray tell me," said I, "how you knew I had that draft, and had not yet presented it?"

"Pardon me, senor! that would be exposing the secrets of our profession, which we never do to the uninitiated."

"By treachery," said I. "My servant must have made the discovery, and you are his accomplices."

"Suspect whom you please, senor," he replied; "every gentleman is entitled to his thoughts; but in order to show your worship the possibility of your being in error, permit me to observe, confidentially, that a watch has been upon you ever since the moment you set foot in this glorious city. Ah, senor, I perceive your purse is heavy and will suffice for your present wants—accept it back, sir; your jewellery also may be of more value to you than us, and so we restore it—we only desire to do the fair thing; and this bill of exchange, being even larger than we supposed, shall satisfy us for the present."

With this he returned the articles mentioned; and then coolly remarking he did not think it safe to unbind me till the moment for restoring me to liberty, he turned on his heel, made me a polite bow, and, with his companion, walked out, closing and locking the door behind him.

I was thus left alone in my prison, in total darkness, with my arms so pinioned as to be both useless and painful. My feelings during the long hours which followed, the reader can better imagine than I express; but though I suffered much physically and mentally, I did not at first despair, because I believed I should eventually be set at liberty in some mysterious manner.

As hour after hour, however, passed away in that dark and silent dungeon, I began at last to grow more and more uneasy. What if, after all, I should be left to perish in my prison? The thought was too horrible to be entertained, and I strove to banish it, and, aided by a strong will, I so far succeeded as to keep in tolerably fair spirits.

At last, to my great joy, I heard the key of my door turn, and was surprised to see a female mask standing in the gray light of the opening—for it was already day without, though not a ray of light had reached the vault.

"Senor," she said, in a clear, stern voice, "will you be kind enough to present yourself to my view?"

I advanced to the door where she was standing.

"You are still bound, I perceive," she said.

"Unfortunately, lady," I replied, "and have suffered much."

"You wish your liberty?"

"I certainly am not overjoyed at remaining where I am."

"Will you answer me one question, upon your oath as a Christian, and upon your honour as a gentleman?"

"If within my power, and it does not affect my safety."

"It affects your release, senor; and, if favourably answered, may restore you immediately to liberty."

"Speak on, then!"

"Will you, then, solemnly swear, that if all your effects are restored to you, even to your weapons, you will suffer yourself to enter a carriage blindfold, and thus remain till driven beyond sight of this dwelling? and then leave and depart without asking any questions, or seeking in any manner, or by any means, to pry into the mysterious occurrences which have surrounded you within the last twelve hours?"

"Yes," said I, "for a complete restoration of all my effects, and my person to liberty, I will solemnly swear, by all I hold sacred and holy, to conduct myself according to the conditions named."

"Then, senor, within an hour you shall have your freedom!" was the reply, as the masked lady stepped back, and closed and locked the iron door, leaving me again alone, a prisoner still.

A few minutes later, as I remained standing by the door, pondering this singular mystery, I fancied I heard the rumble of carriage wheels; and shortly after the door was again unlocked, and a masked figure entered, who said he had orders to blindfold and conduct me hence, and restore me to liberty.

All this might mean treachery, I thought; but I knew, if my life were really sought, I was in the power of my enemies, and could not escape; and by assenting quietly to every proposition made me, my condition would certainly not be rendered worse than by rejecting them. I therefore suffered him to bandage my eyes and lead me to the carriage, which he entered with me, my arms still remaining pinioned.

A few moments later we were whirling through the streets of the city, which we continued to do for some half an hour, when the carriage stopped suddenly, the bandage was removed from my eyes, and I was solemnly charged by my masked companion to remember my oath, or else no power on earth could save me. I looked from the window, and to my astonishment saw we were in a fashionable part of the city; and to my still greater astonishment, my strange conductor now proceeded to cut loose my bonds, and restore me my weapons and pocket-book, which latter he opened and showed me the same bill of exchange which had been taken from me.

"Now, squire," he said, as he flung back the door of the carriage, "please mingle with those people yonder, and take no notice which way we drive. Adios!"

The door closed as I descended the steps, and the carriage whirled away, I never knew whither.

This whole matter, a mystery from beginning to end, has remained so to this day. I could not believe I was not robbed until I had searched everything, and received my money on my draft; after which I pondered the matter deeply, but, of course, venturing to question no person, because forbidden by my oath.

At first I thought it a case of conscience merely; then a practical joke, perhaps; but subsequently, on looking through my pocket-book, and finding in it a small silver symbol of the Masonic order, I was led to conjecture that that had saved me from robbery, if not from death, and that one or more of those who had me in charge were members of this fraternal band.

This, of course, was and is, mere conjecture; but it is the only reasonable solution of the mystery I have ever been able to obtain; for Pablo, who might have thrown some light upon the matter, I never set eyes upon again.

Small Change.

WE are often told to imitate nature. Still we shouldn't imitate her too literally. We needn't dress in green velvet through the summer because she does.

Two cousins, named Crickett, were married last week in Queen's county. We are opposed to such cricket-matches.

Good dinners have a harmonising influence. Few disputes are so large that they cannot be covered by table-cloth.

A MAN in battle is not allowed to whistle to keep his courage up, and the whistling of the bullets doesn't have that tendency.

Dogs of every kind, setters, pointers, bulls, Newfoundlanders, mastiffs, and terriers, are all lap dogs—when they are drinking.

It is extraordinary how many defects we can discern in a friend after we have quarrelled with him. The same remark applies to a woman, when she has rejected her former lover.

THE horse's coat is the gift of nature, but the tailor very often makes a coat for an ass.

CANDOUR.—A distinguished commercial gent, whose word is his bond—that is to say, it would puzzle any Bankruptcy commissioner to determine which was the more worthless of the two—thus laid down his travelling chart through life:—"I never believe more than one half of what I see, more than a quarter of what I hear, and not a word of what I say. If others were equally cautious there would not be so many fools in this world."

A DIAMOND shut up in its subterraneous prison, rough and unpolished, differs not to the eye from a common stone; and a Newton or a Shakespeare, deprived of the presence of kindred minds and born among savages, savages had died.

A SERMON was preached in the parish church of Crowle, by the Rev. H. Phillips, B.A., from "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." Amongst the congregation was a female, who was dull of hearing, and on her return home she told her husband that the reverend gentleman had taken for his text, "Except ye pay your rent, ye must all go to the parish."

A FRIEND of ours was travelling lately, while adlicted with a very bad cough. He annoyed his fellow-travellers greatly, till finally one of them remarked, in a tone of displeasure:—"Sir, that is a very bad cough of yours." "True, sir," replied our friend, "but, you will excuse me, it's the best I've got!"

A HORSE-JOCKEY, who incautiously burned his fingers by taking up his toast from the fire, and broke the plate by letting it fall, observed that it was too bad too lose the plate after having won the heat.

THE mist that hangs like silver curtains around the plains before sunrise, and is lifted by day's golden cords out of our sight, has death in the woof; it is woven, here and there, of fatal threads.

No doubt there is room enough in the world for men and women, but it may be a serious question whether the latter are not taking up more than their share of it.

THE water that has no taste is purest; the air that has no odour is freshest; and of all the modifications of manner, the most generally pleasing is simplicity.

"Yours is a very hard case," said the fox to the oyster.

THERE are many Christians who, all their life long, carry their hope as a boy carries a bird's nest containing an undegged bird that can scarcely peep, much less sing—a poor fledgeless hope.

WE say of the blind man, from whom the visible world is shut out, that he is poorer by half the world than the man who sees. O ye spiritually blind, ye indeed are poorer than we by a whole world!

A RELIGIOUS life is not a thing which spends itself like a bright bubble on the river's surface. It is rather like the river itself, which widens continually, and is never so broad or so deep as at its mouth, where it rolls into the ocean of eternity.

HONOUR women! They scatter heavenly roses on the path of our earthly life; they weave the happy bonds of love, and beneath the modest veil of the graces, they nourish with a sacred hand the immortal flower of noble sentiments.

IF you see a man grossly ignorant and superficial on points which you do understand, be not ready to give credit, on the score of character, which he may have attained, for any great ability in points which you do not understand.

SOME men are very entertaining for a first interview, but after they are exhausted, and run out; on a second meeting we shall find them very flat and monotonous; like hand-organs, we have heard all their tunes; but unlike those instruments, they are not new-barrelled so easily.

"YOU seem to walk more erect than usual, my friend." "Yes, I have been straightened by circumstances."

A YANKEE, according to the latest authority, sees aqueducts in bubbling springs, buildings in stones, and cash in everything.

OF all earthly music, that which reaches the farthest into heaven is the beating of a loving heart.

EULALIE.—A BALLAD.

I HAVE met thee in the sunlight,
When our hearts were light and free;
And a winning smile was on thy lip,
Thy cherished Eulalie!
Oh, how swift those moments fled
On wings of love away!
For boding fears and falling tears
Marred not our blissful day.

I have met thee in the twilight,
When the day had spent its glee;
Yet thy heart, I knew, was warm and true—
My idol, Eulalie!
The light scarce burned at heaven's gate,
But my step was firm and sure;
For I trusted in my faithful guide,
The constant and the pure.

And now amid the darkness
Of life's wide, desert sea,
Again I'll place thy hand in mine.
Oh, saintly Eulalie!
Again thine eyes shall light my path
Even as they did before.
Until we stay our upward way,
Perchance at heaven's door!

EDGAR HASTINGS.—Upon the collocation of the words in a Latin sentence depends, in a great measure, the purity and perspicuity of the style. Some few general rules may be laid down to assist the tyro in the use of the adverbs and conjunctions; but the only means of cultivating the ear, and thus enabling it to suggest the proper collocation, is to get by heart Cicero's "De Senectute," and "De Amicitia," to make, by frequent repetitions, the elegancies of those two inimitable compositions part of your stock in trade, and, by translating, and then retranslating into Latin your own English version, to master the rhythm of the Ciceronian sentence. Horace, in addressing the Roman student of Greek literature, says,

"Exemplaria Græcæ, Nocturnâ versate manu versate diurnâ."

Mutatis mutandis, you would do well to follow his advice, for, to the treatises which we recommend so strenuously, many of the scholars of the present day owe the acquisition of a Latin style perfectly unexceptionable. Experio crede, exercises alone will never enable you to effect your object, but follow the advice we have given, and success is certain.

JAMES POULTON.—"James Poulton" would be very glad to know the rights of the affair of the "Charles et Georges." So should we, and so would the British government. All we can tell "James Poulton" is, that the "Charles et Georges" is a French ship, that it was accused (and, we must own, apparently with good grounds) of carrying on the slave trade on the eastern coast of Africa. The Portuguese, in accordance with international law, captured the "Charles et Georges" as a slaver. It was tried at Mozambique, and was then taken to Lisbon to be tried at a higher court of appeal. After all it was not condemned, and by some it is supposed that the French government, alias the Emperor, used intimidation to prevent the law taking its course. The organ of the French government gives a different view of the case, and declares that the government of the Emperor neglected nothing to enlighten the government of Portugal, and hoped that the cabinet of Lisbon would have admitted the irregularity of proceedings against a vessel (the "Charles et Georges") that could not even be suspected. The Emperor's hope was at first deceived, but, brought to a more exact appreciation of the circumstances, the Portuguese government submitted to the representations of the Emperor. After these statements we leave "James Poulton" to judge for himself of the rights of the case.

ONE EAGER FOR INFORMATION.—English enterprise has at length effected the opening of the ports of Japan—ports closed on strangers from time immemorial. This wonderful and magnificent city can now be visited by Englishmen. The other nations of Europe will follow in our train. Jeddo, the capital of Japan, is described, by one who saw it as recently as last September, to be one of the finest cities in the whole world. The houses of the princes and nobles are palaces, some of them containing ten thousand followers. They are built regularly, forming wide streets forty yards broad, and they are kept in perfect order. An immense courtyard, with trees and gardens, forms the centre of each inclosure, in the midst of which is the house of the owner. The houses containing the followers, servants, stables, &c., form this inclosure. They are constructed of one uniform shape. The gateways leading to the courtyard are exceedingly handsome, and are formed of massive wood-work, ornamented with lacquer.

ADA PEMBERTON.—You say that in spite of every precaution, you are constantly taking cold, and that with you cold always brings on a cough. You tell us you keep your chest covered with flannel. So far so good, but you should cover your back and shoulders also with flannel. Those who understand anatomy will tell you that in order to protect your lungs, the back and shoulders should be kept warm as well as the chest. We do not recommend those who have nothing the matter with them, to take to flannel jackets, but you are likely to find them very useful. However, bear in mind it would be imprudent to throw your flannel jacket aside in order to wear a low dress for an evening only. By such a proceeding you might bring on inflammation of the lungs. For company, wear a becoming high dress.

MARK TAPLEY.—We are, indeed, expected to say a great deal in a few words. "Mark Tapley," for instance, wants us to tell him what qualities are necessary to enable him to get on in life. A great many qualities are necessary for this desirable object, and if "Mark Tapley" had read with attention the papers we have been publishing, entitled "Hopes and Helps," he would have known that much by this time. But as we would not dismiss a correspondent without a definite answer, we will observe that two very essential qualities for success and distinction in this life, are—punctuality in business, and presence of mind in danger. Of the last-mentioned quality, Captain Johnstone (of the Eastern City, bound from Liverpool to Melbourne) has recently given an instance that should not be forgotten. When this ship, on the 23rd of August last, was six hundred miles away from land, the frightful fact was ascertained that fire had broken out in the forehold. The captain at once ordered all the passengers and crew on deck. One only disobeyed, and consequently perished. The absence of this one was not noticed at the time. The hatches were closed, and the most energetic and judicious measures checked, though they could not subdue, the fire. Sixty women and children were gathered together on the poop of the vessel, with such poor comforts as could be collected. The fire had been discovered at two o'clock, p.m. The next morning it was found working its way into the afterhold, and death was full in view. The captain, and his men following his example, still worked on undismayed. At about two in the afternoon, the captain went down into the after-saloon with a few of the passengers to get a little food, as it seemed the last meal they would ever take, when from the deck the cry arose, "A sail! a sail!" Within half an hour from the time the ship was first sighted, she bore down upon them, and cheering as only British soldiers and sailors can cheer, the ship's company and troops on board the merchantman passed under the stern of the burning Eastern City. Captain Johnstone hailed them through his trumpet, "We are on fire. Will you stand by us?" Soon a welcome voice was heard from the merchantman, "Aye! aye!" The boats of each vessel were lowered, and ere long 227 persons were removed from a frightful death. It is to be hoped this providential rescue will never be forgotten by the passengers of the Eastern City, and the presence of mind of Captain Johnstone we must hold up as an example to "Mark Tapley" and all our readers. Presence of mind leaves us master of our resources when most we want them, but timid people lose their wits in the hour of peril.

ARACHNE.—Arachne has been reading about King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table. She wishes us to tell her if King Arthur is an historical character. We answer in the affirmative, but we cannot vouch for the truth of all that has been written about him. History tells us that it was in opposing the Saxon invader, Cerdic, that Arthur acquired his fame. Some authors suppose him to have been the son of Ambrosius; others, his nephew. According to another account, he was a Cornish prince, son of Guorlois, king of that province. At any rate, he was a commander of great valour, and as an ancient and distinguished Briton, all we can gather of his life and exploits has an interest for us. King Arthur is said to have worsted the Saxons in twelve successive battles, but his enemies were too numerous to be extirpated by the efforts of single valour. Arthur's domestic misfortunes were as remarkable as his public exploits. His wife was carried off by Melnas, King of Somersetshire, who detained her a whole year at Glastonbury, until Arthur, discovering her retreat, advanced with an army against Melnas, and obliged him to give up his captive. Of Arthur's second wife no mention is made, but his third falling a victim to the villainy of Mordred, the king's own nephew, a rebellion ensued, and King Arthur and his treacherous kinsman meeting in battle, slew each other. Arthur's death is stated to have taken place A.D. 514.

DIANA.—It was on the 16th of the melancholy month of November, 1817, that the still more melancholy event of which you have heard your mother speak, took place. In 1816 the union of Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg with her Royal Highness Princess Charlotte of Wales, had afforded the happiest augury to the British people; but to the consternation of the whole country, the Princess Charlotte, in the November of the following year, died, after giving birth to a still-born male child. The public feeling was scarcely ever marked by a more universal mourning, and the year concluded with every mark of commiseration and regret from a people attracted by congenial sentiment.

Long shall her virtues be the theme of all,
When tombs decay and mouldering temples fall.

BOB.—The meaning of In statu quo is, as it was before. GROUSE, BLOU, VERTICAL MOTION.—Consult the nearest farrier or dog-fancier.

WEeping WILLOW, HELEN NORTON, AN ORPHAN GIRL, HURDY HOGAN.—Time and judicious treatment will, no doubt, restore the good understanding which circumstances seem to have somewhat interrupted. LOUISE DE VERE.—Your companion, who shared your umbrella while it rained, acted a very unbecoming part in refusing to carry it when the rain ceased. We are almost disposed to parody the old saying thus, "Love me, love my umbrella." AGNES.—By all means tell your friend immediately to give up chewing roasted coffee. DIOMEDE.—Get your hair carefully trimmed by a skilful hairdresser. A WEEKLY SUBSCRIBER, PETER DICK, HORACE W., EMMELINE, PETER MANGLES, FUDGE, J. K. R., J. THOMPSON.—These are all cases in which medical or surgical advice should be obtained. GERANIUM, A TAKER IN OF CASSELL'S PAPER, SYLVIA, HARMLESS BOY, LILLIAN, AUGUSTA, W. H., E. T., W. WALLACE, H. W. J., S. H., A WORKING LAD, NONDESCRIBT, HELIOTROPE, I. O. U., CLARA.—These all refer to the want of hair or whiskers, to a redundancy of hair, to hair of an undesirable colour, to freckles, to complexion, &c., to which subjects we have already devoted considerable space. To most of them we say, "Let Nature have fair play."

HIGH DICTION.—A melodrama is a short, half musical drama, or that species of drama in which the declamation of certain passages is interrupted by music. In England and in France it is chiefly a vehicle for gorgeous decoration and scenery, with a plot usually of a romantic or serious description. Cardiphonia is a Greek compound, the meaning of which is "Voices, or Utterances of the Heart." It was the title given to two volumes of familiar correspondence published some years ago.

PROBALL.—Concrete, from the Latin concrevere, to grow together, means literally, united in growth. Used as a noun, it means a compound—a mass formed by spontaneous union, or coalescence of separate particles of matter in one body. Contrast is from the Latin contra, opposite, and stare, to stand; hence, to make to stand, or to place in opposition, to compare. Used as a noun, it means opposition or dissimilitude of figures by which the one contributes to the visibility or effect of the other. In logic, the word concrete has a "second intention," or meaning peculiar to the art of logic, and is opposed to the noun "absolute."

VALENTINE VOX.—Gutta percha may be reduced to a fluid state by heat alone, but it will become solid again when cold. Cut it into pieces, and place it in naphtha in a warm situation; and when the pieces are dissolved, put the liquid into a bottle, and cork close.

MAJOR PLINLIMMON.—Continue your study of the "French Lessons," consisting, as they do, of grammatical rules, exercise, and key, explanations of idioms, dialogues, and rules for pronunciation. You will require no books for the first year and a half.

N. HOMER.—Direct your P. O. Order, with clear address, to Messrs. Petter and Galpin, La Belle Sauvage Yard, Ludgate Hill, E. C.

J. E. R., W. H., and Others.—The difficulty of obtaining the Model Copy Books from your local bookseller may be got over by applying to Messrs. Ward and Lock, the publishers, of 158, Fleet-street, London, who will in future supply them, in complete sets of eight books, for 2s., or 24 stamps post free.

AMY STUART.—The Pilgrim Fathers consisted of certain Puritans who, in 1608, fled from England, in consequence of violent persecutions for conscience' sake. They went first to Amsterdam, where they remained for some years. In 1620, having visited Southampton, to join others of similar religious persuasions, they left for America, and about the latter end of the same year they arrived at Cape Cod Bay, and afterwards founded New Plymouth.

A CORRESPONDENT.—One thing you may be certain of, that tallow in the manufacture of soap is of very ancient date. Pliny speaks of soap as being made of tallow and ashes. Tallow was probably applied to candles at an equally early period.

T. BURY.—There is no doubt that your having resided so long in a very marshy neighbourhood brought on the ague; but now that the fever has left you, and only weakness remains, you will find the preparation of Peruvian bark that has been recommended to you a very excellent medicine.

KIRRY.—Xylography, which seems to you so odd a word, is nothing more than the art of engraving upon wood. Aquatinta, etching, and mezzotint, are varieties of the art of engraving upon copper. Until within these few years, copper and wood were the substances employed by engravers for book illustrations. For certain purposes, boxwood continues in the highest repute; but copper has been in a great measure superseded by steel, when many impressions are required.

A MOTHER.—For fits of any description you should send for a doctor as soon as possible; but in the meantime, supposing you are certain the fit is not a fainting fit (for that requires quite a different mode of treatment), you should raise the head, unloose all tight clothes, strings, &c., and apply cold water to the head, and use hot applications to the feet.

T. ELLIS.—You may find an excellent comparison between the steam engine and the human body in Dr. Arnot's work on "Warmth and Ventilation." The Doctor thus expresses himself: "James Watt, when devising his first engine, knew well that the rapid combination of the oxygen of atmospheric air with the combustible fuel in the furnace produced the heat and the force of the engine; but he did not know that in the living body there is going on, only more slowly, a similar combination of the oxygen of the air with the like combustible matter in the food; as this circulates after digestion in the form of blood through the lungs, which combination produces the warmth and force of the living animal."

A MAIDEN.—We believe the race of dogs called "turnspits" is nearly extinct. They were very sagacious animals, and it is reported, on good authority, that one of a couple of turnspit dogs refused to work the spit because it was not his turn.

F. W.—Though the proper meaning of the noun "copper" is a vessel or boiler made of the metal copper, yet the word is now very commonly used to describe large boilers fixed in brickwork with furnaces beneath them, though those boilers may be constructed of iron.

SEACOMBE.—The "Hutchinson family," a portion of which visited England some years ago, was a large American family, most of the members of which were possessed of remarkable talents as vocalists. Their object in visiting England was, partly to see the country, but chiefly to add to their pecuniary resources. Their visit was supposed to have been a profitable one.

AUDI DISCIPULUM.—When Dr. Johnson said that he who would acquire a perfect knowledge of the English language should give his days and nights to the study of Addison, he meant to recommend a careful study of that celebrated author. The writings chiefly referred to are his inimitable papers in "The Spectator," distinguished by some one of the letters composing the word "CLIO."

LEANDER.—"Leander," judging from his own account, is a most fascinating young man; but we fear he must continue a bachelor, unless he consents to lower his standard of perfection. Except in fiction, we have never met with a creature so lovely as the maiden described and sought for by "Leander;" and were we ever to discover such a fair one, we should not feel disposed to hand her over to "Leander," unless he could prove himself worthy of so great a treasure.

A READER.—Your foreign friend, who undervalues London because it is principally built of bricks, shows no knowledge of the subject. Bricks, as building materials, are so far from being perishable, that (when properly made) they are among the most durable of substances. Look at the bricks of Nineveh and Babylon in our museums. They are as lasting as the ancients imagined they would be; and in the baths of Titus we find that the bricks have withstood the effects of time and fire better than the Coliseum or the marble of Trojan's Forum.

THE SUBSTANCE AND THE SHADOW.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "SMILES AND TEARS," "DICK TARLETON,"
"PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE,"
"THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER III.

Though all the world should crack their duty to you,
And throw it from their soul; though perils did Abound, as thick as thought could make them, and Appear in forms more horrid; yet my duty,
As doth a rock against the chiding flood,
Should the approach of this wild river break,
And stand unshaken yours.

SHAKESPEARE.

POOR Katty was perfectly aware of the danger which threatened her innocent charge from the madness of its deceived, unhappy father. Far from her home, alone, and unprotected, the faithful creature more than once felt her courage failing her, till a glance at Ellen, as she lay in the solemn beauty of death, retempered it. The presence of the dead seemed a protection to her, and she resolved to pass the night in praying and watching by her side.

It was a touching scene—the corpse of the fair young wife and mother lying as if in a sweet sleep upon the old-fashioned bed, with its heavy cornice and faded moreen hangings, the moonbeams streaming through the bay window, bathing it in a flood of silver light, throwing the marble features into delicate relief, still further heightened by the glossy dark hair her foster-sister with mournful affection had arranged, as when living, in masses of clustering curls on each side of the still lovely face.

The anxious nurse, with the infant at her breast, seated herself near the bed, and commenced silently repeating her prayers.

As the night advanced, and the busy hum of life gave place to the stillness of repose, the sorrow of Katty broke forth in one of those wild laments for the dead, once common in Scotland as well as Ireland.

In the former country it still retains its Celtic name of the coronach, in the latter it is known as the kene.
"The blight has fallen, and the purtiest flower is withered, ochone! ochone!"

"The lips that drew the life from the same breast wid me are silent. Ellen mayvourneen! the heart of your foster-sister is broken."

"Why did you leave the old place desolate? and make your home in the land of the stranger?"

"The red branch (one of the badges of the O'Neils) proved false to the sweet bird that nestled in its leaves. Ellen acushla, there is none but Katty in the land of the stranger to mourn over the cowl'd face of clay."

At first the words broke from the lips of the speaker in subdued murmurs, plaintive as the notes of a wounded bird; but as the feelings of the mourner

JORROCKS WAITS HIS OPPORTUNITY.

became more intense, they gradually grew louder and louder, till the intensity of her lamentations startled the slumbering inmates of the house.

To the angry question of the landlord, who slept in the adjoining room, of: "What can that be?" his drowsy wife made answer, "Only the wild Irishwoman howling for the dead."

Katty heard the words, and felt more bitterly than ever that she was far from the isle of the west.

Several times during the keene the visage of Jorlocks had been glued to the small diamond-shaped panes of the casement, but finding that the nurse was waking, he had retreated to his confederate below. The last time this took place Katty perceived him, and summoning her courage, prepared to defend her sleeping charge, whom she wrapped in her thick, warm shawl, and placed beside the body of Ellen.

"It's his blessed mother that will watch over him," she thought; "no harm can reach him there."

She next looked round the room in search of a weapon of some kind; but nothing that could serve for such a purpose met her eye.

"It must be the steel," she said, at the same time drawing a large knife from her pocket, and opening the blade.

Placing herself in the deep shade by the side of the window with that air of quiet determination which is far more dangerous than threats or blustering words, and scarcely drawing her breath, she firmly awaited the result.

She had not been long in this position, before the face of the smuggler once more gradually rose above the window-sill. The moonlight enabled him to take a complete survey of the room, and the faithful watcher to examine the features of a face which, once seen, was not likely to be soon forgotten.

Finding all was still, and believing Katty, whom, from the position she had chosen, he could not see, to be absent or asleep, the agent of Redmond O'Neil carefully removed one of the small diamond-shaped panes from the leaded casement, and introduced his arm, with the intention of undoing the fastening.

Swiftly and silently the blow descended, and the blade of the knife pierced the extended hand.

Jorlocks uttered a deep curse.

He was not a man, however, to be lightly turned from his purpose. With a violent effort, he dashed open the casement, and would have sprung into the room, but the raised knife descended a second time, striking him on the cheek.

"Back!" exclaimed the woman, stepping from the deep shadow of her hiding-place, and confronting him with her pale face and flashing eyes, "back to the fool and madman that employed yez; back, or I'll drive the blade through the black heart of yez."

Jorlocks let go his hold, and fell to the ground. It was only when the immediate danger to herself and charge had passed that the courageous woman felt her resolution give way, and began to call for help in tones that speedily aroused the inmates of the house, who, in every variety of costume comprised in that expressive word déshabille, came rushing into the room to ascertain the cause of her alarm.

It was soon told. But by the time the landlord thrust his head, half buried in the woollen nightcap, drawn over his ears, out of the window, the smuggler and his partner had disappeared.

"She has been dreaming!" he muttered, in no amiable humour. "These wild Irish ain't like any other Christian people!"

Katty silently pointed to the broken casement and the blood upon the floor.

"Are you much hurt?" inquired Kerl of his partner, as they hastily retreated down one of the by-lanes of the village.

Jorlocks showed him his hand.

"Ah! and that's an ugly cut upon your cheek," observed the speaker; "it will spoil your beauty for some weeks, if it doesn't leave a scar!"

The wounded man made no reply, but continued to staunch the blood upon his face with his handkerchief.

"Do you intend to give it up?" demanded Joe, thinking no doubt that his companion had had enough of it, "and leave the captain, as he calls himself, to do his own work."

"Give it up!" repeated Jorlocks, with bitterness; "I seldom give up anything I have once undertaken. This scratch has only given me another task to perform."

"How another?"

"The first was to carry off the child for the captain; now I have to strangle the she-devil who prevented my accomplishing it, on my own account; and I shall do both," he quietly added.

When the speakers reached the Dolphin, at an early hour in the morning, they found Redmond

O'Neil pacing the narrow limits of the little parlour, with the air of one in whose heart the wildest passions of the soul were struggling for mastery. For several minutes the unhappy man appeared unconscious of their presence, and continued to gesticulate and murmur to himself in broken sentences.

Jorlocks listened eagerly, but could only catch the words "faithless," and "dishonoured." They were sufficient, however, to give him the key to the enigma. He divined the rest.

There was something equally desolate in the appearance of the room and its occupant. The fire had burnt down unheeded to a mere spark; the supper, which the landlord, with a prudent eye to his bill, had placed, unordered, before his strange guest, remained cold and untasted on the table; whilst the dim red smoky flame of the solitary candle, flaring in the socket, contrasted painfully with the pure gray, silver light of morning which already began to steal through the narrow casement.

The smugglers felt a chill creeping in their veins as they stood at the door of the little parlour, waiting till their employer should notice them. Not a sound was to be heard except his heavy measured tread, indistinct mutterings, and the hoarse, sullen murmurs of the waves as they broke upon the pebbly beach, and dashed their salt spray against the rudely-built sea wall.

"The skipper couldn't look more savage if he had lost a cargo," observed Joe Kerl.

Redmond started—the sound of a human voice jarred painfully on his excited nerves—and he sternly demanded who was there.

The men advanced into the centre of the room.

"I see," he added, as he recognised them—"the wretches whom I employed to carry off the child."

"Wretches" is a poor welcome, for men who have done their best to serve you," observed the elder smuggler, sullenly.

"Heed not my words!" exclaimed their employer, impatiently; "gold is a salve for them: the result?"

"We have failed."

"Cowards!" muttered O'Neil, scornfully; "cowards!"

Jorlocks advanced close to him, and gazed upon the speaker for an instant with eyes as fierce and fearless as his own.

"That is false," he replied at last; "I am no coward. I sell you my services, Captain Redmond, but not the right to insult me. The man who employs an agent for an unworthy purpose is even more worthless than the agent he employs. Coward!" he repeated, pointing with his wounded hand to the still-bleeding gash upon his cheek; "are these the proofs that I want courage? Coward! I have sent a bullet before now through the heart of as good a man as yourself for a less offensive word."

Joe Kerl—who, however he might yield to the superior shrewdness of his partner in other points, in dispute or danger had hitherto been accustomed to assume a protecting, patronising air towards him—looked the picture of surprise at his quiet audacity, fully expecting that Redmond would reply to it by a thrust from the weapon on which he had instinctively laid his hand. To his astonishment, the grasp was relaxed.

"I am wrong," said the young Irishman, in a tone of bitter humility; "you said truly—I have no right to reproach you. The agent and employer in an evil purpose become equals. Forgive me," he added. "There is no shame in asking pardon of a wounded man."

The wild gray eyes of Jorlocks flashed with a momentary brightness, as if the degradation which placed himself and the speaker upon a par afforded him exquisite satisfaction, and then resumed their usual calm, wary expression.

"You have fairly earned your recompence," added the speaker, tossing a well-filled purse to him, "although the object for which I engaged you has failed. Henceforth, I will attend to the affair myself."

"Will that be prudent?" demanded the wounded smuggler. "The woman will, doubtless, apply for protection to the magistrate—a good, easy man where the offence is against the excise, but firm and dangerous in a case like the present. Hadn't you better wait?"

"Not a day," exclaimed Redmond, impatiently.

"You will fail, then, as I have done," replied Jorlocks, "and perhaps not escape so well; for the bores of Plaxted pay little respect to a name, or a long pedigree, when they feel assured they have the law upon their side."

"Do you know me?" demanded the gentleman, fixing his eyes upon him inquiringly.

"Chomont told me in his letter that you were some great personage in France," answered the former, with real or well-affected indifference; "that is all I know respecting you."

"And you think that any further attempt to obtain the child —"

"Would be dangerous for the present!"

"Pshaw," ejaculated Redmond, with an expression of contempt; for he was not one whom danger could appal—he had met it too frequently face to face.

"Useless, then," observed his self-constituted adviser. "The only chance of succeeding lies in patience, in spreading the report that you have quitted the country. Aye," he added, as he marked the contracted brow and quivering lip of his employer, "it is a hard lesson, but one we must all learn in our turn—harder to man than to the brute; the half-famished tiger crouches within its lair, and waits day after day, till the victim it watches for comes within its spring."

"I cannot wait—my heart is preying on itself, consuming with impatience," muttered the young man; "the lesson is impossible."

"And yet it has been learnt," said Jorlocks, with a peculiar smile, "and practised."

"By you?"

"Perhaps; but that is from the purpose. The hue and cry will soon be raised. I know Dr. Titlow well, a dreamer and a pedant, fond of his ease, indolent in trifles, but dangerously active where his duty, as he calls it, is concerned. The woman's story will rouse his sympathy, and cause such measures to be taken, that it would be madness to resist."

"You and your crew could easily carry off the child in open day," observed the unhappy man.

Here Kerl whispered to his partner that the "Wren" was nearing the harbour.

"Were the men strangers like myself to this part of the coast," replied Jorlocks, "the thing might be done; but they have their homes and families either in Folkestone or in Plaxted, and with that infernal cutter in sight no offer would tempt them."

"I must trust then to myself alone," observed Redmond.

"And fail," said the smuggler, ironically, "for lack of patience. I have advised you honestly, sir; take your own course."

Redmond O'Neil resumed his hurried strides, pacing the little parlour of the Dolphin in moody silence, and to all appearance unconscious of the presence of his agents, for he muttered words he would have wished no human ear to have heard—words that proclaimed his real or imaginary dishonour. It was a terrible struggle for him to postpone, even for a few hours, much more days, the ruthless purpose conceived in the frenzied passion of jealousy, a purpose the fidelity and courage of Katty alone had baffled. But even his stern nature yielded to that which is more unyielding still—necessity; and he at last consented to be guided by the counsel of Jorlocks.

"You have acted wisely," observed the fellow; "delay is not defeat. You had better quit this house; it will soon be searched; and it would not do for either of us to be seen till the heat of the pursuit is past."

"Yes! anywhere; I am in your hands!"

The two men quitted the inn, accompanied by the speaker, who followed them with that blind confidence indifference to life or reckless courage alone inspires. Instead of passing through the village, they walked for nearly a mile along the beach, directly under the heights between Folkestone and Dover, till they arrived at a narrow gorge in the cliffs, rent by some convulsion of nature. Huge masses of marl and flint, confusedly piled one upon the other, half blocked the entrance; and it was only by climbing over these they gained a foot track, terminating in what appeared the entrance to an abandoned lime-pit.

"Stoop," said the elder smuggler.

"Why you ain't agoin'," exclaimed Kerl, in a tone of surprise, "to take him there?"

A look from his partner imposed silence.

For the first time Redmond hesitated.

"The retreat is a safe one," said his guide, "and I shall share it with you; the eyes of hate," he added, "still more those of justice, would fail to find us here. If you doubt me," he added, "it is not too late to turn back; I neither ask for confidence, nor seek to force mine upon any man."

"Proceed," was the laconic reply.

For several minutes the speakers continued to grope their way in darkness and in silence, now compelled to stoop almost to the earth by the lowness of the passage, the next instant to wade to the knees through stagnant water, which the lime it held in solution alone prevented from being offensive.

A sudden turn completely changed the scene, and the fugitive found himself in a lofty cave, in the centre of which blazed a cheerful fire, with half-a-dozen seafaring men lying lazily round it.

On seeing a stranger, they started to their feet, evidently with no very amicable intentions, till the voice of his guide reassured them.

"A friend," he exclaimed.

One or two of the smugglers recognised the passenger they had brought over, and remembering his liberality, made place for him near the fire. Stevens, the captain of the boat, alone appeared dissatisfied.

"What kind of friend?" he demanded, suspiciously.

"Mine," said Jorrocks, coolly; "that ought to content you. I brought him here; that must content you. And now, sir, let me advise you to take some refreshment: for I noticed that your last night's supper remained upon the table at 'The Dolphin' untasted. I can't offer you any great variety by way of food—only a biscuit; but our cellar is better furnished than our larder. Here," he added, pointing to a number of casks stored in different recesses, "we have excellent Bourdeaux, although it has not yet paid duty—the King gives long credit,—and Cognac that would put life into a corpse."

Redmond declined the hospitable offer thus pressed upon him, and to avoid the necessity of entering into conversation with the man who had thus singularly become his host, wrapped himself in a boat cloak one of the smugglers brought him, and pretended to sleep.

Meanwhile Joe Kerl was sent back to Plaxted by his partner to watch the proceedings of Katty, who he shrewdly guessed would make no attempt to quit the place till after the funeral of her foster-sister.

The messenger had not long taken his departure before the only man Jorrocks would have cared, perhaps, to displease, made his appearance in the cave—Ephraim Sleek, whom Lieutenant Elvey had threatened to pitch out of the cabin window of the "Wren," for making what the worthy man no doubt considered a very business-like proposal to him.

Few persons in Dover bore a better reputation than Ephraim, who, on his marriage with the mother of Ruth, assumed the garb and language of the sect which, despite his worldly prosperity, refused to admit him as a member. Doubtless they were right. There are men who seek to hide beneath the cloak of respectability defects in their characters, as well as in their coats. As the agent of the smugglers, in disposing of their goods, he had acquired considerable wealth.

Ephraim had one child, a daughter, named Ruth, a fair, delicate creature, whose beauty not even the close-fitting cap, from beneath whose prim border a rich chestnut curl would occasionally stray, or the plain camlet gown peculiar to her sect, could entirely conceal.

Many a rattling young officer in garrison at Dover toasted the pretty Quakeress at the mess dinner, but not one of them could ever truly boast of having obtained even a passing glance from her sweet, dove-like eyes.

No wonder that her father felt both proud and fond of her; that he regarded her as the dearest thing he possessed on earth, except his gold;—that was the idol whose worship clung like a leprosy to his soul.

Avarice, sordid avarice, was the vice of Ephraim's heart, the canker that corrupted it; the feeling that struggled to redeem it, his love for his fair child. But for her sake he had long since degenerated into that most despicable of characters, a miser.

Of all the passions that degrade humanity, avarice is the most engrossing, the most unphilosophical, for it is peculiarly the vice of age. Some excuse might be suggested for it, perhaps, in youth.

To avarice some title youth may own,
To reap in autumn what a spring had sown;
But age scarce sows, ere death stands by to reap,
And to a stranger's hand transfers the heap.

Although so many years her elder, Jorrocks, by one of those strange caprices no analysis of the heart can account for, was madly in love with the shy and gentle Ruth. His self-confidence abandoned him in her presence; a look would check the oath or coarse expression on his tongue. In his dealings with the father he affected a blunt, off-handed honesty far from natural to him, and only to be accounted for by the fact that the daughter kept the books.

Hence the smuggler's opportunities of occasionally seeing her, and the deference with which he treated her parent.

Although strongly marked, there was but one unvarying expression in the old man's face: calmness—icy, rigid calmness—every line appeared set; no involuntary play of the muscles betrayed what passed within the busy brain; caution had moulded his features to a mask, over which resolution and watchfulness kept guard. There existed but one human being in the world before whom he ever laid that mask aside, and then only for an instant.

That being was the gentle Ruth.

"Friend," said the Quaker, in his usual measured tones, "men speak strange things of thee in Plaxted. I need not ask if they are true, the marks of blood and strife are upon thee; but why do I find a stranger in this place?" he added. "Thou hast risked our goodly venture for a small gain."

"Not so small as you imagine," replied Jorrocks; "he is rich."

Ephraim regarded the recumbent figure of Redmond more complacently, although he still questioned the prudence of being mixed up in his affairs.

"Read that," said the speaker, at the same time putting the letter of Chomont into his hands. "Hear what he says."

Ephraim Sleek put on his glasses, and approaching the fire, read it through deliberately by the red blaze, and then returned it.

"I am glad to find there is some sense mingled with thy folly," he observed. "The stranger, it seemeth, hath interest at the court of the Sardanapalus who ruleth in France. He may be of use to us."

"My very thought."

"But why bring him unto this place?" added the Quaker. "Put thy secret into no man's mouth, for fear that it should feed him. My house at Dover would have been safer."

Jorrocks muttered something about his not liking to introduce a handsome young fellow like Redmond beneath the same roof with Ruth.

"I thank thee, friend, for thy consideration for my child, although it is a needless one," observed her father; "she hath not so light a spirit as to be caught by outside bravery. Umph! well, peradventure it hath been for the best."

"I am glad to hear you say so," exclaimed the smuggler. "But what brought you from Dover at so early an hour?"

"The affairs of this carnal world," answered Ephraim. "I rode over to Plaxted in the expectation of finding thee, that I might ascertain, first, whether Providence had prospered our venture, in which I have risked somewhat more largely than is usual with me, for I am a prudent man, whom a slight gain contenteth. I perceive it hath," he continued, looking round him, and mentally calculating the number of tubs and packages. "Secondly, I came to tell thee that I have a favourable occasion to dispose of the cargo, provided it is in the courtyard of my dwelling in three days."

"It shall be there," exclaimed Jorrocks.

"Good! And now, friend, let me hear all that thou knowest of the strange tale men mix thy name with."

They seated themselves at a distance from the fire, so as to be out of hearing by the rest of the inmates of the cave, whilst the agent of Redmond O'Neil gratified the curiosity of the Quaker, who weighed every word he uttered as carefully as he would have done the same number of guineas, for fear of detecting a light one.

"If you believe the child to be his," he observed, when Jorrocks had concluded his strange story, "why does he not openly claim it?"

"He is an Irishman, in the service of France," replied the smuggler; "perhaps he dares not."

"Thou didst say, friend, that he is rich?"

His informant nodded affirmatively.

"Wake him, and say unto him, that I would have speech with him."

What passed between Redmond and Ephraim will appear in the events that soon afterwards followed.

CHAPTER IV.

To do the office of a neighbour,
And be a gossip at her labour.—BUTLER.

Rumours that an attempt had been made to steal the infant whose birth had excited so much curiosity, and let us add interest, amongst the inhabitants, were quickly spread through Plaxted. The first person who heard the report, as a matter of course, was the barber, who, in turn, communicated it to the blacksmith. From the shops of these two worthies, time out of mind the resort of rustic idlers, the report soon reached the rest of the neighbours, increasing, like a snowball, as it rolled first from one, then to the other; till, at last, there was something absolutely terrific in its proportions—probably distortions would have been a better word, for never did a plain simple fact undergo more ludicrous changes each time it was related.

By some it was confidently asserted that the wild

Irishwoman, as they designated Katty, had killed three men with her own hands; others, less imaginative, limited the number to two; and even the most incredulous believed in one—generally supposed to be either Jorrocks or the handsome stranger, whose arrival and departure had been equally a mystery.

It proved a profitable day to the landlord of the little inn. Never had so many morning draughts been called for, a circumstance which somewhat reconciled him to his alarm and broken rest on the preceding night.

Like a prudent man, the host did not impart all that he knew or surmised at once, but retailed it as he did his liquors—increasing his confidence to his customers with each fresh order they gave.

"And was Jorrocks really the person?" demanded one.

The speaker had only ordered a single half pint of ale; the question remained unanswered.

"Fill it again," he added, pushing the glass over the counter.

"Jorrocks really was the person," whispered the landlord, as he counted out the change for a three shilling token.

Several who heard this declared their disbelief. They knew the smuggler, they said, to be a respectable man. Others pronounced him capable of anything.

In the midst of this confusion, Doctor Titlow made his appearance. Hats were doffed by the speakers, who saluted him respectfully. The reverend gentleman was accompanied by a young naval officer—the commander of the "Wren," who had only landed at Folkestone that very morning. His father and the rector had been great friends and chums at College; hence the interest which the former took in the welfare of the son.

Lieutenant Charles Elvey was just the kind of fellow to win the regard of a quiet old bachelor like the doctor. He possessed a fine, frank, manly disposition, that made its way at once to the confidence of those with whom he came in contact. He was mirthful without being positively indiscreet; told a capital story; never grew noisy over his wine, which he could take like a gentleman; made an excellent listener, played a good hand at whist, and, as his father's old friend admitted, after beating him, had a pretty good notion of chess—a game the rector delighted in.

When on shore on that part of the coast, the commander of the "Wren" made the parsonage his headquarters.

We need scarcely observe that the visit of Doctor Titlow to the village inn was made in his magisterial capacity; not that his congregation would have presumed to censure him had it been otherwise; his character for benevolence and great learning was by this time so well established, that nothing their rector might think proper to do would have been considered misplaced or extraordinary.

On the appearance of the gentlemen, Bumps, the village constable, a bustling, important little personage, who had been indulging in all the fussy airs of office, felt himself eclipsed, and shrunk down to his original dimensions—social ones, of course.

Passing through the crowded bar, the doctor and his companion ascended the staircase to the room occupied by Katty, whom they found still pale and excited with the adventure of the night.

Before uttering a word, the rector advanced to the bed on which the body of Ellen was still lying, and reverently drew the curtains round it.

That simple act won the confidence of the foster-sister, who related, in her own simple language, the history of the attempt to deprive her of the child.

"Indeed then, sir, I've told you all; and a sad story it is, to think that his own father should think harm to the purtiest gosssoon ivir born to the O'Neils."

"His own father!" repeated the magistrate. "I was informed that a person residing in the village, named Jorrocks, was the author of the attempt."

"Is it the man at the winder yer hanner manes?"

"Certainly."

"That was the Cromwalian employed to do the black work. I can't tell yer hanner his name, but I've set my mark upon him."

"And a brave one, too," observed the Lieutenant, who had heard of her courageous defence of the child.

"I did my best, sir," answered Katty, colouring slightly. "May be yer think it was not a womanly thing to strike the villain wid me knife. What could I do—alone, and the robber at me winder? Had I lost her child," she added, pointing to the bed, "how would I have looked in her cold pale face agin?"

"Think you they would have murdered him?" demanded the rector, with a shudder.

"No," said the woman; "bad as he is, I don't think the father of him could have done that; but years might have passed before he gladdened the eyes of me again, and then, wirresthrue, wirresthrue, I'd not have known him."

"I think I can at least prevent that danger," observed Lieutenant Elvey, with a smile, "if you will permit me."

"How's that, yer hanner?"

"By putting a mark on him, which death itself will not efface," replied the lieutenant.

"Will it hurt him?" inquired the nurse, anxiously.

"Scarcely a moment's pain."

With a half doubtful, half reluctant air, Katty permitted the speaker to trace with the point of his penknife a broad arrow, such as is generally branded on the King's stores, upon the arm of the infant Redmond, who uttered a plaintive cry.

"Whisht, whisht, darlin'!" said the faithful creature; "I can't bear the smart for yer."

After rubbing a small portion of gunpowder into the incision, the operation was complete, and the nurse profuse in her thanks.

"I am no great judge of babies; in fact, I question if I ever saw one so young before," observed Doctor Titlow; "but he certainly appears to be a fine little fellow."

"That he is!" exclaimed his nurse, in an endearing tone, "and good right to it, too; sure the mother of him was the sweetest flower that—"

Here her sorrow choked her utterance, and the speaker rocked herself to and fro, a habit common with the peasantry of Ireland, when in grief or pain. We have frequently observed it also in the natives of the East—especially the Jews.

"And so," said Lieutenant Elvey, gently touching the cheek of the little Redmond with one finger, "his name is O'Neil."

"That is it."

"More than one ancient family, I believe, who bear it."

"That's thrue, yer hanner," answered Katty, cautiously; "there's rich and poor, great and little. And why not, since God wills it?"

"I am alluding to the O'Neils of Galway," added the young officer. "I was stationed nearly two years upon that coast, and know something of their history."

"May be, sir; it's not for the likes of me to deny it," answered the woman, with that vacant expression of countenance which the Irish so well know how to assume when they wish to conceal anything or avoid giving a direct answer to a question.

"Sir Patrick and his nephews were concerned in the late troubles, I have heard," resumed the officer.

"Likely enough," observed Katty, philosophically. "Sure we have all us troubles in our time; the blessed saints know that I have mine."

"Are you acquainted with Galway?"

"Indeed, then, I have been greatly wid me mother's people, and they were Tins."

"Were what?" whispered the Rev. Dr. Titlow to his young companion.

"She means natives of Tipperary," said the lieutenant, who was not in the slightest degree deceived by the evasive replies he had received. Although too generous to press her further on the subject, he mentally decided on taking his measures accordingly.

"My good woman," said the rector, "you need not be under the least alarm for the future safety of your charge. I shall issue my warrant for the apprehension of the party suspected, and take such precautions as will effectually prevent a repetition of the outrage."

With these words her visitors took their departure.

"Wirresthrue! wirresthrue! What will become of me? Will I never get away from this strange land?" continued Katty, as soon as she was alone.

"It's not you, Ellen darlin'," she added, looking towards the corpse, "that I'm blamin' for the trouble that has fallen on me, but him who broke your young heart, and has filled mine with the black sorrow."

"Why were you so particular in your inquiries respecting the family of the O'Neils, Charles?" inquired the rector, as they passed towards the parsonage.

"I suspect the father of this child is one of the nephews I spoke of," replied the young man, thoughtfully. "The government, I know, look upon him as far more dangerous than his hot-headed relative, and have offered a large reward for his apprehension."

His old friend regarded him with a serious, almost painful expression, which brought a flush to the cheek of his companion.

"I did not think, my dear sir, that you would have mistaken my motives," said the officer. "If my suspicions prove correct, I have but one course to pursue in the event of his coming in contact with me—to apprehend him. But the consciousness of having performed my duty to my sovereign and country is the only reward I could accept for such an act."

"Very proper, my dear boy, very proper, indeed. Let us hope that it may turn out a mistake; justice in Plaxted has quite enough upon her hands at present."

Although a strict search was made not only in the village, but both in Dover and Folkestone, not the slightest trace could be discovered of the whereabouts of Jorrocks, who took good care to remain in his safe retreat, where he received frequent reports of everything that transpired.

On the third morning, his guest declared his intention of quitting the cave. His host would have remonstrated.

"I no longer need either an adviser or an agent," observed Redmond, haughtily; "I have taken counsel of my own heart."

"If you would only wait till Ephraim returns, he—"

"Your friend knows where to find me," interrupted the gentleman; "further words are useless."

Having distributed a portion of the contents of his well-filled purse amongst the men, the speaker quitted the cave. There was an expression in his dark eye, a firmness in his tread, which bespoke some settled resolution.

Jorrocks looked scowlingly after him.

"If it were not for the mark that wild cat set upon me," he muttered, "I would be by your side, Redmond O'Neil, and follow you like your shadow, till I saw the last of you. I was a fool to undertake the task when other means might have been found to win his confidence and— Pshaw! Regret is useless. Few of us possess the right wit at the right moment. But it is trying even to my patience," he added, "when fortune gave me the opportunity I most wished for, to have played the wrong card."

Leaving the smuggler to his reflections, which certainly do not appear to have been of an amiable nature, we must request our readers to follow the deceived and wretched father.

Redmond O'Neil, on quitting his retreat, directed his steps once more to Plaxted. Apart from the one peculiar hallucination he laboured under respecting the fidelity of his wife, the mind of the young Irishman was unclouded. He felt that it was beneath the dignity of his character to employ a vicarious arm to remove the stain upon the character of his name and race. He determined to demand the child boldly in the face of day, and, if necessary, assert his right to the guardianship of it by his sword.

But few eyes were turned upon him as he strode through the village—a circumstance easily accounted for by the majority of the inhabitants being congregated in the churchyard to witness the funeral of Ellen. Thither he, too—her destroyer—bent his steps, his heart beating with imaginary wrongs, and filled with stern resolves to carry out his purpose.

As those awful yet sublime words of the liturgy, "Ashes to ashes, dust to dust," were pronounced by the rector, Redmond O'Neil entered the churchyard, and folding his arms, stood at a short distance, as if to contemplate the picture.

Katty with the infant closely nestled at her breast (she would not part with him for an instant), knelt, bowed down with anguish, at the head of the grave. So intense was her sorrow, that even the idlers, whom curiosity had brought to the spot to see the wild Irishwoman, and the baby Jorrocks wanted to steal, felt touched by it, and there was a general feeling of sympathy in her favour.

At the conclusion of the funeral service, Redmond advanced towards her, and despite the menacing looks of the crowd, demanded the child.

"This is neither the time nor place," observed the clergyman, advancing between him and Katty, "to assert your rights, even if you really possess any."

"Let her answer for me," replied O'Neil. "Was I not the husband of the woman you have just consigned to the grave?"

"And her destroyer!" groaned the foster-sister.

An observation followed by the murmurs of the spectators, amongst whom were several sailors belonging to the "Wren."

"As her husband, I am the legal guardian of the child," resumed Redmond, "a right I am determined to maintain; and I appeal to you, as a magistrate, to direct the woman to resign it to me, in order to avoid violence and, possibly, bloodshed."

"I'll not part wid him," exclaimed Katty. "I cannot; I swore it to the dead."

Here she caught the eye of Lieutenant Elvey, who was standing at a short distance from the scene.

"If you tempt me," she added, fiercely, "your blood be upon your own head. I wash my hand of it."

Reckless either of the consequences of her denouncing him, or probably not comprehending her, the young Irishman advanced to take the infant from her.

"It is for your child's sake, Ellen mavourneen, that I do it," said the foster-sister, solemnly. "Take charge of him," she continued, raising her voice; "it is the Galway rebel, upon whose head your king has set the price of gold—the traitor Redmond O'Neil."

In an instant the young officer, who had only waited till his suspicions should be confirmed, confronted the fugitive, and demanded his sword. A skilfully parried thrust was the reply.

Seeing their commander engaged, the crew of the "Wren" naturally closed round, and in a few minutes Redmond, borne down by superior numbers, stood in the midst of them disarmed and a prisoner.

He fixed his eyes reproachfully upon Katty.

"Yer forced me to it," she sobbed, in answer to his mute appeal; "or they should have had the life of me before I spoke the word to betray yez."

The examination before the magistrate was concluded at so late an hour, that it was not deemed prudent to remove the prisoner to Dover Castle till the following morning; consequently, he was confined in a building not frequently used, although designed for such a purpose—the village roundhouse, under the guard of Jacob Bamps, the constable.

Those who are acquainted with the peculiarities of the Irish character, are aware of the all-but insuperable difficulty of inducing either man or woman to give evidence; even when the crime bears no political character, they look upon an informer with intense aversion. It is considered a point of honour with them neither to denounce nor bear witness; a feeling probably to be traced to that indiscriminate hospitality and wild sense of honour common to the Celtic race.

Katty felt this keenly; nothing but the solemn promise she had made to protect the child of her foster-sister, from the madness of his father could have induced her to betray him to the Saxon. The love she bore the little Redmond scarcely reconciled her to the act, the consequences of which she would, now the danger to her charge was past, have given worlds to escape.

In this frame of mind she encountered, on her way from the parsonage to the inn, the plausible, venerable-looking Ephraim Sleek, who expressed the warmest sympathy with the trials she had endured.

"Ochone! ochone!" she exclaimed, "will I never see ould Ireland again, and be free from all the troubles and crosses that are breaking the heart of me?"

"If to return to thine own land be the object of thy desire, peradventure, I can assist thee, friend," said the Quaker. "I am a trader, and have friends in the great city of London, who deal largely with the merchants of Ireland."

Katty regarded him suspiciously.

"An thou wilt come with me to my dwelling in Dover, my daughter Ruth, who delighteth in acts of mercy, will consult with thee, and advise thee on the best means of proceeding. But as the world is full of snares to the simple and the unwary, I would wish thee to ask the people of the house where thou dost sojourn respecting me."

"Yes, sure! Your hanner has a warm heart for the poor stranger."

"That, friend, is the duty of all whose industry Providence has blessed with the means of doing good," observed the old man. "Mine are not large, but simplicity and contentment need little. Speak, then, to the man of sin who keepeth the inn. Albeit I know him not, he will satisfy thy mind, and tell thee the name Ephraim Sleek beareth with all who know him."

Katty did as the hypocrite advised. A better character could not have been given for integrity and benevolence.

In the poor Irishwoman's frame of mind, alone, and in the land of the stranger, it is not to be wondered at that she listened to him with gratitude, and at last with faith in the sincerity of his offers.

"I don't think ye would desave me," exclaimed the heart-stricken creature; "it's the last chance to save both father and child. I'll go wid yez."

That same night she started with the Quaker in his chaise-cart for Dover.

(To be continued.)

THE original desire, as it may exist in the bosom of angels, as it was implanted in Adam, and as it may attend us hereafter in a high and holy world, is the desire of excellence, of virtue, of the cultivation of our powers, of making as much of ourselves, and of doing as much in the sphere where we are placed, as possible.

LESSONS IN DRAWING.

FACILITY of hand is one of the first requisites in drawing, whatever instrument be employed, whether Pencil, Pen, Brush, or Modelling tool. Many are by nature endowed with a certain mechanical dexterity, or happy readiness with the fingers, to whom this facility is of easy acquirement: and all possess it to a certain degree, or they could not be taught to write, which, in the beginning, is nothing more than the drawing of certain conventional forms, without any distinct idea of an object beyond the imitation of such forms. The first "pot-hook and hanger" is, clearly, Drawing. If the pupil has improved upon this humble beginning, so as to write a fair hand, he already, perhaps unconsciously, possesses an acquirement that will not only make easy his first essays in drawing, but essentially serve him, however far he may

Let your line be distinct and clear. Avoid a habit of feeling your way, as it were, by a number of uncertain touches—

Endeavour, at once, to express what you desire with firmness and decision—

3. The system of these early lessons, to those who find it difficult to attain precision of hand, is of so much importance, that it is strongly recommended, especially for schools; where it should be commenced as soon as a child is taught to hold a pen or slate-pencil. By it the instructor will find his pupils more rapidly acquire a good hand in writing, as well as drawing; the eye, as well as the hand, thus being made progressively familiar with the observation and imitation of lines and forms. The drawing-master comes into our schools at too late a day. Every teacher can and may be one. A child knows its first letter by its form, calls its name, and remembers it by that knowledge; and few there are who cannot and thus, important assistance is given to a too long neglected branch of popular education.

5. Having acquired a considerable degree of accuracy in tracing the ruled faint line, as suggested (2), proceed to fix certain points along the line, at random, and then connect them together; moving your pen or pencil (the former is to be preferred) slowly and steadily, and not taking it from the paper until the line required is completed (fig. 2). Repeat this from right to left, and from left to right, as in the first instance. After some degree of precision is thus obtained, you may, without fixing the points, endeavour to draw the lines of the length required, by the aid of the eye and hand alone; and then, laying aside your ruled paper, see how nearly you can come to the examples given, on plain paper, on the slate, or blackboard. Observe well, before you touch your paper, where the line is to begin, what direction it is to take, and where to terminate. When you can achieve this with ease and accuracy, you have made a sure beginning; the importance of which will be felt and better appreciated hereafter, when any amount of time and patience bestowed in making yourself master of the principles and practice of these primary lessons will not be regretted extend its pursuit. Should this useful accomplishment have been neglected, he cannot do better than practise his hand in the careful imitation of the series of Model Copy Books.* The use of the pen has been too much overlooked by draughtsmen, especially by amateurs. It produces a certain line, and induces an early habit of care and accuracy, from the fact that it cannot be easily erased. It is the result of accuracy and labour; and to imitate the end, we should not shrink from the beginning. He who starts with the blacklead pencil in one hand, and the Indian rubber in the other, will find, that he will make their letters on a slate as soon as they know them in the book; rudely, it is true, but still in a manner to be understood. And yet this first impulse of nature is too often disregarded; the child is driven from that which might be to him a source of amusement as well as profit, and made, by the forced discipline of schools, to learn to read before he learns to write. "One thing at a time," may be a good adage for old heads, but childhood needs variety in its labours. Its mental exertions should be tempered by agreeable diversion, and, more especially, when that diversion can be made of lasting benefit. We

6. In your next effort, you have no longer to trace the ruled lines, but to trust your eye and hand in drawing a line as nearly as possible in the middle (fig. 3). A difficulty will be felt, at first, in drawing continuous lines of great length, as you will find your hand liable to get the start of your observation, and stray from its proper direction. They should, therefore, at first, be short. Increase their length, as you gradually acquire facility and precision. When you find your pen going astray, as it is apt to do at first, leave off, and again, seeking by your eye the true point to start from, make another effort; and thus, until you soon fall into a loose and slovenly habit, of which it will be difficult to divest himself. They are both good and serviceable in their places; but too often, in the hands of beginners, most sadly abused.

2. The first object of the beginner should be, to acquire a readiness in observing and forming simple lines, with their relation one to another, their direc-

can draw a line extending the entire width of the page, repeat the trial from right to left, as well as from left to right.

7. In this lesson, you have to keep two lines, besides the one you are drawing, under your observation at the same time. Simple as it may appear, it is one of much importance. You are already entering tion, variation, beginning, and termination; also, to make a duplicate of any given line. Take, for example, a sheet of ruled letter or foolscap paper, and begin by tracing over the lines with a pen, from left to right, and from right to left (fig. 1).

* These Model Copy Books are published in eight numbers, commencing with the elements or rudiments of letters, and proceeding, by easy degrees, to complete sentences. There are two editions; the one in foolscap 4to, at 3d. each; the other in post 4to, 6d. each. Special pencils, 2d. each, have also been prepared for practice. Published by WARD and LOCK thirst for knowledge, the truest and surest incentive to the study of books.

4. In view of the importance of this early education in writing, as well as to assist teachers in carrying out the system proposed, the Model Copy Books before referred to have been prepared with progressive examples, containing a complete course of rudimental instructions. By means of these exceedingly useful copies, the student is not only improved in his handwriting, but acquires a freedom and facility for general design which cannot be too highly valued; the broad field of Design, and are to consider yourself no longer a servile tracer. Here let it be urged upon the pupil to avoid, in all cases, the pernicious habit of tracing. It is a tempting, but a dangerous expedient. No one can expect to attain proficiency in off-hand drawing, who relies upon it, even as a last resource. Early learn to trust and depend upon your eye and hand alone. They will serve you well and faithfully, when the clear pane of glass, the transparent paper, and the many other weak resources of weak hands, will fail.

Fig. 4.

8. In like manner as in former, proceed with the examples in Fig. 4: First, pointing off the divisions or spaces between the faint lines, and then connecting the points carefully; bestowing as much time and practice on each example as your progress or improvement may render necessary.

9. Observe that, in adjusting the points, marking the divisions of the space between the ruled lines, it will be easier to fix the centre point first (a); then the quarter (b) and subdivisions (c); and in like manner, where they do not begin from the centre, divide the space, first by two points (d), and then by subdivisions (e). All this is of more importance than may at first appear: all tends to the acquirement of a habit of accuracy, and to the attainment of that facility of hand which is so essential. According as the pupil has more or less applied and perfected himself in these elementary principles, will he hereafter find ease or difficulty in more advanced studies.

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

MARRIAGE.

We have noticed already the importance of every man building up for himself a HOME; and we have offered some observations which, if attended to, would go far to realise so desirable a result. But in considering this subject, there is one great fact to be always borne in mind—namely, that in the constitution of a home we are entirely dependent upon woman. The domestic circle is her domain. No one can supply her place. Horace sang of "Domus et placens uxor," a home and a pleasing wife,—

"Thy home, and in the cup of life That honey-drop, a pleasing wife;"

for he knew, and everybody who thinks at all must know also, that domestic happiness depends upon woman; the cup of bliss is incomplete without the "honey-drop."

Marriage is a divine institution, and is declared in the Bible to be "honourable in all." The happiness of the husband depends on his wife, and that of the wife depends on her husband;—hence everything hinges on the choice which each party makes. You are bound to one another for better or worse. You are bound to one another as companions for life. You may have come together like two streams flowing naturally towards one point, and then mingling their waters with scarcely a ripple, to pass on together to the great ocean; or you may have come together under the wild stress of passion, or the feeble attraction of fancy, or the sordid compulsion of interest, or by force of a love the most pure and noble. But once bound together, you are no longer twain. Whatever may be your future course, you must share it together. You have no longer separate or divided interests. You have but one life to live, and no earthly consideration can repay you for a life of unhappiness. You cannot afford to be unhappy. You cannot afford to quarrel with one another. You cannot afford to cherish a single thought, to harbour a single desire, to gratify a single passion, that will tend to make this union anything but a source of happiness to you. Then it becomes you to have a perfect understanding of one another before you are married—to make your choice wisely—to look before you leap.

If you make a mistake in this matter, it is the most serious blunder you can make, and its consequences last a lifetime. We are not, as in some countries, betrothed from our cradle. We are at liberty to marry at our own discretion, and if we take a false step, we must charge the folly on ourselves. It behoves us, then, to inquire what are the chief requisites for a happy marriage, and how are those evils to be avoided which so many thousands of young people bring upon themselves by a thoughtless or ill-assorted match.

Each should be well acquainted with the character, intellect, and antecedents of the other. Join in the holy bonds of wedlock a sensible and well-instructed man and woman, and, depend upon it, they will make their way; but unite two simpletons, or a wise man or woman with a fool, and it is a hundred to one, whatever may be their fortune, that they will come to the union, and burden the age with an ignorant and wretched progeny. A young fellow who is fond of information, and bent upon improvement, who is ready to avail himself of every means for acquiring knowledge—that is the man who deserves a good wife. And the same may be said of the other sex. The girl whose whole mind is occupied with idle gossip, and who has no relish for study or sensible conversation, will never make a good wife. She will become a tawdry, slatternly, querulous partner, making any home miserable. In the case of the man as well as the woman, intellect is a prime requisite for a happy marriage.

Morality, it need scarcely be said, is positively essential. Matrimony itself is a bond which nothing but pure morality can keep from decay and dissolution. Bring immorality into a home, and the atmosphere is instantly polluted. Bad temper, indolence, pride, vanity, dishonesty, falsehood, intemperance, extravagance, are immoralities which can people a palace or a cottage with a legion of evil spirits. To render a home wretched it is not necessary that both husband and wife should be immoral. Either can effect the rapid transformation from happiness to misery; and though virtue, in either, may mitigate the evil, before we can have happy homes, we must, in the best sense of the term, have good husbands and good wives.

Industry is another thing that must be sought in the choice of a partner. Look at that sharp, active, intelligent workman, who goes to his labour as if he enjoyed it, and as if he felt the dignity—as, indeed, he should feel it—of contributing, by his labour, to the comfort and convenience of the world, and, by his self-supporting industry, of adding another valuable citizen to the community. Never mind the character of his employment. If he follows it in good earnest he is sure to make his way in the world. That quick step, sharp eye, and ready hand, insure success. Is he not the sort of man to marry? the sort of man who looks as if he could support a wife, and the one whose every child would "make his right arm stronger?" And look at that girl—she is worth looking at, though her dress be very poor, and her home very humble! She works hard at some business all day, but finds time to make the best of her scanty wardrobe, and to do a kind action whenever opportunity occurs. Is she not the woman for a wife?—the woman who would make the most of small wages, keeping her home respectable, and making it so comfortable and so attractive that nothing would induce a husband to seek happiness elsewhere?

Good temper is also another important requisite. Consider how much temper enters into daily life—how it penetrates the whole surface of existence; in our daily employments—in our homes, around our hearths; that it gives sweetness to the dinner of herbs, and turns luxury to the food of misery. There are varieties of temper, all more or less bad. There are the violent, strong in coarse and selfish passion, unable to bear any contradiction, embittering existence, and bruising the hearts of those who are subject to their sway. There are the morose, who leave the soul few social attractions and few generous desires; that throw gloom where they ought to throw light, wither the smile half formed, and silence the kind word half spoken. There are the discontented, whom nothing can please, and no condition satisfy; who are always looking for defects, never express approval, but take pleasure in finding fault, and in making the heart ache with a sour look and a surly word. We might notice other varieties, for alas! there are many in man and woman; but we forbear, only urging that, in seeking a partner for life, good temper should not be forgotten. A good temper scatters cheerfulness, as flowers are scattered at a wedding, with a free hand. We should remember that all the delightful words in our language which can link our hearts to the sweet charities of home, have the same root—kin, kind, kindred, kindness; and that kindness in wife and husband are essential to the happiness of home.

But we must not close this paper and omit one most important item, so important that it includes, within itself, all that can ennoble the character and make life truly happy. We refer to religion. When hand in hand, and heart joined to heart, a young couple begin married life, surely they should not forget the God whose goodness rests upon them, and hallows the solemn rite in which they have engaged. Surely they should gather and share joys from the boughs of heavenly munificence, and with no heart wanderings, no untruth, no repinings, no selfish monopoly of delight—acknowledge their God in all their ways. Religion will lighten labour, cheer the drooping heart, strengthen the weak, make smooth the rugged paths, console in affliction, comfort in adversity, direct in prosperity, and enhance every pleasure, while it alleviates every sorrow. Wherever religion is left out, the keystone of the arch is removed, and instead of building a home you make a rubbish-heap. But with religion shining in your house and on your path, strength and glory are given to your home. From such homes much may be expected, expectations which are certain of realisation; from them a generation shall rise up full of dignity, grace, love, and goodness, glowing with a patriotism and loyalty as true as their regard for home is sacred, and showing that England's strength is forged under the smoke that rises from her happy household fires.

FRENCH LESSONS;

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH.

CHAPTER XXXII.

"I THINK, Robert," said George, smiling, "that after such an excellent dinner as you have written out, you ought, at least, to know what a cook is called in French. So I may as well tell you, and put him at the head of a list of servants.

ENGLISH.

FRENCH.

A man cook	Un cuisinier
A cook	Une cuisinière
A cook's assistant	Un aide de cuisine
A coachman	Le cocher
A porter	Le concierge
An outrider	Un écuyer
The housekeeper	La femme de charge
The lady's-maid	La femme de chambre
The dry-rubber	Le frotteur
The wages	Les gages
A nurse	Une garde malade
The groom	Le groom
The gardener	Le jardinier
The jockey	Le jockey
The lackey	Le laquais
The house steward	Le maître d'hôtel
The scullion	Un marmiteau
The ostler	Un palefrenier
A servant	Une servante
Service	Le service
The butler	Le sommelier
The valet	Le valet de chambre
A footman	Un valet de pied

"La femme de chambre," 'lady's-maid,' is a term also applied to a chamber-maid. As a general rule, the French households are not as numerous as ours, consequently there are not always corresponding names. They have one very odd expression relating to a domestic. I mean 'Une femme de peine,' 'a charwoman,' literally, 'a woman of trouble.' 'Le frotteur,' 'the dry rubber,' would not easily find a place in England, where the boards are only scrubbed, and where waxed floors are hardly seen but in old-fashioned houses, or in those where the great object is to restore old fashions.

"In the terms 'le groom,' 'le jockey,' you see an instance of words taken bodily out of our language. The French have a good right to them; how many have we imported from their country!

"Le maître d'hôtel" shows some poverty of language, as it does duty both for the master of the hotel and the house steward. 'Un marmiteau,' 'a scullion,' would be represented by a scullery-maid in England, but I have already drawn your attention to the practice that exists in France of giving to men what we consider women's work; and on the other hand you will, in Paris, often see women doing what with us is generally men's occupation. In Paris, women attend to accounts and keep books with most clerk-like accuracy.

"Le sommelier," 'the butler,' is a term also applied to a waiter at an hotel; and 'le premier sommelier' at a large inn is a very important person indeed, and he dresses quite like a gentleman.

"The exercise that I intend you to write to-day, Robert," said George, "is on adjectives of dimensions, and as there is a decided difference in the construction of French and English sentences when speaking of the size of things, I beg you to pay particular attention to this subject.

"Where we use the verb 'to be' the French use the verb 'to have,' and the preposition 'of' is placed before the word which expresses the dimension.

"The word which expresses size may be a noun or an adjective; the noun can always be used, not so the adjective.

"When two dimensions are spoken of in the sentence, the preposition sur, 'upon,' is placed before the second preposition.

"If three dimensions are expressed, the conjunction et, 'and,' is used before the last.

"Sometimes the sentence is constructed in English without the verb 'to be' being used, then the verb 'to have' is not expressed in French, and the preposition 'of' is used twice, once before the numeral adjective, and the second time before the word of dimension.

"The other dimensions should be expressed with sur before the second, and et before the last preposition.

"In comparative sentences we make use of the following idiom: 'by the foot, by the yard,' &c. Thus, we say 'He is taller than his brother by the whole head.' The French use the word de, 'of,' instead of par, 'by,' and they would translate 'he sentence in this manner, 'Il est plus grand que son frère de toute la tête.'

"These rules are rather complicated, and as I wish you to master them, I shall not burden your memory with the 'voyage' in this morning's lesson."

EXERCISE.

1. Except you and her, they were all sick. 2. We have sold all our cattle, my horses excepted. 3. Summer is the most delightful of seasons. 4. The Mediterranean Sea is the largest among the seas of the world. 5. The first and second volumes of this book are very interesting, but the third and fourth are very tiresome. 6. The study of Greek and Roman history is the foundation of any good education. 7. I admire your sky-blue satins and your light-rose silks. 8. Some mythologists represent Apollo with light yellowish, others with (light brown hair). 9. Your sisters appear kind and witty. 10. Why do you always wear black silk stockings? 11. These apples look delicious. 12. These partridges have remained long enough on the fire, they (seem to be) done.

LE CORRECT.

1. Excepte vous-et elle, ils étaient tous malades. 2. Nous avons vendu tous nos bestiaux, mes chevaux exceptés. 3. L'été est la plus délicate des saisons. 4. La Méditerranée est la plus grande des mers du monde. 5. Le premier et le second volume de cet ouvrage sont très intéressants, mais le troisième et le quatrième sont très ennuyeux. 6. L'étude de l'histoire grecque et de l'histoire romaine est la base de toute bonne éducation. 7. J'admire vos satins bleu-de-ciel et vos soies rose-tendre. 8. Quelques mythologues représentent Apollon avec des cheveux blonds, d'autres avec des cheveux châtains-clair. 9. Vos sœurs ont l'air bon et spirituel. 10. Pourquoi portez-vous toujours des bas de soie noirs? 11. Ces pommes ont l'air d'être gâtées. 12. Ces perdrix sont restées assez longtemps sur le feu; elles ont l'air d'être cuites.

FRENCH PRONUNCIATION—continued.

Whenever the nasal syllable is placed at the end of a word, and followed by another word beginning with a vowel or h mute, the nasality disappears, and the m or n is carried with the following vowel, provided the two words are connected together in the grammatical construction of the sentence. Thus, the connection takes place between pronouns and verbs, adjectives and nouns, verbs and adverbs, adverbs and adjectives, prepositions and their object; as,

on arrive,	which is pronounced	o-na-ri-ve.
bon ami,	"	bo-na-mi.
mon ami	"	mo-na-mi.
j'en arrive	"	j'en na-ri-ve.
bien habillé,	"	bi-en nha-bi-lé.
bien aimable,	"	bi-en nai-ma-ble.
en attendant,	"	en-nat-ten-dant.

Exceptions.

1st. When the pronouns on and en are placed after the verb in interrogative or imperative sentences, the nasal sound is preserved, and the letter n is not joined to the next word; as, aime-t-on assez,	pronounced,	ai-me-t-on-as-sez.

and not		ai-me-t-on-nas-sez.
donnez-en assez	"	don-nez-en-as-sez.
and not		don-nez-en-nas-sez.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON XXXI.

TERRESTRIAL MAGNETISM (continued).

793. What is this line running round the earth called?—The Magnetic Equator.

794. Are there any localities on the earth where the dipping needle points directly down?—There are four such points; two in the Northern and two in the Southern Hemisphere.

795. What are these points called?—The Magnetic Poles of the earth.

796. Where are they situated?—The strongest of the two north magnetic poles is on the continent of North America, and the other to the north of Siberia. The strongest south magnetic pole is on the Antarctic Continent, to the south of Australia.

797. In what latitude and longitude is the North American pole?—It is in longitude 97 degrees, and latitude 70 degrees.

798. Have the magnetic poles actually been reached by any of the Arctic and Antarctic voyagers?—The North American pole was reached by Captain Ross, of the English navy, on the 1st of June, 1831.

799. Is the intensity of the earth's magnetic force everywhere the same?—In the northern parts of this continent it is nearly twice as great as in the vicinity of the equator.

800. How does the earth, as a whole, act on the magnetic needle?—As if it contained, within its mass, a great magnet, or rather two great magnets.

801. Where are the poles of these imaginary magnets situated?—At a great depth in the earth, and directly below the magnetic poles at the surface.

802. Is it believed that there are actually such magnets embedded in the earth?—It is not.

803. Is the real cause of the earth's magnetic action known with certainty?—It is not, but it is supposed to be due to the perpetual circulation of electric currents around the earth.

804. Is the magnetic action of the earth on the needle exerted from year to year, in exactly the same direction, and with the same intensity?—It is not; the compass needle turns slowly either toward the west or toward the east, from one year to another.

805. What is the direction of the annual movement of the needle in western Europe?—Toward the east; the slow movement in that direction began about the year 1815.

806. In London the compass needle now points 22 degrees west of north—did it ever point due north there?—It did, about the year 1660.

807. Is this steady movement of the magnetic needle from year to year the only motion that it has?—It is not; it oscillates to and fro, very slightly, during each year, and also every day.

808. What other movements has it?—Irregular movements that occur at any hour, and cannot, like the others, be foreseen.

809. What especial arrangements have been adopted for observing these movements?—Magnetic observatories have been erected in all parts of the earth, and fitted up with long magnetic bars, delicately suspended, and all the appliances required for the nicest observations.

810. What are some of the remarkable results that have been obtained from the observations made in these observatories, upon the disturbances of the magnetic needle?—Most of the large irregular disturbances occur at about the same instant over the extent of a whole continent.

811. Illustrate by examples.—The needle begins to move at the same instant at Paris as at St. Petersburg; at the same instant at Philadelphia as at Toronto, in Upper Canada.

812. What other important result has been obtained?—It has been discovered that there are occasional periods of many hours' duration, in which remarkable disturbances occur. These are called magnetic storms.

813. To what are the regular and irregular movements of the magnetic needle for the most part traceable?—To some influence of the sun.

814. What remarkable evidence of the sun's disturbing action has recently been obtained?—It is found that the disturbances of the needle are uniformly the greatest and most frequent in those years in which the spots are largest and most numerous on the sun's surface.

815. What does this curious fact show?—That a magnetic needle, on the earth, trembles in sympathy with the commotions that occur on the sun's surface.

816. It is observed that the shooting beams, or streamers, of the Aurora Borealis have a position corresponding to that of the dipping needle; does the needle appear to have any magnetic sympathy with the fitful changes and beautiful coruscations of an aurora?—An auroral display is generally attended with capricious movements of the magnetic needle. Sometimes the same aurora seems to affect all the magnetic needles both of the western and eastern continents.

817. Are there any other substances, besides iron, that are attracted by a magnet?—There are—the two metals nickel and cobalt are quite strongly attracted; and many other substances are feebly attracted by a powerful magnet.

818. What remarkable discovery, in reference to the magnetic condition of substances, has recently been made by the celebrated English philosopher, Dr. Faraday?—He has discovered a large class of substances that are repelled by both poles of a powerful electro-magnet. These he calls dia-magnetic substances.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

TOM TAYLOR, ESQ., M.A., ETC. ETC., FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAYALL.

TOM TAYLOR.

It is universally admitted in literary circles, and amongst the educated patrons of the theatre, that the English drama has been on the decline for many years past; that it is not what it was; that it is not what it might be; and that while we have advanced in every other department of literature, we have retrograded in our plays. There is no lack of histrionic ability. Our players, with Mr. Charles Kean as the king of the whole company, are equal to their predecessors of any period in the history of the English stage. Buckstone, Phelps, Mathews, Robson, Webster, Compton, and Keeley, are celebrities whom it is unnecessary to praise, for they have established not only a contemporary, but an enduring, reputation. It is evidently not for want of players that our English plays decline. Neither is it for want of liberality on the part of theatrical managers. The scenic effects, costumes, and appointments far exceed those of former days. The revivals at the "Princess's" are as honourable to the taste and judgment of the manager as his impersonations of character are to his dramatic power. That which the stage lacks is neither gifted players nor enterprising managers, but dramatic literature. It has been argued that the fault lies with the managers, who are prodigal in stage appointments, but indifferent to literary talent—who are unwilling to encourage home production while the driftings from the Paris theatres, done into English by the pens of ready translators, draw as good houses, and bring to the manager and his treasury as much praise and profit as would be attained by placing an original piece on the stage. If this be the case, the blame ultimately rests with the public. Supposing the public refused to be regaled with the warmed-up viands from the Paris bill of fare, managers would be compelled to furnish English productions. Under such circumstances, it might become as profitable to skilled authors to write for the stage as to employ their talents in some other form. But it has been urged, that ability for dramatic writing is not to be found amongst our English authors,—that the art of writing plays is clean gone from amongst us. This statement must be received with more than one grain of caution. There are some men amongst us who have achieved a dramatic reputation, men who may possibly be remembered, and probably better appreciated, in years to come than they are now. Sheridan Knowles's plays have taken permanent hold on the stage. Bulwer Lytton has given us dramas weighty with wisdom and sparkling with wit; and of those who are writing now, whose productions figure as new pieces on the play-bills, there are not wanting some who have exhibited considerable power both in dialogue and invention.

Foremost among our modern dramatists, we place Tom Taylor. His great natural ability, carefully developed by education, strengthened by experience and extensive reading, as well as by his position in society, have contrived to render his pieces the most popular which have been produced for years. He was born at Sunderland, in the county of Durham; commenced his education at the Grange-school, and subsequently passed two sessions at the Glasgow University. During his academical course, he carried off several prizes—including three golden medals. In 1837 Mr. Taylor took a degree at Cambridge, as junior optime in mathematics, and as a first class man in the classical tripos. He was afterwards elected a Fellow of Trinity. For two years he held the Professorship of English Language and Literature at University College, London. In 1845 he was called to the bar of the Inner Temple, and went the Northern Circuit. In 1850 he was appointed Assistant-secretary to the Board of Health; and upon the reconstruction of that board, in 1854, he was appointed secretary. In this official capacity Mr. Taylor has rendered very efficient service; his reports on the subject of public health being remarkable for their clear condensation of facts, comprehensive conclusions, and practical suggestions.

But it is as a dramatist that Mr. Taylor is best known to the general public. Both at the Haymarket and Olympic his pieces have met with decided success and enjoyed long runs. Their neatly constructed plots, the polished humour of their dialogue, and the marked distinction of character, indicate talent of no common order.

Mr. Taylor has contributed miscellaneous articles to some of the leading journals, and is the compiler and editor of the "Autobiography of B. R. Haydon."

THE INVENTION OF PRINTING.

In the year of grace 1441, the card makers of Venice presented a petition to the magistrates of their city. The petition set forth that the art and mystery of card-making had been seriously impeded by the introduction of foreign playing cards, the figures whereof were impressed or printed. The result of this was that their craft had been grievously injured, their trade spoiled, their prospects ruined; and all that they could do was to beg for some restrictive measure, some law of protection which should put an end to free-trade in playing cards.

This petition of the Venetian card makers is the earliest mention to be found of printing.

But the card makers were not the only men who foresaw the overthrow of their professional pursuits in the blocks and types of the early printers. The copyists took alarm. They denounced the invention, as coming from the old enemy of mankind; they predicted treason against the state, and corruption amongst the people, wherever the art was practised. To the fire with the printing press! To the gibbet with the printer! Transcribing is the plan designed by nature, or what were goose quills made for?

PRESENTATION OF THE FIRST PRINTED BIBLE TO LOUIS XI.

The clamour against the press was part and parcel of the outcry which has been invariably raised against every new invention. To economise human labour by mechanical contrivance would, one would naturally suppose, be universally popular; but the very reverse of this has always been the case. It is not difficult to account for this, as during the transition state, the period which intervenes between the decay of one occupation and the growth of another, the dearth of employment falls heavily on the workmen. A new class of workmen spring up; the facilities for obtaining employment are increased; the sphere of labour is enlarged; new fields of enterprise are opened up, fields which yield an abundant harvest. But this is the work of time, and men must and do suffer in the interval.

The Venetian card makers, what were they to do? The old transcribers, what was to become of them? Shall the world stay its course on their account? Shall everything remain in statu quo to suit their comfort and convenience? If so, what is to become of succeeding generations? How shall that vast multitude be employed—paper makers, type foundry, machinists, compositors, pressmen—who find in the press their means of subsistence?

The Chinese, who claim the invention of everything, used block printing at a very early period of the world's history, and, with characteristic conservatism, they have continued using block printing to the present day. Block printing is a sort of wood engraving, the letters and figures being cut on a block of wood, from which impressions can be taken. Amongst the first printers this was the plan adopted. They copied the outline figures of saints and angels, and made a transcript of church text upon their wooden blocks, from which they reproduced missals and breviaries, closely resembling those of the copyists. There is a specimen of this description still preserved, called Bibulum Pauperum, being a series of skeleton sermons, ornamented with pictures to warm the preacher's imaginations, and stored with texts to aid his memory. It consists of about forty pages of small folio.

The invention or discovery of printing is ascribed to John Guttenberg, of the city of Metz, who, having expended almost all that he possessed on the project, was about to abandon it, when, by the advice of John Faust, he succeeded in bringing it to perfection. They soon abandoned the old block printing, and preparing matrices of the letters, cast them in a mixture of copper and tin. Peter Schœffer is said to have suggested this plan. They were all bound by an oath to secrecy; and as they began to excite attention, by the rapidity and accuracy of their productions, the question arose—How do these men accomplish their work? Nothing could be more in keeping with the spirit of the times than that of the popular conclusion—"These men have sold themselves to Satan, and it is by his agency that they do these things."

Had not some powerful influence been exerted on their behalf, these first printers must have perished. But there were men, even in those dark days, who could appreciate human genius and who held superstitious folly in contempt. Noblemen there were—noble men in the truest and best sense of that phrase—who befriended the early printers. In England our own printer Caxton found a generous patron in Edward IV.; and when driven from Metz the German printers found support and safety under Louis XI. of France. The memory of Louis has been covered with odium; and as every historian or novelist, in naming him, has cast a stone, the cairn over his grave is high and broad. But that the man had good as well as bad qualities no impartial person can doubt. He gained the love of the bourgeois as well as the hatred of the nobles. He associated himself with people of mean extraction, and the aristocracy took fright. Withal he was a politic monarch, for the kingdom was greatly advanced and improved by him; and his patronage of the printers, his furnishing them with an asylum at Paris, and exerting his influence to allay the popular irritation against them, shows him to have been, in some respects, superior to his age.

The printers settled in Paris betook themselves to the labour of producing a printed Bible; and when it was completed they sought an interview with the king. Louis courteously received them, expressed himself greatly pleased with their success, and encouraged them to persevere. The Bible, which was the first book printed in France, was presented to the king by the grateful printers.

Very unlike the accuracy and elegance of a modern book were the books of the early printers. Their first efforts, as in the French Bible and Caxton's book on "Chess," were rough and crude; but, the discovery once made, improvements were certain to follow. This first step in advance was more than half the battle. So from the printing-press knowledge has descended to us, like the first and second rain—uninterrupted, unabated, and unbounded; fertilising some grounds, overflowing others—establishing and overthrowing religions—erecting and destroying kingdoms, and changing the whole form of social life.

CHAPTER IV.

PLEASANT MEMORIES.

THE fact was this—as we may as well tell the reader at once—Biscuit was a little white Shetland pony, that belonged to Lionel's sister Frances, an exquisite little thing, about the size of a large Newfoundland dog, and a great pet with Fanny, and with every one else, Lionel excepted.

There was no love lost, for Biscuit would never suffer the boy to come near her. Every one believed that he had practised some cruelty upon the little mare, and earned her fear and her hatred thereby. Be that as it might, she plunged and kicked whenever Lionel tried to mount her; on which account, the young gentleman conceived the deepest malice against the pony. And thus he gratified it—

Weston was going past the stable, and hearing a scuffle, and a peculiar cry, almost like a child's cry, he burst open the door, and went in.

Biscuit was lying at the point of death. Her poor little white face thrown back, and covered with blood, her bright eyes were open and fixed sadly (they really seemed to be full of tears) upon young Lionel, who stood by with his hands in his pockets.

A low rascal in the neighbourhood was there too, by whom the lad had been evidently assisted in the work of revenge—which work was thus accomplished:—

They had rammed poor little Biscuit's nostrils full to the end with gunpowder,—Lionel held her, while the ragamuffin loaded, and then young Gascoigne had applied the match, and laughed triumphantly, as poor Biscuit's blood and hair flew all around.

Weston was very much moved on going up to the spot, for, at first, he had no notion that it was the work of the two young bystanders, but thought the little pet had met with some accident.

The worst sight to see was, when the young fiend had laughed out the boast of "having done the deed," and put his hand to the black and bloody wound, Biscuit, though never till now taking her eyes off of him, had just life enough in her to lick her murderer's fingers, while her sad eyes looked up into his face—as if to show him how superior was the nature of the brute to his own, and to tell him that she died without returning an atom of his revenge.

For this—there was no doubt of it,—Weston had procured for Master Lionel a good sound flagellation. But he could not bring back to Fanny her little favourite Shetland; and no more were they seen in gambol together, in the meadows of Gascoigne.

We will not continue to the end the uncomfortable tête-à-tête in the library.

The baronet alternately roared and chuckled over his enemy, towards whom he had nursed this grudge for six long years.

The steward was divided between the returning emotions of horror, as he recollected the diabolical affair in the stable—a lawful deference towards the youth, who was his master—and astonishment that somewhat riper years had not made that master ashamed to speak of his richly-deserved retribution.

"I'm very sorry, sir, I'm sure, that you should have remembered against me this little business, the first time we've met since you came to the estate, sir,—very sorry!"

"No doubt, no doubt," said the baronet; "but you can put your tears in your pocket, and save them for your dead daughter!"

"I've got a man coming down, who has promised to mind his own business, Master Weston; and I'm going to try whether he does his duty best to his superiors, or to cursed horseflesh. Show Mr. Weston out," he said, as the man answered the bell.

"God forgive you—God forgive you, Sir Lionel!" And the old man moved away from the room where he had never, through many years, heard one syllable but of well-earned friendship and of hearty eulogy on his long and honest services.

CHAPTER V.

THE WESTONS.

CLARA WESTON had married her cousin, Roland, not for money (neither of them had any), but for genuine love; and, after three years of a very happy married life, she had put her second little girl into her husband's arms as a last keepsake, and gone to lie, side by side with her mother, in the old churchyard.

A sister of the steward's kept the house—one of those valuable, but unremarkable, old creatures of whom a specimen may be met with in most families, by whom a great deal of hard and useful work is done in a very quiet and unpretending way.

Aunt Susan sat in the keeping-room (as they call the parlour in Suffolk), with the baby on her lap, and little Clara, the elder child, was trying to play with her poor father, who had just come in to his dinner from the farm, where the steward had found him employment.

Roland was not much in the mood for play.

He sat in the corner of the room with his elbow on the table, and his forehead resting on his hand, thinking, no doubt, of the kind voice that so lately had greeted him directly his step was heard, and little Clara jumped off and on to his knee, with not much notice from poor Roland.

Aunt Susan, seeing how it was, got up and walked across to where he sat, and put the baby into his arms, telling him it would never do to give way, and bidding him (though very gently and kindly) think of the little treasures that were spared to him.

(It was thus, our readers may remember, that the great and good Sir Samuel Romilly, when he was in that same affliction, was comforted by a companion. His little girl's hand was slipped within his, just as reason appeared to be giving way in the shock of woe, and the husband remembered that he still remained the father.)

Roland took the infant, and bent over it, and kissed it very tenderly, calling it "his own dear little Winnie!" "his precious Winnie!"

Just at that moment, the old steward opened the door and came in.

He looked at nobody, said nothing; but sank down into the first chair he came to, and crossing his arms on one corner of the back, buried his face out of sight.

"John, lad, John!" said Aunt Susan; "good for ever! what's the matter with thee, bo? What's happened?—Come, out with it! This is more than poor Roly's thinking about, I know. Come! Something wrong at 'The Nunnery,' I'll be bound. Well, what then? We're all big enough and strong enough to get a bit o' bread, I hope. He's been and given ye warning?—now, you'd better tell us."

And little Clara went up to him, and tried whether her grandfather was a better playmate than her father. But she found him a considerably worse one.

The old man did nothing but stroke her hair with his gentle hand, and say "Poor child! poor child!" She even felt a tear fall upon her cheek.

"What will become of them?—what will become of them?"

By this time Roland's attention was directed from himself, and he, too, joined in asking what was the matter.

"Nothing, nothing," said the steward; "we're only a family of beggars, that's all."

"And who are we going to beg of, I should like to be told?" said Aunt Susan.

"Beg of Sir Lionel Gascoigne, perhaps? Not me—I'm much obliged to you," she went on. "We've just done with being beggars, in my humble judgment, brother. I always said when he came in, the Westons would go out; the ugly, misformed—"

"Hush, sister," said the old man, "he can't help that."

"No, no, of course he can't. But because he can't help that, he ought to be extra particular in his conduct. It's bad enough to have to look at him—so it is—without a-bearing his nasty horrid temper, as I'm sure you've been doing this morning. Haven't you now, John? People with backs and mouths and fingers like him can't help it, I grant ye; but they are bound, I consider, to try and make people forget it, by behaving themselves at least someways decent, which he never did from a chit, drat him!"

"What is it, father?" said Roland. "Come, tell us."

Roland began calling him "father" when Clara died.

It was sweet to him to imitate her; and there was no one else to perpetuate that sound in the house but him, and so he took it up.

And then, from the beginning to the end, the steward related the interview in the library.

"Well," said Aunt Susan, when he had come to the end, "and I only wish to goodness I'd had the layin' of it on, that same day. Bless my stars, if he wouldn't have had the marks of it to this very day—a young butcher, as he is. Why, he'd ha' turned all Gascoigne out of his precious service, when he remembered my whacking, as I'd ha' given it to him—that he would."

"Now, now, Susan."

"Now, now! Don't 'Now, now' me, John. You don't mean to say you're sorry for what you did, I hope and trust?"

"Not one bit," said the steward.

"Well, then, what do ye say 'now, now' for? Mustn't we speak above a whisper of the young wretch that blows pretty little dumb animals to pieces, and then isn't ashamed of himself six years afterwards?"

And Aunt Susan was now fairly under way on the sea of her wrath; which was always rather an impressive sight for her friends to look upon.

"Why, John, a fellow like that, if your little blessed Winnie chanced to offend him, he'd think nothing of making a gun of her precious little nose, and blowing her up, upon my goodness, he would. For shame, for shame, John, to mind leaving the service of a devil's-kin like that. Why, there isn't a family in all Suffolk who wouldn't be proud to have John Weston."

"Aye!" said Roland, "aye, there's never a family that wouldn't be proud, either, to have an Aunt Susan in it—I mean to say that."

"Right, Roly," said old John, "right. She talks very fast; but somehow, she's done me good, with her dear old rattle."

And the two men actually got up a little laugh (or at least an audible smile) between them. Much to little Clara's relief, who thought it very funny, and set up a loud chuckle at the end of this grave conversation, and clambered on to her father's knees, at length successful in the endeavour to be noticed.

And thus ended, amid laughter and weeping, the connection of the Westons with the Gascoignes of Gascoigne.

CHAPTER VI.

IT NEVER RAINS BUT IT POURS.

THE Honourable Miss Quince's footman, and the servant of the Marquis of Turtleford, may not have had, probably had not, any very definite idea as to the manner or the moment of their arrival at their respective homes, nor remembered the being let in at the back by fellow-domestics who were privy to their amusements.

It is equally likely that Miss Patty Robinson reflected next morning, with uncharitable severity, on the oysters or the lobsters which made part of the supper; and attributed, as people in those circumstances are sure to do, the real work of the strong fluid to the non-digestion of the innocent solid.

But there ended the misfortunes of these illustrious guests. Another night or two, and they would, every one of them, be ready to drink as hard as ever to the confusion of the foreigners, and to the health of any young gentleman good enough to come of age for their enjoyment.

It was not, however, so easy as this, to undo the mischief that had been done at the greengrocer's just round the corner, when the poor sick woman discovered, for the first time, that her son Ben lived upon the refuse of the shop, and refuse considered by his father to be stolen food.

She was lying, the next day, apparently half-insensible, and breathing very heavily, on that wretched pallet in the corner of the room at the back of the shop.

Ben was at the fireplace, stirring something or other in a little saucepan on the fire.

He looked round stealthily over his shoulder, and saw that his mother's eyes were closed, and then very softly drew a bit of half-munched carrot from his pocket, and took a quiet morsel, moving his teeth as if they had been muffled, lest his parent should hear him.

Old Bugman was out on his rounds, exciting the compassion of the neighbourhood, and enjoying the delusion, when little boys leaped up on his rickety cart, and called him "Silly Peter."

He knew better, and so did his wife and Ben. But the reputation was useful to his business, and he nursed and enjoyed it.

Just as the lad was about to bring the mess, whatever it was, to his mother's side, a footstep was heard in the shop, and, a minute after, some knuckles were rapping sharply on the door of the apartment.

Ben looked through that part of the glazing that wasn't plastered up with paper, and saw that a stranger was there, and not the parish doctor, who generally walked straight in.

There wasn't much difference, however, in that respect, for, just as Ben was going to ask what he wanted, the visitor turned the handle, and stepped, with almost a springing gait, into the middle of the room.

The gentleman wore an exceedingly greasy coat, that had once been black. At present there was a kind of piebald appearance all over it, which might have been occasioned, either by the ashes of tobacco, or the wear and tear of time upon the garment. There was no waistcoat visible, for the surtout was buttoned close up, on to a snuffy and colourless satin stock. And if the trousers were too short, there was ample compensation in the length of the hat, which was certainly much too high.

His fat red and blue fingers held a pencil and pocket-book, to which he immediately began to refer as soon as he found himself fairly within the sick woman's chamber.

"Bugman—Bugman Esquire, I think, eh? if I might be so werry bold."

"What do yer want?" said Ben, very sternly, as he looked towards the shakedown, and saw his mother trying to raise herself in bed, and turning very pale.

"Some people waits arter they've rapped. What's the use o' rappin', and then comin' bolt in, without axin' whether ye're wanted?"

The stranger assumed a striding posture, and put his arms a-kimbo, and laid his head on his shoulder, and answered:—

"Would 'is gracious majesty wait till he was welcome, do yer think, into a coster's drawing-room, my fine feller?"

"Who do you call a coster?" said Ben, bridling up still more; "and what's 'is majesty to do with a feller like you, if one may take the liberty? Strikes me you're werry much like a snob!"

And Ben hastened to stoop down and support his mother, who began one of her violent coughings.

"You'll please to see, in your 'umble servant, a small picture of 'is gracious majesty, defendant in the faith!" said the man.

"And what are yer come for?" said Ben.

"For a few days, and a bit o' bacey, by your leave!"

"Bacey! Touch a pipe in this room, with sick people lyin' here, and it'll soon be put out, I can tell yer; and as to days—yer'll have to get somebody to glue ye down, if ye stop many minutes, let alone days! Come now," said Ben, as he went up to the visitor, who was a head and shoulders above him in height; "come, now, you budge, or I'll jolly soon make yer."

And Ben gave him a smart shove on the arm with his shoulder, that sent him staggering towards the glass-door.

The man merely returned to where he was, remarking—

"Werry nat'ral; but rayther dangerous!"

"Ben! Ben!" gasped his mother; "don't; perhaps he's got business here—perhaps we're to be—"

And the poor woman wept behind her hands, as if her heart was all flowing away.

"Be what, mother?" asked the boy.

"Werry 'andsome me'ogany table," said the man, not waiting for the woman's answer.

And he put his pencil into his mouth, and began examining the old deal table, that was really almost dark enough, at least, to be mahogany.

"Cheers—" he went on: "not many on 'em" (there were but two), "but what there is is toppers!"

And the fellow turned the chair bottom-upwards, and examined it all over, and made notes in his book.

"Who sent you here?" said Ben, as the truth began to break upon him, and made him speak very thick.

"Aha," said the officer; "begins to smell a rat, does he? There! Like to give us another shove, guv'nor?"

And he held himself out to Ben, as if to invite an attack.

"Where's the 'ead of the house?" he inquired, when he had noted down a few more of the very few things in the place.

"Father's out, on his rounds!"

"Out on his rounds, while we are squarin' of 'im up," said the wretch.

And both mother and son groaned aloud, side by side.

"Don't, don't," gasped the woman, with great difficulty, "don't let 'em take me there, Ben."

"Where, mother?"

"Poor-ouse, she means, in course," said the stranger, with difficulty making out the hollow sounds she uttered. "Many on 'em 'as an objection to it. Can't see it myself. Capital soup—leastways, broth. Stunnin' porritch; and nothin' to do. Want a drop o' some'at stronger? Sham Abra'm, and get put on to the doctor's list. They're forced to give ye what he tells 'em, old lady, be it 'heavy,' or even wine, or gin itself. All a weak delusion agin poor-ouses, mum, I assure ye."

"Old yer tongue," almost shrieked Ben.

And he would have said it to the sheriff himself, as soon as to his representative, if he had stood there.

But, just then, there was a new noise in the shop.

CHAPTER VII.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

BEN had been listening with great eagerness, under this new aspect of affairs, for the sound of his father's cart.

He heard it now, and immediately after heard the step of the only responsible party of the establishment coming towards them.

"Most obedient, sir," said the officer, as Peter opened the door.

"Thank'ee, thank'ee," said the master of the house, in the genuine official whiny squeak which Peter always assumed when his cart had stopped too long at the public-house while he "baited the donkey," as he had done to a great extent that morning.

"You're werry good," said Bugman, as he lolled against the door-post with his hands in his pockets.

"Werry good! How do yer find the missus to-day, doctor?" stuttered her husband.

"Stunnin'," said the stranger. But, in a moment, catching an inkling of the green-grocer's mistake, changed his course, and went on, "Ahem! ahem! we find our patient scarcely so well as we could desire. Ahem! The pulse are in a galloping condition; so also is the consumption. Likewise the fever, rather slower, not quite so galloping. Tongue—let's see. Put out yer tongue, Mrs. B., would you be so good?"

But Ben, caring neither for judge nor jury again, pushed the man reeling to the other side of the little room.

"They didn't send you 'ere to play the fool, at all events, yer greasy scoundrel, yer!" said Ben, as the fellow, who had fallen against the drunken greengrocer, gathered himself up.

"What, what!" whined Peter; "strike the doctor, my dear boy! strike the doctor! Dash my buttons! he'll mix yer up into Spanish flies, he will, my dear B-benjamin!"

And the greengrocer hiccupped away, and laughed at his own tipsy wit.

"Let the scoundrel" (and Ben put something before "scoundrel") "take what he wants, or set hisself down and keep hisself quiet, and not make an ass of hisself, while he's a-cuttin' poor people's throats."

"Not throats, Ben, dear; not throats. Doctors cuts everythink but throats."

"Stow it!" said the officer at last. "Can one or t'other on yer pay one pound, seventeen shillings, and sixpence? That's what I want for to know."

"Deed, sir, 'deed, sir," said the poor woman, "I'm sure we can't—certain sure. But if ye would but wait till I git a little bit about, like, I'll slave day and night till it's paid, that I will, won't I, Ben?"

But Ben couldn't speak.

"That's werry encouragin'," said the officer, "nothin' more so; but, as I jist now observed, the pulse are in a gallopin' condition, and my friend might have to wait for his money rayther too long."

"Hi, what's that?" piped the master of the house. "Yer not axin' for the money afore ye've done the job, are yer? Cure her or kill her, doctor, at all events, fore yer sends in yer bill. Shame!"

Then Ben, whose patience was by this time all gone, rushed up to his father, and, taking him by the coat (or whatever rag came outermost), shook him, and shouted out in his ear—

"Can't yer see we're all a-bein' sold up, stick and stone? What's to be done with mother? P'rhaps, when ye're a bit soberer, yer can tell us, can't yer?"

And Peter, to use, in this case, a most suitable American phrase, sloped out of the room, and appeared to be going to consult the other donkey, who still stood in the shafts at the door.

CHAPTER VIII.

MORE STRANGERS.

THERE'S a knock at the door in the square.

A knock like a postman's, with one knock more—"Rat, tat, tat!"

Mr. Barty answered it.

On the doorstep stood a slim, meek-looking individual, with his hat over his eyes, and, dressed in a short drab shooting-jacket, having all the appearance of a superior sort of ostler, except that he wore gloves.

"Sir Lionel Gascoigne at home, my man?"

"Yes, he is," said Mr. Barty.

And the man was stepping into the passage.

But Mr. Barty still stood in the entrance, and seemed to mean anything rather than the admission of the visitor.

"I wish to see Sir Lionel."

"Just so," said Mr. Barty.

"I thought you said he was at home?"

"So I did, and so he is," replied the servant.

Again the man was stepping in.

"It's just for the reason that he's at home that you can't see Sir Lionel."

And Mr. Barty bowed very low.

"Sir Lionel, sir, happens to have two homes; and when he's here he's not at home yonder, and when he's yonder, why he's at home yonder."

"What do you mean? Is Sir Lionel down in Suffolk?"

"To the best of my belief he is," said Mr. Barty.

"I'm the new steward, and I was to call here."

"New steward!" said the footman. "What's become of old Weston?"

"He's leaving, I understand. May I come in? I suppose I may."

"Well, I don't know; yes, I daresay there's no harm in your coming in."

"I suppose Miss Gascoigne is not here either, is she?"

"No," said Barty, "I can't say she is."

And the new steward passed in, and the door was shut.

"Pity you didn't come a few days earlier, Mr. —; by-the-bye, I forget your name."

"My name is Harding,—why should I have been here earlier?"

"Oh, nothing! only we had a little spread down stairs, to keep the baronet's coming of age, and call that," said Mr. Barty.

"Indeed! he's just come of age, is he? I thought he was an older sort of man."

"Haven't ye seen him?"

"No, never; we came to terms through letters, and a friend of his; and I thought he'd ha' been up in town by this."

"Well, you're not far wrong; Sir Lionel will be up to-day, most likely in the evening; so, ye'd better come in a little while, and rest; and then, call again to-morrow, as we say in the classics."

And the portly form of Mr. Bracegirdle preceded the visitor down stairs, and introduced him, in his own peculiar, qualifying way, to the rest of the town household.

"This is our friend, Mr. Harding; I've made bold, if I may so say, to ask him down into these humble departments, purpose that he mayn't be quite alone while he rests a bit. New steward for the country, sir, I think you said?"

"Yes," said Mr. Harding. "That is, the bargain's not sealed and delivered, not quite, but will be, I take it, when Sir Lionel comes."

"What time do ye expect him, do ye say?"

"Any time 'twixt now and one o'clock in the morning," said Barty.

"Just so," said Mr. Harding.

And he soon became very much at home. Particularly so, they all thought, for a candidate for an office so materially in advance of any of theirs.

"Sir Lionel much in the country?" asked the steward.

"Well, p'rhaps better than half his time, I should say," said Barty.

"Nice place, 'The Nunnery,' I hear."

"So they say; it's many a year since I've seen it. I hate nunneries, Mr. Harding."

"So do I," said one of the women.

And the steward joined Mr. Bracegirdle in a good laugh, while the women nickered.

"Great expense," said Mr. Harding, "going back and forward, I should guess, taking everything with 'em every time."

"Bless your soul, they don't take everything with 'em. I was going to say a carpet bag would carry all they move to and fro; but that would be stretchin' the thing too far, I may say. No, no, they have, and always have had, you see, in my time, two establishments—town and country; double lots of almost everything. No doubt Miss Frances carries a few things about with her, don't she, 'Tilda? (far be it from me to interfere with the ladies' compartment.) But not much o' that either, is it, 'Tilda?"

"I wish to goodness," said the domestic appealed to, "I had half they leave behind 'em, and they might keep all they carry."

"Ay," said Barty, "and then the parson'd soon be wanted for 'Tilda and Mr. Right, wouldn't he?"

Whereupon 'Tilda slapped the old fellow's red face, and declared she burnt her fingers with it, and further vowed that they, the fingers, would smell of toddy all the day long.

"What's Weston left for? do ye know?" asked Barty of his guest, as they were having some refreshment together, in a very friendly way on Mr. Harding's part.

"No, can't tell; never heard; got old, perhaps."

"Never turns off old servants at this shop, Mr. H.," said Barty; "takes 'em on all the faster, if I might go so far."

"That's right," said the steward. "Can't say; can't say."

"Got a family, hasn't he?" asked Barty.

"Never saw the man in my life. Know no more than a baby, but what Sir Lionel wrote word, and families were not mentioned."

"Should think not," said all of them, and they all laughed at old Barty's curiosity in asking a stranger such questions.

"Well," said Mr. Bracegirdle, as he put a smoking sausage on to Mr. Harding's plate, "we can't tell what may come next. We mustn't boast of what an hour will bring forth. We're here to-day, and gone to-morrow—leastways, with a new baronet just arrived."

"What's the odds?" said one of the women; "there's as good fish in the sea—"

"As ever came out," said Mr. Bracegirdle; "right, my dear, quite right; and when no place as good as this won't offer, my dear, it strikes me it'll be time for Bartlemy Bracegirdle to retire on his income."

"And no bad thing to retire on, either," said more than one of them.

"I should think not," said the steward, "if one may judge from appearances."

And away went the sausages and mashed potatoes; and no one knew, and no one thought, of the wretched back room in the back street so hard by, where ignorance, and vice, and hunger, and death were doing their work.

And not a crumb from that servants' table reached the mouth of poor Ben Bugman—why should it?

CHAPTER IX.

THE EXECUTION.

THE stranger, of course, had left the house in the square, and had promised to call the next day.

The other stranger, in the other house, remained in possession; and very rich he must have felt when he possessed it. Mr. Bugman senior had never returned.

Whether, having consulted the other donkey, he had been advised to absent himself (singularly sound advice, if he did receive it), or whether he had fallen down an open area, and was sleeping himself sober against some coal-cellar, his wife never knew, and his son never cared.

But, certain it is, that both donkey and cart were included among the "effects" which were this day being moved off for "convenience of sale," under the superintendence of our friend the "doctor."

While Mrs. Bugman was asleep, they had managed to take the only one or two heavy things out of the house, that might make any noise in removal.

When she woke, she saw nothing in the room but the miserable pallet on which she lay, and her son sitting down beside her on the ground, scraping the inside of a basin with an old iron spoon, to get the taste of some gruel she had left there.

The boy put it down in a great hurry, and got up to throw his arm round her, for she began her old cough again immediately.

"Mother," said Ben.

"Yes, dear."

"Do ye think ye can let 'em take ye, just a little way, werry comfortable, in a close conveyance? It's a werry little way."

"Are you going, Ben?" she asked.

"Ain't I!" he said; "I should think so, just."

"I'll go anywhere with you, Ben."

She guessed all about it. And she guessed the truth.

There was a vehicle at the door, and one of the officers of the parish was there to superintend the journey.

"Now, young chap," said our friend the doctor, who came in just at the moment, "we shall be glad of that feather bed, when you're quite ready."

Ben said something under his breath, all to himself.

"Now, mother dear," he said, with his face close to hers.

There were no women there, not one.

But those two, the lad and the officer, covered her up quite close in an old blanket, and carried her through the deserted shop, across the little pavement, and put her into the vehicle.

They were not overburdened with the weight.

And the woman never for an instant removed her eyes from Ben; afraid, it seemed, of losing sight of him.

The man who was driving caught sight of the passenger, and when she was laid along at full length in the vehicle, he turned round on the box to the officer, and asked:—

"Which place are we to drive to, guv'nor?"

"Drive to!" said the doctor. "What do you mean? Where should ye drive to?"

"It looks to me as like a 'black job' as ever I see," said the man.

He was quite right—quite right.

It did look very much like it.

Ben was inside the carriage, which was a sort of covered wagon.

"Don't leave me, Ben," said the woman.

"Never, mother!" said the lad.

And he supported her all the way in his arms, and she seemed happier when he spoke.

"Where's your father, Ben?" she murmured.

"He's close to us, mother. He'll meet us, I dare say, when we get out."

Let us hope he was forgiven the deception of the answer.

Was it that the dying woman couldn't die in anger, and yearned just once more to see her husband, to tell him she forgave him?

Even Biscuit died licking the hand of Lionel.

So, perhaps, there comes, in all death, an impulse to pardon a foe.

The carriage hurried on through London streets. The driver drove just as he would have done, had it been the parish hearse—

"Rattle her bones over the stones—"

She's only a pauper whom nobody owns.

At last they drew up at the workhouse door.

Mother and son hadn't spoken for a few minutes. Ben thought she was at peace in knowing that he was beside her, and that his worthless father was not lost.

"Now, mother dear, just one more move, and we're all right. Ye've borne the shaking first-rate, bless'd if you haven't."

She had indeed.

But she had begged they never would take her there,—and she had left them only her bones to take. Ben found she didn't move when he spoke, and springing up to look into her face, he thought she was still looking at him.

The face bore the latest thought she had nursed—"Ben is here!"

So she died smiling, and even happy.

The boy uttered no loud cry when the officials appeared to remove the invalid. They brought a comfortable chair, covered with blankets, in which they were going to carry her.

"Let her be," said Ben, very softly, "I'm goin' to carry her in myself. She don't want no blankets, thank ye."

"Dead, by my soul! dead!" cried the porter.

"Don't make a noise," said Ben. "Now, mother dear."

And, as Ben lifted the body in his arms, and the head hung over his shoulder, the lad buried his own face in the breast of the corpse, and sobbed there with a grief which even the bystanders were fain to respect.

And while men were "pattering" under the workhouse windows, "Dreadful Murder and Robbery at Sir Lionel Gascoigne's, in — Square," Ben sat by the remains of his mother, and wished that he lay beside her—past the touch of sorrow and the gripe of law, "where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest!"

(To be Continued.)

JAPAN AND THE JAPANESE.

THERE is no country which has excited more interest than Japan—no country about which so little is generally known. The interior has been closed against us, and for the stranger and foreigner there was no admittance. The aspects of the Japanese shores are gloomy, as if nature vied with man in an effort to make the land inaccessible. Storms and fogs, rocks and reefs, sentinel this mysterious country. The barriers of Japanese authority forbid every approach to intimacy. No one could utter the "open sesame" which should make ready access possible, and disclose the hidden treasures of the land.

Until the recent expedition of Lord Elgin, nearly all our information about the Japanese was derived from the Dutch. Formerly the Portuguese had free access to the country; but the over-zealous proselytism of the Jesuits alarmed the people, and a general massacre took place. Mynheer Dutchman is not altogether free from the suspicion of having fomented the ill-feeling of the Japanese, and stimulated their massacre of the Portuguese. Whether or no this be the case, it is certain that since 1637, when the Portuguese were finally expelled, the Dutch have been the only people who have been allowed to trade with Japan.

But the timidity and exclusiveness of the Japanese is comparatively of modern growth. During the days of its early intercourse with Europe, it was marked by high-bred courtesy on their part, combined with refined liberality and hospitality. When a governor of the Philippines was wrecked and destitute, they at once treated him according to his rank. He was received with princely honours, which were continued during his residence. The poor boy, Adams, who was wrecked there, rose from the state of "apprentice to Master Nicholas Digging, of Limehouse," to be a prince in Japan. He became the counsellor and friend of the monarch. Thus, we see, that equal favour was shown to the poor as to the rich, and that the want of assistance formed the best and surest claim on Japanese generosity.

Since the first appearance of Europeans in Japan (1542-5), five different nations have been brought into connection with that country; namely, the Portuguese, the Dutch, the Russians, the Americans, and the English.

THE PORTUGUESE

First visited the empire of Japan in 1542, and the Spaniards a little later. They were cordially received, and allowed to open an advantageous and unshackled intercourse with the people. The amount of gold and silver sent home by these traders was very great, and tended to confirm the impression that Japan was the wealthiest country under the sun. Catholic missions were not only tolerated but encouraged. They were allowed to build churches, and publicly to engage in all the exercises of their faith. But the Portuguese and Spaniards abused their liberty. They endeavoured to serve the Japanese as they have served the Peruvians. Abusing the toleration allowed them, they became aggressive, and, not content with verbal attacks on the religion and government of Japan—attacks which, to the Japanese, were treason and blasphemy—they openly derided their rites, and, seizing some of the people, sold them for slaves. The Japanese took the alarm. They ordered the expulsion of the Jesuit priests, pulled down the crosses, and introduced stringent laws with regard to European settlers. The Jesuits inflamed the minds of their people. A revolt took place—a revolt which was put down with a strong hand. All Christian nations were expelled; Christianity forbidden; a price put on the heads of priests and Christians; all foreigners were forbidden to enter, all natives forbidden to quit the empire. Japan, to use Kämpfer's phrase, was "shut up" (1637).

THE DUTCH

Opened a trade with Japan about the year 1600. They won the confidence of the government by their patience and forbearance, and retained it by never abusing the toleration which they enjoyed. That they were mainly instrumental in the ultimate expulsion of the Portuguese is unquestionable. They

The recent treaty, however, gives them certain advantages, which it is hoped they will not abuse.

THE AMERICANS.

Eagle-eyed Americans have not failed to rightly estimate the advantages of dealing with Japan. They have seen it to be an eligible location for the coining

Nagasaki (1808), and the dispatch of English vessels by Sir Stamford Raffles (1813, 1814), met with no more success than the attempt of Captain Gordon in 1818. The propositions made by Captain Matheson in 1849 were courteously refused by the Japanese, and thus, until the sudden and unexpected success of Lord Elgin, Japan was, to all appearance, completely declared that they had discovered a plot, framed by the Portuguese, for the overthrow of the empire. The Portuguese, on their part, represented the Dutch as rebellious subjects of Portugal. The Emperor of Japan, Minno-motto-no yes-yeas by name, declared that all people were alike to him, and that his empire was an asylum for all races. But the revolt of the Catholic Christians confirmed the report of the Dutch, and while their antagonists were cast out, they were still permitted to retain privileges denied to all other nations. From that time to the present, they have enjoyed an almost exclusive trade with Japan, all commercial dealings with that empire being conducted by them.

THE RUSSIANS.

The acquaintance of the Japanese with Russia is of modern growth. In the year 1805, at the suggestion of Count Resanoff, two officers of the Russian imperial navy made a descent on one of the Kuriles.

of the sacred dollar, and have not been tardy in cultivating acquaintance with the Japanese. In return for free toleration granted to themselves, they have promised to make no effort to proselyte the people, and to do nothing which can endanger the peace and well-being of the empire. Their first attempt to form an alliance took place in 1846, but was unsuccessful. In 1849 a ship of war was sent to demand the release of some American seamen, seized, as it was alleged, illegally by the Japanese. After some delay, and a show of force on the part of the Americans, the seamen were given up. In 1853 a formal demand for permission to trade with Japan was again made by the United States; a demand which, after much hesitation, was at length accorded under numerous restrictions. The ports of Hakodadi and of Simoda were thus opened to America.

THE ENGLISH.

Permission to erect a factory at Firato was granted to the English in 1613. But the privilege was reclosed against the English trader. Thanks to the enterprise of his lordship, a change has taken place; a revolution as startling to the Japanese as it was unexpected by the world, has been accomplished by moral force alone. It is intimated that, since the Americans obtained possession of Simoda, a more favourable view of other nations has been taken by the Japanese. The news of the signing of the treaty of Tien-sin, accompanied by exaggerated reports of our naval force, hastened the coming change. The arrival of the American and Russian envoys, rapidly followed by Lord Elgin, settled the matter, and a treaty, far more comprehensive than could have been anticipated, was readily accorded.

On the 3rd of August, her Majesty's ships "Furious," "Retribution," a gunboat, and the steam yacht intended as a present for the Emperor, entered the port of Nagasaki, and cast anchor off the Dutch factory of Decima. As soon as it was determined that the presentation of the yacht should take place

TYPES OF DIFFERENT CASTES.

They landed on territory belonging to Japan, and peopled by Japanese: murder, robbery, and incendiarism marked their track. They took away many prisoners and threatened to return. The Russians—and how could they expect anything else when such shameless outrages had been committed under their flag?—have hitherto failed in their attempts at opening commercial relations with the Japanese.

signed after ten years' trial, a more profitable trade offering with India. The English retired honourably from Japan in 1623. In the reign of Charles II. (1673) an embassy was sent to Japan, but that monarch being allied to the royal house of Portugal, it utterly failed. More than a century after this event, an English vessel, the "Argonaut," touched at Japan. The expedition of Lord Pellew against at Jeddo, the little fleet started for Simoda, which is situate at the extreme point of the promontory, and forms one side of the entrance to the bay of Jeddo. Up this bay the squadron proceeded, and passed the sacred limit of Kanagawa, beyond which no foreign vessel has ever ventured. A few minutes after they were cautiously feeling their way round a long spit of land which stretches far into the bay, and renders navigation dangerous. As they proceeded the square-rigged Japan vessels hove in sight, and the green batteries of the city gradually appeared.

Lord Elgin completed this act of unparalleled audacity by landing at Jeddo in great state as plenipotentiary of her Britannic Majesty. Each ship was decked with flags from stem to stern; a thundering salute was fired from every port-hole; the naval bands struck up their inspiring strains, and a large procession of ship-boats proceeded to the landing-place. Lord Elgin was accompanied by the captains and officers in full dress, and by certain Japanese, who had come off to know what it all meant. At the principal landing-place, he was met by the state officials, and conducted with great solemnity to a temple, or religious house appropriated to his service. He remained eight days on shore—that short period sufficing to conclude a treaty equal, in a commercial point of view, to that which he had already concluded at Tien-sin, and invested with still higher historic interest and political importance.

The Matron.

NO. XLIX.

In cap making, a block, or rather a DUMMY, is of great assistance, as the shape can easily be procured when the material is, in a manner, moulded on an imitation head.

Should any young person who peruses the "Matron" seriously intend taking to millinery as a business, we strongly recommend her to purchase a DUMMY. She could procure one at a toy-shop for about two shillings, and, with care, she may make it last for many years, since, however fashions may vary, the form of the human head is always the same; but an imprudent exposure of the ears and face does sometimes alter the contour of the latter, for cold (brought on by the keen wintry wind) takes every painful variety of form, and often that of rheumatism and swelling in the face.

But before I proceed to this department of millinery, I will describe the pelerine (illustrated in plate 1), which could be worn over a light silk or a barège dress.

No. 1.

It would not look amiss on one of British merino, but as it is rather a tasteful article of wear, the other part of the costume should correspond. It is made of book muslin. The frilling that surrounds it is of the same material, but the tabs slashed across are of insertion embroidered muslin, having a very narrow edging. According to the prevailing fashion, black velvet is fancifully used in this pelerine, and the bands of the velvet, on the tippet and ends, must be tacked on lightly, so as to be removed with ease when the pelerine requires getting-up.

In plate 2 I give a specimen of a simple, but very becoming habit-shirt. The foundation is of cambric muslin; and the beautiful embroidery in front could only be fully appreciated by wearing this habit-shirt with a dress opening in front.

The effect of the trimming is produced by two outer rows of narrow white braid, two of insertion embroidered muslin, and a narrow plaited cambric frill. The band represented in the plate forms no part of the chemisette or habit-shirt, the ends of which are merely neatly hemmed, and finished off.

No. 2.

In the next chapter I intend giving my readers a pattern of a pretty jochu, or kerchief, for the head. It is of crochet work, and not only is it very becoming, but it is exactly calculated to protect the face of the wearer from cold.

A LEGEND OF THE CRIMEA.

"Tis morn—but scarce yon lurid sun
Can pierce the war-clouds rolling dun."

FATHER! Father! Hear me cry—
All the long night I have lain
Where a thousand others lie,
With the living and the slain!
God of Battles! hear me pray—
Let the lamp burn but this day,
Only this, that I may send
To a dearer one than friend,
Words to lift her breaking heart,
When the deathly shadows part
On the field of Alma!

She, sweet wife, is standing now
Where I ne'er may stand again;
Pressing her poor anxious brow
On the frosty lattice-pane.
In a long and lonely watch,
Striving if she may not catch
Through the glimmer of the morn,
Glimpse of horseman, sad and worn,
Bearing swift to hearts that weep,
Woful news of them that sleep
On the field of Alma!

Poor, pale love, I see thee now,
Pushing back thy sunny hair
From a young and patient brow,
Half in hope and half in fear.
Weary days must intervene,
With wild thoughts of death between—
Then the tidings that will come,
Crushing out the life of home!
God help thee, wife! and help them all
To whom the heritage must fall
Of the slain at Alma!

How the torchlights come and go!
Bloody hands and faces white
On red waves swim to and fro,
As they did all yesternight.
Forward! Charge the Russian gun!
Comrades, ho! the breach is won!
Victory! Ha! that fever-thrill—
Hand too weak for soldier-will—
Ah! I see, I am not well—
Something struck me—and I fell!
Yet through all the storm of battle—
Clash of arms, and grapeshots' rattle—
Cannons' thunder, dying groans—
Wife, I heard thy tender tones
On the field of Alma!

This thy face, my little wife?
This seems darker than thy hair—
"Hush! the din of nearing strife
Booms along the heavy air—
Nigher shouts of victory roll
Than thine oh, Sebastopol!
Down thy thunder, host on host;
Lance in rest and sabre crossed;
Flowing rein and banner spread:
Hide on, comrades! o'er the dead!
Front and flank our English ire
Bursts in waves of wrathful fire!
Hide on, comrades! faster! faster!
On! through storms of red disaster!
Ho! they dash through shot and shell!
England—sword and wife—farewell!"
—Thus they died at Alma!

THE BUTTERFLIES' MISSION.

THE old maid walked slowly along, thinking disconsolately of her many troubles, and wondering why people who seem to have no particular place and no particular work in the world were ever sent into it—wondering why some people should have more than heart could wish, while others, just as deserving, should have next to nothing—wondering why the favoured inhabitants of the great palace on the hill should seem so indifferent to blessings which would render her unspeakably happy—wondering, wondering, and fretting within herself at the ways of Providence. The old maid was very unhappy, because she was very rebellious and wicked at heart, though all her outward conduct was frozen into the utmost propriety. Nobody in the world who had seen that tall, correct figure, with every garment religiously severe in its meekness and simplicity, who had remarked those quietly-folded hands which held a book in their clasp, and that pale, passionless face, with its downcast eyes, could have dreamed of the vexed and tumultuous thoughts that were boiling and foaming within. "Man looketh on the outward appearance, but God looketh on the heart," and he had pity on the unhappiness of the lonely old maid's heart, and sent it comfort.

The path along which she walked led by the side of a little singing brook; the grass was fresh and green along its banks, and some pretty little flowers were peeping out their smiling faces to the sunshine. Suddenly, right in the midst of one of her most knotty wonderings, up, almost into the old maid's face, fluttered a flock of butterflies—beautiful, yellow butterflies—all alike. She did not remember to have seen so many together for a great many years. Thought dropped the knotty questions, as suddenly as a dog will drop a hot joint, and made a great leap backwards. The old maid stood perfectly still, and close to her feet the bright little flock again settled down. Well does Mr. Beecher eloquently describe butterflies as "the interior spirits of rainbows, sent down to salute those kisses of the seasons on the ground—flowers." They are, indeed, as spirits, and these butterflies came with a message from the past to the heart of the desolate old maid.

People passed near and turned to look at the sober-eyed woman standing so motionless with the butterflies at her feet—perhaps they thought her crazed or foolish—she did not care what they thought; her soul was gone away backwards, to fields by a river side where long ago she had wandered with the first loved companion of her childhood. She remembered how thickly the grass was mingled with the same sweet bloom that was now before her eyes, and she remembered how many, many flocks of yellow butterflies she and her playmate had chased up and down those fields. How everything came back! the old stumps near the road, about which sorrel grew so plentifully; she and Mary used to gather it to make sauce for their bread and butter. She remembered that it tasted as good as apple-sauce; and she wished that she had some now. She saw herself and Mary running through the fields towards home, and she also saw her mother standing in the door beckoning to them. Then, with her apron full of sorrel, her heart full of happiness, and her hands full of butterflies, she reached her mother, she cried out—

"Oh! ma, ma, so many of these little beauties—"
She opened her hands—alas! the beauty of her captives was destroyed, and they crept helplessly along the little fingers of their captor. Then all the gentle words of that dear mother came back to memory—again are heard the comforting, instructing, and warning words of that long sleeping mother—and the old maid remembers that thus they closed—"My little daughter must always remember of how many things these frail and pretty creatures are an emblem."

"They are an emblem of our own future life, and also of the things in this life which look so beautiful to us that we chase them so eagerly, and grasp them so rudely, that when they are gained we find them of little worth. The world is full of disappointments and troubles, my child; and you will have your share; but I hope you will always remember your mother's words, and be patient, and cheerful, and loving, towards both God and man, let your sorrows be what they may. We none of us ever have so much trouble as we deserve, nor so much as our Saviour bore for us, and we never ought to complain at what is laid upon us. Life is but very short, dear child, though now you cannot think so—and when it is over—if we have passed it as we ought—loving our Lord through trouble and through joy—we shall find no more disappointments—all, and more than we have ever wished for will be given us; and we shall be astonished at our own happiness."

With a significance never till now fully understood, returned the wise and kind words of that mother; and there was given to the old maid a disposition to assent to all that they conveyed. Humbled and comforted she passed on her way, while about her seemed blowing the winds, and floating the odours, of her far-off childhood. The frail wings of the butterflies had borne upon them influences strong enough to fan away the gloom from a human heart; and to hush its wild heavings until they were but the soft and gentle throbs caused by the broodings of parental love. Oh! Peace, how sweet thou art—how holy! When wilt thou reign o'er all the earth? When enter into our restless and distracted hearts there to abide?

THE DEAD HOUSE.

HERE once my step was quickened,
Here beckoned the opening door,
And welcome thrilled from the threshold
To the foot it had felt before.

A glow came forth to meet me
From the flame that laughed in the grate,
And shadows a-dance on the ceiling
Danced blither with mine for a mate.

"I claim you, old friend," yawned the arm-chair,—
"This corner, you know, is your seat."
"Rest your slippers on me," beamed the fender,—
"I'll brighten at touch of your feet."

"We know the practised finger,"
Said the books, "that seems like brain;"
And the shy page rustled the secret
It had kept till I came again.

Sang the pillow, "My down once quivered
On the nightingales' throats that flew
Through moonlit gardens of Hafiz
To gather quaint dreams for you."

Ah, me, where the Past sowed heart's-case,
The Present plucks rue for us men!
I come back: that scar unhealing
Was not in the churchyard then.

But, I think, the house is unaltered;
I will go and beg to look
At the rooms that were once familiar
To my life as its bed to a brook.

Unaltered! Alas for the sameness
That makes the change but more!
'Tis a dead man I see in the mirrors,
'Tis his tread that chills the floor!

To learn such a simple lesson
Need I go to Paris and Rome,—
That the many make a household,
But only one the home?

'Twas just a womanly presence,
An influence unexpressed,—
But a rose she had worn on my grave-sod
Were more than long life with the rest!

'Twas a smile, 'twas a garment's rustle,
'Twas nothing that I can phrase,—
But the whole dumb dwelling grew conscious,
And put on her looks and ways.

Were it mine I would close the shutters,
Like lids when the life is fled,
And the funeral fire should wind it,
This corpse of a home that is dead.

For it died that autumn morning
When she, its soul, was borne
To lie all dark on the hillside
That looks over woodland and corn.

Small Change.

"HAVE you any loose change this morning?" said a young fellow to his companion. "No, indeed—money is tight."

SOMEbody says that, although there is no such thing as muzzling the press in this country, there is plenty of book-muzzlin.

SOME in the north say that "Cotton is king." A country paper says that "Tobacco is king." It certainly reigns in a great many mouths. We must say, however, that it seems to have rather foul kingdoms.

EMBALMING is the making of a flesh-statue—eternalizing a corpse—perpetuating the perishable with more pains than we take to save that which is immortal.

BRAVERY is a cheap and vulgar quality, of which the highest instances are frequently found in the lowest savages, and which is often more conspicuous in the brute creation than in the most intrepid of the human race.

"I AM afraid," said a person of questionable or rather unquestionable habits, "that I am likely to have water upon the brain." "You will never have it upon the stomach," was his companion's consolatory reply.

A YOUNG fellow devoted himself successfully a whole evening to the entertainment of a company of pretty girls, and demanded his pay in kisses. "Certainly, sir," said the prettiest of them; "present your bill."

THE more we practise virtue the dearer it becomes, as two friends love each other the more, the more they know each other.

LET the day have a blessed baptism by giving your first waking thoughts into the bosom of God. The first hour of the morning is the rudder of the day.

LOVE is a volcano, the crater of which no wise man will approach too nearly, lest, from motives less philosophical than those of Empedocles, he should be swallowed up, leaving something behind him, however, that will tell more tales than the slipper of the rash old Greek.

IF you see a wife carefully footing her husband's stockings, you may conclude that he will not find it difficult to foot her bills.

A DENTIST in one of our large cities advertises that he inserts teeth cheaper than anybody else. He might find a bull-dog that would do it still cheaper.

WHEN we feel a strong desire to thrust our advice upon others, it is usually because we suspect their weakness, but we ought to be readier to suspect our own.

WHOEVER prostituted his temperance, piety, and science, gathered his harvest into a heap and set fire to it.

IT would be uncharitable too severely to condemn for faults without taking some thought of the sterling goodness which mingles in and lessens them.

MANY of us are led by our vices, but a great many more follow them without any leading at all.

A BANK and a jail were broken in T— last week, the former by outsiders, and the latter by insiders.

MANY a mind is dead to effort, and its epitaph can be written in three words—helped to death.

THAT virtue which depends on opinion looks to secrecy alone. We couldn't trust it in a desert.

SOMEbody says that the oldest husbandry he knows of is the marrying of a widower in clover with a woman in weeds.

IN great cities, men are more callous both to the happiness and the misery of others than in the country, for they are constantly in the habit of seeing both extremes.

MYSTERY magnifies danger, as a fog the sun. The hand that warned Belshazzar derived its horrifying influence from its want of a body.

WE are afraid that a lady who uses rouge to counterfeit a blush, must be conscious of cause for blushing.

POETRY is said to be a gift, but it often proves to be a theft.

"How did you learn that graceful attitude?" said a gentleman to a fellow leaning in a maudlin fashion against a post. "I have been practising at a glass."

AN author asks, "what a rose, worn on a young lady's forehead, indicates?" We suppose she means to indicate by it that, if kissed at all, it must be "under the rose."

THE praise of the envious is far less creditable than their censure, for they praise only that which they can surpass, and censure that which surpasses them.

REASONS why a ship is called she:—
Because man knows not the expense till he gets them.

Because they are useless without employment.
Because they look best when well rigged.

Because their value depends on their age.
Because they are upright when in stays.

Because they bring news from abroad.
Because they wear caps and bonnets.

Because they are often painted.

THE world cannot well spare its true poets. When one of them dies, there is a note out of the time—we feel that a part of earth's music is hushed.

YOU may wish to get a wife without a failing, but what if the lady, after you find her, happens to be in want of a husband of the same character?

AN editor says, "on our outside will be found some fine suggestions for raising peaches." We suppose that on his inside may be found the peaches themselves.

THE other day we heard an old fisherman upon the banks of the river complain that the boys had stolen his minnows. We suppose the little rascals hooked the bait to bait their hooks.

WITH four metallic qualifications, a man may be pretty sure of worldly success—they are gold in his pocket, silver in his tongue, brass in his face, and iron in his heart.

LEAVE your grievances as Bonaparte did his letters, unopened for three weeks, and it is astonishing how few of them, at the end of that time, will require answering.

J. ROBINSON.—The King can take the Bishop at the third move, if White play as you propose in Problem No. 78.

PHILLIPS, Jun.—There is no possibility of mating in the position to which you refer; the result is a drawn game.

HENRY PARKER.—We cannot undertake to examine Problems that are not submitted to us on diagrams. The information which you seek shall be communicated to you on your favouring us with your address on a stamped envelope. Your solutions of Problems Nos. 75, 78, and 79 are correct. You fall, however, in Problem No. 76.

JOHNNY.—"The Euryalus" is the name of the ship in which Prince Alfred, the Queen's second son, embarked at Spithead on the 26th of October last as a naval cadet. The Prince of Wales also saw Prince Alfred off. The parting between the royal brothers was very affectionate, and the royal cadet seemed also much moved at parting with his old friends and instructors, Dr. Mintner of the royal yacht, and Naval Instructor Jolly. Our readers may be interested to hear that the last-mentioned gentleman is now appointed tutor to Prince Arthur, the Queen's third son. Prince Alfred enjoys no peculiar privileges on account of his high rank. His outfit is neither better nor more extensive than theirs, and his chest is the exact and strict regulation article. Her Majesty had the Prince's chest and outfit sent up to Buckingham Palace for her own and the Prince Consort's inspection, and on its return to the outfitter, Mr. Walton, of Gosport, the Queen and Prince expressed their high satisfaction at the equipment. The chest is of polished oak, and the toilet utensils white metal electro-plated.

MARK.—You have not considered the subject sufficiently. The inhabitants of the Ionian Islands have been treated too leniently instead of too severely. It was by a treaty signed at Paris on the 5th of November, 1815, between Austria, Russia, Prussia, and England that these Islands were placed under the protection of England. A constitutional charter was granted to the Ionians; their own form of religion (they belong to the Greek Church) was established, while all denominations of Christians were protected. To the people of these islands a degree of freedom has been allowed, of which no Southern people had previously even a notion. The press has been allowed perfect liberty. The Assembly is chosen by universal suffrage and vote by ballot. It elects the Senate, and the Lord High Commissioner and the Senate together form the government. So far from being satisfied with this almost unbounded liberty, the Ionians have only taken advantage of it to make government impossible. Their press has sent forth libels against the queen, the government, and the English people. Nothing written here can give you an idea of the foulness and insolence of these compositions. The assembly meets every year to indulge in mad declamation, and last year it exceeded even its ordinary amount of violence and intemperance. It has been complained of in England that colonial self-will and caprice have too much their own way; and if the people of all our dependencies were like the Ionians, we should be inclined to think so too. But this country is actuated by high motives and a far-sighted policy, and the effects of this policy are seen in the present state of the British empire, for there is scarcely a civilised nation that has not some of its kindred living happily under the mild sway of Queen Victoria. In the present unquiet state of things in the Ionian islands, Mr. Gladstone has been sent out as commissioner extraordinary to see if any remedy can be found. Instead of a mediator, such as Mr. Gladstone is likely to prove, any other European power would have despatched to these ungrateful islanders some prompt general, who would soon have sent half the assembly to gaol. For the position of these islands look to the south-east of the map of Europe, and you will find them off the western coast of Greece.

CLEOPATRA.—"Cleopatra," who was on the continent last Christmas-day, spent, she tells us, a very melancholy day, but she thinks we ought to rejoice at this festival. "Cleopatra" is right. We have scriptural authority for a joyful celebration of Christmas. In the tenth and eleventh verses of the second chapter of the gospel according to St. Luke, we find these words (alluding to the nativity), "I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people;" and in the book of the prophet Isaiah (alluding to the birth of Christ), we read in the ninth chapter, third verse, "They joy before thee according to the joy in harvest, and as men rejoice when they divide the spoil;" and look further on and you will find in the same chapter the cause of this joy, "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder, and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace." But though Christmas is a joyful season, far be it from any member of this Christian community to make it an excuse for riot, gluttony, or drunkenness. Those who do so are more like the pagans, who, previous to the introduction of Christianity, celebrated the feast of their false god Thor about this period of the year, and celebrated it with degrading licence and excess.

BRENDA. Has been spending some time with friends in the country, at a house said to be haunted, and during the long November evenings the great pleasure of the party assembled has consisted in collecting in a semicircle round the fire, and telling ghost stories. Many of the party only gave accounts of apparitions that they had heard or read of, but one lady, on whose veracity "Brenda" fully relies, gave the company the history of a midnight adventure, in which a supernatural figure had appeared and spoken to her. "Brenda" writes to know if we believe in ghosts. Certainly we do not believe in ghosts, in the usual acceptance of the term, but we know that when the brain or the stomach is disordered, the imagination conjures up a variety of visions, and in proportion as these visions (the offspring of the imagination) gain on the credulity of the person who beholds them, the said person is in danger of becoming insane. Persons suffering from indigestion often see frightful visions: One Abbé Pilon, at Florence, incurred a tremendous spectral disorder in consequence of a surfeit of mushrooms. These mushrooms not digesting, disturbed his brain, and he saw the frightful and appalling forms of scorpions continually before his eyes for a length of time. Not only does derangement of health occasion optical delusions, it also acts upon the organs of hearing, and in a certain condition of the brain, persons believe they hear voices calling them, voices which could not by any possibility of sound concur with images of spectral illusion, a formidable imitation of reality takes place, and we do not doubt that "Brenda's" acquaintance was the victim of delusions, occasioned by bodily ailments, when she believed in the reality of a supernatural appearance.

S. R. T.—The lamentable poisonings that have taken place at Bradford, in Yorkshire, were the result of adulteration and carelessness. Even had the original intention been carried out, the lozenges of which you have heard so much would have contained no inconsiderable portion of plaster of Paris! Is plaster of Paris a proper thing to be taken into the human stomach, and, above all, into the delicate stomachs of children?—for they are the principal devourers of lozenges. But what shall we say to the carelessness that left a cask of arsenic, open and unlabelled, in a place accessible to an ignorant assistant, who took pounds and pounds of this deadly poison, and supplied it, mistaking it for plaster, to manufacture lozenges? Those concerned in this lamentable transaction are to take their trial at the next assizes for manslaughter. Twenty persons have already died victims of poison, and as they chiefly belong to the working classes, a public subscription has been opened on behalf of the families of the sufferers. Loss of life from very great carelessness has been too common of late. The other day a fatal accident resulted from the discharge of a gun, most incautiously put away loaded in a closet; and how often we read of phosphorus matches strewn on the floor, or placed within the reach of children, or of turpentine left so near the fire that, owing to its position and its inflammable nature, spontaneous combustion takes place! Then what frightful accidents happen from gas explosions! The improvements achieved by art and science add greatly to the convenience and comfort of life, but they do not enable us to dispense with caution, prudence, and forethought. New inventions will not respect our lives any more than old ones. On the contrary, the new ones possess greatly increased powers of destruction, when due precautions are not taken.

A WATER LILY.—In reply to your question, we must inform you that the late Madame Ida Pfeiffer was born in Austria. She is the authoress of the popular work entitled "Voyage Round the World." Strange to say, she did not begin her adventurous career till she was forty-seven years of age. From her perseverance, daring, and dauntless courage, we learn that it is in the power of a woman whose character, manners, and person were not in the least more manly than those of the rest of her sex, to compass voyages and travels, and in a space of time so short that, to our preconceived notions, her exploits partake of the marvellous. It is a curious fact, that when Madame Pfeiffer was in Brazil (South America), she was accompanied, and one would have thought, supported, by Count Berchthold; but his strength failed him, and our heroine had to proceed alone in her visit to the Indian aborigines of that country. Madame Ida's last effort of travel was an attempt to explore the wild and inhospitable island of Madagascar, off the eastern coast of Africa. There she caught a fever, from which she never wholly recovered, and she expired a short time since in her native city of Vienna.

ELLEN.—We advise Ellen to make the following balls and use them in the same manner as soap. Scrape or slice a quarter of a pound of curd soap in a pipkin, press it down and cover it with soft water; pound a quarter of an ounce of camphor with a little eau de cologne and half a tablespoonful of honey. Add these to the soap in the pipkin and place it in the chimney corner until melted, when it will mould into balls with the assistance of almond powder.

NORA CRINA.—We agree with you that the price of provisions some six or seven hundred years ago indicates a flourishing state of things, but you must not come to the conclusion that things were so wonderfully plentiful but rather that money was very scarce. Besides, the coins of that time though bearing the same names as at present, had not the same value. When you find two oxen sold for seventeen shillings and fourpence, you must bear in mind that one Norman shilling was as much in value as three of ours; and when we find that thirty hens were sold for three farthings each, we must recollect this proportion. The price of a sheep was one shilling, that is, three of ours. Wheat was six shillings a quarter; that would be, according to our scale, two shillings and threepence a bushel. At the time of this calculation, a little more than 200 years after the compiling of Domesday Book, viz., in 1299 A.D., a ploughman's wages were about five shillings a year, and a maid servant received a penny a week.

T. HOBBS.—The term Radical, as applied to politics, dates from about the year 1818, when the popular leaders Henry Hunt, Major Cartwright, and others, sought to obtain a Radical reform of Parliament. The term Radical never was applied to the Whigs as a party.

MODEL COPY-BOOKS.—Those of our subscribers who experience any difficulty in obtaining the "Model Copy-books," from a local bookseller, may obtain them by applying to Messrs. Petter and Galpin, who will supply them in complete sets of eight books for 2s., post free 2s. 4d. Three of the Special Pencils prepared for these copy-books (at 2d. each), can be had post free for eight stamps. N.B.—In No. 53 of the "Family Paper," a "notice" was inserted (in error) that the copy-books would be forwarded post free for 24 stamps, instead of the price quoted above.

JOSEPHINE.—Your brother is right; Venus is at one time a morning, and at another an evening star. When it is to the west of the sun it rises before the sun, and is called a morning star, this appearance continuing about 200 days together. When it is to the east of the sun it sets after the sun, and is called an evening star for the remaining portion of the year.

BIGGS.—The greatest warriors were all short in stature: Alexander the Great proverbially so. Napoleon I. was about five feet six inches high. The Duke of Wellington, at Waterloo, was about five feet eight and a half inches in stature.

IDA.—As you do not wish to make a great quantity of mince-meat, you will find the following a very good receipt:—Procure a neat's tongue; parboil it; take a pound and a half of it, and chop it very fine; shred very fine a pound and a half of good beef suet; stone a pound of raisins; pare and core five apples, and take the thin rind of one lemon; chop up the three last-mentioned ingredients very fine, and mix them in a large pan lined with earthenware. Add a pound of sifted loaf sugar, two pounds of currants well cleaned, an ounce of cloves finely beaten, the juice of three lemons, and a tablespoonful of orange-flower water. Mix all these ingredients thoroughly together, and keep them in a covered pan. This receipt is suited for a large party, where the mince-meat is quickly consumed. For keeping for the winter, we should give a different receipt.

L. M.—The East India Company, which is now a thing of the past, originated in the subscriptions (trifling in amount) of a few private individuals. It gradually became a commercial body, with gigantic means, and next, by the force of unforeseen circumstances, assumed the form of a sovereign power, while those by whom it was directed continued, in their individual capacities, to be without power or political influence—thus presenting an anomaly without a parallel in the history of the world. The first adventure of the association was in 1601. In the month of May in that year, five ships, with cargoes of merchandise and bullion, started from Torbay to India. The result was favourable—a foretaste of the immense success of the East India Company.

A LOVER OF LIBERTY.—In spite of the opposition of the nobles, we think we may congratulate you and all other lovers of liberty on the abolition of serfdom in the gigantic empire of Russia. This fact is a still greater cause of rejoicing since Russia has been for such a long succession of centuries inhabited by Slavonic or slavish tribes. These tribes were first organised or regularly governed by Rurik, a Swede, in about the year 820. The Russian monarchs were called grand dukes till 1100, when the title of Czar was taken. In 1223 they became tributary to the Mongol Tartars, but in 1477 they were expelled, and the sovereigns, till Peter the Great, generally died violent deaths. Since his time there have been four empresses and four emperors. Before the check received from the allied powers of Britain, France, and Sardinia (during the Crimean campaign), Russian power threatened Europe on every side.

ELLEN P.—You ask us whence the hare originally came. Your question is difficult to answer, because it is found in almost every climate. We can easily give you a few particulars about the hare, which is, you tell us, such a favourite of yours. The hare varies in weight from seven to twelve pounds. In the arctic circle hares are white in winter. Their stratagems to escape danger are marvellous and ingenious; but, besides man, they fall a prey to many other creatures; for instance, to dogs, cats, weasels, and eagles. The Tartarean hare is not larger than a rat, and it burrows in the ground. The hare is a timid, but very sensible, animal. It cries like a child when caught in a snare, and it exclaims raie with human distinctness when worried by ferocious dogs and hunters. The history that the amiable poet, William Cowper, gives us of his pet hares, must interest every lover of the dumb creation.

PUNCTUALITY, J. ROBERTSON, MARY C., T. DONALDSON, and some others, must be so kind as to repeat their questions, as we cannot search the correspondence of weeks back. We answer questions of interest as promptly and as fully as our space and time will allow. LOMAX.—The web woven around you is so intricate, that you can only be extricated from it by an experienced solicitor. X. Y. Z.—You may obtain a complete set of the "Illustrated Family Paper" from Messrs. Petter & Galpin. MALlico.—Used pipes are cleansed by being placed again in the oven. C. FIELDING.—We fear your hurt is "past all surgery." LARRY GRIGG.—We can hardly recommend you to try your fortune in India in the present perturbed state of that country. A. B. C.—The mistake has long since been corrected. JACK MANDERS.—The greater portion of the writing paper now in use is of too flimsy a quality to allow of a perfect erasure of blots and errors. A FIVE YEARS' SUBSCRIBER.—Read aloud as frequently as you can, beginning low, and raising your voice by degrees. S. D.—The metres of psalms and hymns, described by certain figures or letters, as "L. M." "C. M." "S. M." "6-8s." "7s." and "6s." &c., refer to the number of syllables in each line. "L. M." or Long Metre, has four lines of eight syllables each in one verse. "C. M." or Common Metre, four lines in each verse of eight and six syllables alternately. "6-8s." six lines in a verse, each containing eight syllables. "8-7s and 6s." has eight lines, containing seven or six syllables alternately. "P. M." means Peculiar Metre, which varies considerably. T. EVANS.—We decline furnishing you with a receipt to make your head bald. The tales you mention were completed in No. 52. M. T. W.—Your question was answered in No. 50. BELL.—We do not know what will make you strong and fat, if good exercise and wholesome food will not; but as you say you have good health, why should you wish to become fat? Many consider fatness an evil.

CHAPTER V.

There is nothing ill can dwell in such a temple:
If the ill spirit have so fair a house,
Good things will strive to dwell in it.

SHAKESPEARE.

EPHRAIM SLEEK's residence in Dover was situated in a locality peculiarly adapted for carrying on his trade with the smugglers—Snargate Street, where the backs of the houses, even at a much later period than the one we are writing of, could not be overlooked by the prying eyes of inquisitive neighbours, especially during the spring tides, when the sea left only a narrow causeway between them and the little estuary which, although sufficiently deep for a light boat, was far too shallow for a vessel of burden, or a fishing smack, to pull through.

We have known even the little causeway to be submerged, and the cellars and back rooms of the houses flooded.

A rigid spirit of economy had evidently presided at the furnishing of the Quaker's abode. Every article in it had a use, sometimes half a dozen uses—not one for ornament, far less for luxury. The parlour, which faced the street, had a cheerless air; the eight high-backed cane chairs, ranged at equal distances against the walls, looked as uncomfortable as if the cramp had twisted their legs for want of proper exercise; and the narrow, inhospitable grate stood yawning at the curtainless windows, the wire blinds of which were, however, sufficiently high to prevent the passers in the street from taking too curious a survey of the interior.

The floor was of polished oak, with a square of gray drugget exactly in the centre. Upon this drugget stood a small mahogany table, without a book, drawing, or even a shell upon it.

Although scrupulously clean, the room seemed a dreary as if the light laugh of youth had never startled its drowsy echoes since it had been a parlour. Cold as the pretensions of poverty-stricken gentility, we question if even a fly could have been found in it; and certainly, no spider that had arrived at the age of discretion—whatever period that may be—unless decidedly eccentric or misanthropical, would ever have thought of weaving his web there.

In short, the abode of Ephraim Sleek was one of those moral ice-houses, in which duty perchance might force an entrance, whilst the affections remained freezing at the door; no kindly voice to welcome, no sympathy to warm them. We pity the young heart condemned to dwell in such an ungenial atmosphere—its feelings, for want of expansion, prey upon themselves, and its dreams become morbid fancies, unless some kind angel watches over it.

It was a shelter, but not a home; for home comprises recollections which, when poverty, sorrow, or death have visited it, discourse sweet though solemn music tones, that call smiles from tears. Home! we know no word with half so soft a sound.

Let not the world judge harshly of those whose childhood never knew the affections, sympathies, and ties of home.

Despite the dulness of the cage, the solitary house in Snargate-street contained as sweet a bird as ever poured forth its song-note in captivity—the good and gentle Ruth; who, in her close-fitting cap and plain camlet gown, looked like a widowed Ephrosyne, as she sat, industriously plying her needle, and at the same time conversing with her cousin, Reuben Geldart, a young man about five-and-twenty, who stood, or rather leant, with his arm upon the chimney-piece, watching her with feelings that might easily be interpreted.

The father of Reuben and Ephraim Sleek had been partners till the death of the former dissolved the connection, and left Mrs. Geldart and her son but slenderly provided for, a circumstance many wondered at, knowing the firm to have been a prosperous one. But as the widow never complained or hinted at unfair treatment on the part of her brother-in-law, no one else did; and the suspicion, if any, gradually died away.

Although the Quaker had employed his nephew for several years in the business, he was no favourite with him—a feeling that rarely betrayed itself either by word or look, and only to be guessed at by those slight, and to unobservant eyes imperceptible, indications sensitive minds so quickly seize upon.

Perhaps the old man's dislike to him might be attributed to the fact that his young relative dressed rather more smartly than he approved of. His garments, although of the strictly orthodox cut, were of the finest broadcloth—an extravagance Ephraim, even in his younger days, had never been guilty of; then his hair, it would curl—and instead of falling demurely, persisted in displaying the large intellectual forehead, overhanging the clear gray eyes through which the spirit of Reuben Geldart looked upon the world, and scorned its sordidness.

Such were the two persons who, for nearly an hour, had been conversing together in the cold, dull, cheerless-looking room we have attempted to describe to our readers.

"Hast thou well considered the step, Reuben, thou art about to take?" demanded Ruth; "my father is sore vexed at thy departure."

"But he will not regret me," replied her cousin; "in fact, I know of none that will, except my widowed mother, unless thou," he added, as a pair of deep-blue eyes were turned somewhat reproachfully upon him, "shouldst sometimes think of me."

"I do not easily forget the friends that I have known," observed the gentle girl, "much less my own kindred, and thou hast been even as a brother to me."

"Speak but the word," exclaimed the young man, touched by the tone of sadness in which she had spoken, "and I will refuse the offer my wealthy relatives have made me, of entering their counting-house in London."

"On the contrary, it is my earnest wish that thou shouldst leave for the great city."

The hope which suddenly filled the heart of the young Quaker died as suddenly away, and his handsome features expressed the pain her words had caused him.

"How have I offended thee?" he asked, "that thou dost wish my absence?"

"It would be foolishness to take offence without a cause," answered his cousin; "and that thou hast never given me."

A pause in the conversation followed, during which the countenance of Reuben Geldart appeared agitated by a variety of contending emotions—hesitation—regret, and wounded love: Ruth, on the contrary, retained, to all appearance, her usual calm; perhaps she plied her needle rather more quickly than before, but that was all.

"Thou hast compelled me, Reuben, to explain the thing I would not explain," she at last observed—"to utter words that I would rather have kept unspoken, seeing they both pain and shame me. But better that than that thou shouldst think I would wound thee lightly. If I rejoice in thy departure, it is that it will remove thee from much that is evil—I speak of the worldly dealings of my father; not but I have heard," she added, "that London is both a snare and a pitfall for youth."

"Not when we have the prayers of an angel to guard us!" exclaimed the young man, delighted at the interest in his welfare her words betrayed.

He would have clasped her hand, but his cousin quietly withdrew it.

"Am I then forbidden to hope?" he whispered, mournfully.

"Thou knowest, Reuben, that without my parent's consent, I will never be unto any man more than a well-wisher, or as a sister," answered the maiden; "I have a duty to perform, and duties are solemn trusts, that may not be broken. My father clingeth closely to the mammon of the world, it is slowly hardening his nature, and were I to leave him to the workings of his heart, in time it would become granite; his child must watch over him, lest he fall never to rise again. Wilt thou not see him before thy departure?"

"It is unnecessary," said the young man, colouring at the recollection of the harsh words which had already passed between himself and his uncle.

"When dost thou depart?"

"An hour before daybreak, with Kiplin's wagon; but, Ruth—dearest Ruth—"

"Not a word," interrupted his cousin. "Be satisfied, that I shall not forget thee. We shall hear of each other, doubtless, through my Aunt Geldart, whom I will assuredly visit more frequently than I have hitherto been able to do. And now, Reuben," she continued, "I have a parting gift for thee. I know the pride of thy nature; but thou must not reject it."

The speaker would have placed in his hand a little silk purse, containing several guineas, but he positively declined to accept it.

"In that case," she said, "we must part as strangers; for I may not bestow the kiss of peace upon one who refuseth the gift of a sister."

No amount of resolution or pride could have withstood such a temptation; at least, no amount that we are capable of calculating. Reuben took the purse, and, for the first time, pressed his lips to the blushing cheek of the fair and gentle girl, whose goodness had made an impression upon his heart stronger even than her beauty.

"God bless thee, Ruth," he muttered, as he folded her for an instant to his breast; "and watch over thee in the path thou hast taken!"

"If the path be a right one, He will not abandon me," answered the daughter of Ephraim Sleek; "the rest is in His hands."

And thus they parted.—Reuben, to enter on a new career, to struggle with the world, to look its realities in the face, to accept or to reject them; his cousin, like some household dove, remained in her dreary cage, to endure, to hope, and suffer.

No sooner had the echo of his footsteps died away, than the calmness Ruth had so successfully maintained during their conversation abandoned her, her tears fell fast and silently, although no murmurs of regret escaped her lips; strong duty gave her courage to repress them. The task to which the young and gentle creature had devoted herself was holier even than the love the manly qualities of her cousin had inspired; but only holier because no touch of human weakness mingled with its yearnings.

Her reveries—for the heart, like the brain, will dream at times—were broken by the entrance of Hannah, who came to announce the return of her master.

Nature evidently had never intended the little handmaiden for a Quakeress; and yet she strove hard, very hard, to school her features into accordance with her dress and cap—they, at least, were orthodox, both being of the plainest description—but the attempt was a failure. However rigidly she might compress her lips, her eyes—long, lustrous, and black—just such eyes as the poet bacchanal of the cup and kiss, old Pindar, might have worshipped—would laugh, to the great annoyance of Ephraim Sleek, who had received her into his household at a very early age from charity, as he said—an assertion not exactly in accordance with the recollection of her childhood, which she rarely or ever alluded to, unless to Ruth, whom she loved for her gentleness and tenderness, in the same proportion that she feared and disliked her father.

Thrown so constantly together, they were more like sisters than mistress and servant; in fact, their relative positions frequently changed, and Ruth would undertake the household work whilst Hannah condescended over the lessons she had set her.

"I will follow thee," answered the sorrowing girl.

"Thou hast been weeping," said the messenger; her eyes, which an instant before were sparkling with mirth, suddenly dimmed with tears. "I am sorry Reuben has left us," she added; "he had kind words and looks even for me."

"I will follow thee instantly," repeated Ruth.

"I have not told thee all."

Her mistress regarded her with surprise.

"Friend Ephraim hath brought with him a woman who is not one of our people," added the speaker.

"Indeed!"

"And the woman hath an infant with her. She speaketh in a strange, but not unseemly fashion; it were well that thou shouldst see her."

The curiosity of the fair young Quakeress was excited, and she proceeded at once to the keeping-room, as the apartment was designated in those days, in which the family generally assembled to their meals. It was as cold and dreary as the little parlour.

The cheerless aspect of the place had struck a chill upon the heart of Katty, who already repented her confidence in the promises of her host, whose countenance, she fancied, had lost much of its benevolent expression since their arrival at his abode. The appearance of his daughter, however, quickly dispelled the half-formed doubts; she at once divined her goodness. It would have been impossible for any one to gaze on the face of Ruth and believe her capable of baseness or treachery.

"They are guests," observed Ephraim Sleek, in answer to the inquiring look of his child, "whom Providence hath sent us. They have need of our assistance."

Although Ruth had much rather have heard some other motive assigned for the unexpected visit than her father's charity, she received them with quiet, unaffected kindness, and expressed her regret that their supper would prove but a scanty one.

"It's not the atin' and the dhrinkin'," replied the grateful woman; "it's the coode fealtagh (warm welcome) that spakes to the heart. May yez never know what it is to be in a strange land burthened wid sorrow! If misfortune should overtake you, the saints sind you as thrue a friend as the master, to help yez through wid them."

Hannah, who was arranging the table, could not repress her surprise at hearing Ephraim Sleek thus praised for benevolence, and her eyes wandered first from his features to those of the speaker, as if to ascertain which of the two was the most insane.

"The holy cross be betwixt me and gray," men-tally ejaculated Katty. "How the Quaker-girl is sturin' at me!"

Her host had observed it too, and he sternly bade the little handmaiden attend to the preparations for their evening repast. These were soon completed, and the old man was about to ask a blessing on the food before them, when Ruth, shocked at what she knew to be an act of hypocrisy, interrupted him.

"I am moved, father," she said, in her calm, sweet tone, "to ask it for thee;" and, without waiting his reply, she pronounced a short, simple thanksgiving.

During the meal, Ephraim carefully avoided the searching glance which his daughter turned towards him. Conscience whispered him that his good and virtuous child was not the dupe of his pretended charity, that she doubted his intentions to the friendless stranger. To avoid giving her an opportunity of asking him any questions, he rose suddenly from the table.

"Hast thou the key of the counting-house?" he asked.

As Ruth gave it him their eyes met for an instant, and her worst fears were confirmed. It is a sad thing when a parent cannot endure the gaze of his child.

"In the morning," said the old man, turning to Katty, "I will see to the means of thy journeying safely with thy infant charge."

The grateful woman, whose confidence by this time was perfectly restored, poured forth her thanks.

"It is the heart of him that is good," she exclaimed, as he quitted the keeping-room. "It's a blessing to have such a father."

The eyes of Hannah sparkled with mirth.

"Our people love not praise," quietly observed Ruth; "the best of us have much to answer for. Let me conduct thee, friend, to thy room, for the hour of repose is at hand."

Anxious, if possible, to avoid further conversation, the fair Quakeress conducted her guest to her own chamber, and would have bade her good night but Katty detained her; her heart was full, and she insisted on relating the sad story of her foster-sister.

"It's not beggars that we are," she observed with honest pride. "Neither is it the red gould that I want to bring me to my home agin."

"It's the frind to help me," she added emphatically, "and that I have found."

"It is a strange history," said her listener, "and I believe a true one. Sleep in peace. there is one that watcheth over thee."

With this observation, the speaker descended to the apartment in which the evening meal had been taken.

"Thou wilt share my bed?" observed Hannah, who, during her absence, had busied herself in clearing the table.

"Not to-night," answered her mistress, with a sigh; "sad thoughts are upon me, and I must watch and pray."

It is now time that we returned to the prisoner awaiting the coming day to be transferred to the castle of Dover.

The roundhouse or lock-up of Plaxted, to which Redmond O'Neil had been consigned, stood as nearly as possible in the centre of the green, at the extreme end of the village. The building, an octagonal one, not without some architectural pretensions, was divided into two chambers of equal dimensions by a strong wall, with a door in the centre, secured by a couple of iron bars, placed too far down to permit the prisoner it was closed upon to reach them by stretching his arm through the grating, supposed to admit both light and air to the inner room.

Considering that the aforesaid room or cell had neither chimney nor window to ventilate it, the dimensions of the aperture could not be considered unreasonable.

The outer chamber was far more comfortably arranged. A huge yawning chimney, with an oak settee on either side, filled one of the angles; from the other, a narrow bay window, placed sufficiently high to prevent the boys from peeping in, admitted light by day; at night, a rude iron cresset suspended from the ceiling by a chain, served to render darkness visible in the place.

It was in the first division that Jacob Bumps, the constable, mounted guard over his prisoner; he was beadle as well as constable, and fully sensible of the dignities centred in his rather dwarfish person, as well as of the importance of his charge; the fussy little man had invested himself with his coat and hat, that awful three-cornered hat, the very sight of whose gold-bound edges proved sufficient to send the urchins, who would play upon the tomb-stones, scampering out of the churchyard.

In church, a glimpse of his wig, made in that peculiar sober fashion, named in honour of the grandfather of the sovereign lady who now fills the throne, a brown George, kept the same restless juveniles in awe: we say his wig, for only those who were seated in the gallery could catch the severe dignity of his countenance, as he paraded the aisles, the pews being so exceedingly high, and the beadle, as we before observed, so remarkably short of stature.

There must have been some element of greatness in his composition—a natural aptitude—an eye to the fitness of things; for Jacob Bumps had placed his long beadle's staff, and the shorter one pertaining to his office as constable, crosswise on the table—a proof that he was duly impressed with the importance of his office, and looked upon the present as a very solemn exercise of its duties.

A state prisoner! There was something magnificent in the words: and he felt as if the safety of the Crown itself were intrusted to his keeping; the event would become historical; perhaps he would have to go to London; the King himself might hear of him, and—but no, we will not venture to assert that he positively indulged in any such vision, although the mayor of Dover had lately been knighted merely for presenting an address.

It is said that no man is a hero to his valet-de-chambre. It must have been a bachelor who first invented the proverb; a married man would have made it far more comprehensive by saying "to his wife."

Mrs. Bumps was one of the few persons in Plaxted who did not stand in awe of her husband; in fact, if the truth must be told, her husband stood considerably in awe of her.

Like most little men, Jacob was ambitious, and this weakness had displayed itself in the choice of a wife. Mrs. B., as he used to observe, really was a woman.

As we are less likely to be partial in describing her than Bumps, our readers, perhaps, may prefer our portrait of the lady to her husband's. Mrs. B. was unusually tall for one of the gentler sex, thin, and wiry, except in the arms, which, by a caprice of nature, displayed a suspicious amount of muscle, a development produced, no doubt, by exercise.

As the parish clerk, a grave but somewhat satirical personage, used to observe, Jacob knew best.

As it could not have been for the beauty of her face that her husband wooed and won her to become his better half, probably it was for its dignity and commanding expression. The nose was decidedly aquiline—a little too long, perhaps; the lips thin, and generally compressed; the forehead low—a defect the fashion of the day in wearing the hair turned over a roll, and surmounted by a shrewish-looking cap, tended to increase.

Such was the person whose authoritative knock at the door of the roundhouse disturbed the ambitious reveries of Jacob Bumps, and who, despite his very respectful remonstrances to the contrary, insisted on being admitted.

"You know, my love, it is against my instructions," he said.

Although indignant at the delay, the lady mildly reminded him that she was his wife, and had nothing to do with the magistrate's orders.

"I shall be blamed in the morning by Dr. Titlow, should it be known," urged the little man.

Mrs. Bumps suggested, in that peculiar tone of voice which rarely failed to silence opposition, that very possibly the rector's might not be the only anger he would have to encounter in the morning, if he persisted in his refusal.

The argument proved irresistible; he felt that he was a husband, as well as a constable, and with a sigh of resignation drew back the bolt to admit his, as far as conjugal authority was concerned, in every respect better half, who stalked into the watchhouse, followed by Joe Kerl.

"Really, my love, this is too bad!" exclaimed Jacob, deeply mortified, when he recognised the latter.

The smuggler assured him that he had merely dropped in to take a peep at his charge.

"Hoity, toity!" interrupted the lady. "Here's a fuss for bringing a friend with me. Would you have me walk down the village at this hour of the night alone?"

"No, my dear, but—"

"Say no more about it," interrupted his wife, authoritatively. "Mr. Kerl and I have been bargaining together. There was just a pound between us, and he consented to split the difference provided I got him sight of the prisoner."

Joe—with what intention our readers can readily divine—had brought a bottle of Cognac with him, the merits of which he proposed they should discuss, the hour not being yet sufficiently late for his purpose.

The liquor warmed the not very flinty heart of the parish dignitary, who began to think that after all it was better to pass the night in company, than shut up in solitary state alone.

Kerl, who had waited till the church clock struck twelve, now rose to depart.

"It is time," he observed, "that I should bid you good night."

"Why, you have not seen the prisoner yet," observed the lady.

"No more I have," replied the trader. "Time passes so pleasantly in your society, that I almost forgot what I came for."

He advanced to the door of the cell, and peering through the grating, discovered Redmond pacing its limits, restless as a caged tiger. The prisoner had recognised the voice of the smuggler, and suspecting the object of his visit, awaited impatiently the moment of action.

It came at last. Joe unbarred the door, and Redmond stalked into the outer chamber, to the terror of Bumps and his better half, who began to call lustily for assistance.

"Silence, fools!" exclaimed the smuggler, "unless you wish me to send a bullet through your brains."

As neither husband nor wife had any such desire, their cries instantly ceased.

"Here, captain!" said Joe, handing Redmond his pistols. "You will find them as pretty a pair of barkers as a gentleman need trust to; and they can bite as well as bark. But what are we to do with this land-lubber, and his petticoat commander?" he added.

"Let them take my place."

As the late prisoner and his deliverer were both well armed, resistance would have been useless. It was in vain that the constable pointed with silent dignity to the emblems of his authority, still lying crosswise upon the table. Joe kicked them over, and thrusting him and Mrs. Bumps into the cell, drew the bolts upon them.

"This way, captain," he exclaimed, "a friend is at hand."

Quitting the roundhouse, the fugitives proceeded a short distance down the narrow lane which connects Plaxted with the main road. There they found Jorrocks waiting with horses, which all three mounted rapidly.

"You have served me faithfully," said Redmond O'Neil, "and shall not find me ungrateful. One word: Katty and the child?"

"The woman has fallen into the snare," replied the wounded smuggler. "Ephraim Sleek would wheedle a bird from a tree. They are both safe at his house in Dover."

"Ride on, then!" exclaimed his employer. "This is the last night I dare pass in England."

CHAPTER VI.

Dark night, that from the eye its function takes,
The ear more quick of apprehension makes;
Wherein it doth impair the seeing sense,
It pays the hearing double recompence.

SHAKESPEARE.

THERE are few of us but have experienced the terrible re-action which follows intense excitement—felt how utterly it prostrates both our moral and physical strength, till sleep, the balmy agent ordained by Nature as a remedy, has restored their former tone.

The criminal, exhausted by the excitement of his trial, has frequently been roused from slumber to execution, and the soldier known to sleep by the roaring cannon's side, despite its thunders.

As some of our readers may feel disposed to question this last assertion, we beg leave to refer them to Dr. Philip as our authority for making it.

It was not to be wondered at that Katty, who, from the day her foster-sister had landed at Folkestone, had known nothing but sorrow, and dangers, which kept every faculty upon the stretch, believing herself and infant charge in safety beneath the roof of Ephraim Sleek, should have yielded to the demands of exhausted nature, and fallen into a sweet, refreshing sleep. The faithful creature had closed her eyes in confidence as perfect as if assured that an angel would watch over her.

Although no such assurance had been given, the angel did watch—clad, not in the gorgeous panoply of heaven, but in the simple, modest garb of the young Quakeress—who, placing no faith in her father's disinterestedness and charity, but, on the contrary, strongly suspecting his motives, resolved, if possible, to save him from the weight of additional crime. He had more than enough to answer for, as she well knew already.

The hour of midnight had passed, when Ruth crept from the chamber of Hannah. She required no lamp to guide her; every stair, turning, corner of the house were familiar to her from her childhood; in fact, it was the only home she had ever known. On entering the keeping-room she partially opened one of the shutters, and saw by the light that her parent was still occupied in the counting-house, situated in the yard at the back of the house, and completely isolated from the main building.

"It cannot be with his books," she thought; "I have the keys of the iron safe which contains them. He expects some one."

This impression was confirmed by the appearance of Ephraim, who, after gazing for an instant at the windows of the bedrooms, walked stealthily across the yard, unbarred the gates, and then retired.

"Oh! this love of gold, this fearful love of gold," she murmured. "How it clingeth to the soul of my unhappy parent; like an unwholesome weed, poisoning the growth of his better qualities, clothing him as with a curse, polluting his heart with hypocrisy, familiarising his mind with shame; He deceiveth himself with the excuse that it is for me he is gamering up wealth. Would I could convince him that a good name is a richer heritage than the dross that perisheth!"

Nearly an hour had passed, and still the speaker remained at her post, the very best she could have selected for observation, since it was impossible for any one to enter the yard, or her father to return to the house, without her knowledge.

It is not to be supposed that the reveries of Ruth all this while were entirely occupied by her father. If the truth must be told, her cousin Reuben bore no inconsiderable part in them. She pondered over in her mind his looks and words; sighed as she recollected the hour was drawing near when he would quit Dover, and that years might elapse before they met again.

"And yet why should I regret it?" she asked herself. "Providence is wiser than its creatures, and worketh all things to its ends. Reuben can never be more to me than he is at present, unless I were to act the hypocrite, and— No, no! Better his hate than his contempt! He shall never have reason to despise his cousin Ruth."

A clattering of horses broke the chain of the fair girl's meditations, and presently three men, who had dismounted at the gates, entered the yard. One was a stranger to her.

His companions were the two smugglers.

The Quakeress shuddered. She had an instinctive aversion to as well as terror of Jorrocks, who, although he had never ventured to declare his passion in direct words, had frequently startled her gentle nature by his bold regards.

"That man!" she exclaimed; "then am I sure evil is intended unto my father's guests."

Ruth remained at her post some time after Redmond O'Neil and his companions had entered the counting-house. At last she crept cautiously forth, and listened beneath the window.

"It is the price of his own soul that my father covenants for!" she mentally ejaculated, as she overheard the offers made to Ephraim Sleek by the father of the infant. "Lord, Lord! let not this sin be accomplished."

"It is arranged then, friend," said the Quaker; "at what hour," he added, addressing Jorlocks, "will the boat be off Dover?"

"By eight, at the very latest."

"Good."

"But how to get the female on board?" inquired Joe Kerl.

"I have bethought me of that," answered the Quaker. "The woman, albeit of a resolute spirit, is naturally simple and confiding: she placeth in me an absolute trust; I will persuade her that the vessel is bound for the great city of London, instead of France, and that to embark in her will be the surest means of avoiding the pursuit of the captain."

Those who were with the speaker in the counting-house pronounced the project excellent, and continued to discuss it. His daughter, however, waited to hear no more; but returning to the house, sought the chamber of Katty, whom she quickly roused from her slumber.

No sooner was his nurse aware that danger once more threatened the child of her dead foster-sister than her energy and presence of mind returned. The Irish are naturally a shrewd intelligent race, and Katty was not an exception to the rule.

"Sure harum, my good lady, will never fall on us in the house of your father? Haven't I broken bread wid him?"

"Thou hast."

"And slept beneath his roof-tree?"

"It is but too true."

Ruth covered her face for an instant with both hands, to hide the blush of shame at her parent's worldliness.

The Irishwoman eyed her sharply.

"It's myself that can't tell the meaning of yez," she observed.

"It meaneth," answered the fair Quakeress—who, although her features were pale as marble, had succeeded in mastering all other signs of emotion—"that my father loveth gold better than goodness; that he would sell thee to the enemy who pursueth thee; that even now he plotteth with him, and one who is yet more evil than themselves, to lure thee on board the vessel employed in their trade."

"The villains!"

"It is even so."

"And he wid white hairs, too! the soft-spoken Cromwellian! What will I do? Ochone, but the heart of me is weary!"

"I have warned thee," said Ruth; "and I will save thee. Canst thou place confidence," she added, "in the daughter of him that would have betrayed thee?"

Katty took both the hands of the speaker in hers, and gazed at her long and earnestly.

"I can, avourneen," she replied. "There is no desate in the heart nor a lie on the lips of yez. The tempter would nivr thry to put bad thoughts in yez. The angel that peeps from the blue eyes of yez, and watches over yez, would scare him."

"I have a friend," said the Quakeress, too sorrowful to notice the words in which the speaker expressed her confidence, "who in two hours' time leaveth Dover for the great city. Although one of our peaceful people he hath a valiant spirit and a strong arm. Wilt thou place thyself under his guidance?"

"If you answer for him."

"As for myself," replied the maiden, "as far as the will to serve thee is concerned."

"The rest, sure, is in the hands of heaven," observed Katty, "and the blessed saints who watch over us this night."

The infant was taken from the bed where it had been sleeping all this while and quickly dressed.

"Whisht! whisht! badd a burst (hold your tongue), darlin," whispered his nurse, as he sent forth a low, plaintive cry. "So young, too! But God is merciful."

On descending to the sleeping room, Ruth led Katty to the half-opened shutter, and pointed to the counting-house, from whose window the light was reflected on the damp pavement of the courtyard, showing that a heavy dew had fallen.

Finding that the child slept, Katty with a beating heart glided cautiously from the room, crossed the yard, and crept stealthily to the window of the counting-house. It was a terrible hazard: a turn of a head, the glance of an eye from those within, might have discovered her.

A very few seconds convinced her that the danger was both imminent and real. If the presence of Redmond O'Neil had not been sufficient, that of Jorlocks, whom she recognised by the red unhealed scar upon his face, would have been.

Quickly retracing her way, she rejoined Ruth in the keeping-room.

"Thou hast convinced thyself?" whispered the latter; "follow me, for we have no time to lose."

After carefully locking and bolting the back entrance to the house, to prevent any untimely discovery, the speaker led her guest into the street. The first signs of morning had already streaked the east with light, breaking the clouds of night into pale, gray, silvery masses.

Fortunately, the hour was too early for the Quakeress to be recognised, as she and her guest walked briskly on, till they emerged from the town into the high road leading to Canterbury.

"He of whom I spake will soon be here," she observed, for the first time breaking silence since they quitted the house. "I hear the jingle of the vanities which, in the shape of bells, the man Kiplin affixeth to the harness of his horses."

"Bless you!" exclaimed Katty; "ye have proved yourself the true friend. That ye may never want one or know the dark hour."

The grateful creature little imagined that the fair girl, who watched like some guardian angel over her, was already familiar with sorrow.

"I will pray for yez," she added, "and little Phelim—that's my own gossoon—shall pray for yez, too, as soon as he has the sense to make a prayer."

"In one thing, thou mayest pleasure me," observed the maiden.

"And what is that, acushla?"

"Speak not to Reuben Geldart, the friend who will accompany thee, of my father."

"Not a word," replied Katty, who perhaps divined the motives of her request. "Sure," she muttered to herself, "it is a strange thing for the dove to have been hatched in the vulture's nest."

By this time the jingling of the bells announced the near approach of the wagon, which, drawn by a team of eight strong heavy horses, emerged from the town. The fore part of the vehicle was filled with the goods; the back only being retained for the passengers.

At the period of which we write, the stage-wagon was looked upon as a very respectable although economical mode of journeying from one place to another.

Reuben Geldart, who, instead of mounting the tent-like opening at the back of the wagon, was quietly walking with the driver, felt greatly astonished on recognising his cousin.

"Ruth!" he exclaimed, and his eye sparkled joyously at what he considered a proof of her regard, "what bringeth thee from thy home at an hour so early?"

"Not the motive thou believest," answered the young Quakeress, with a demure smile, "but a work of charity. This woman hath need, not of money, for she telleth me that she is provided with the means of journeying, but of protection, and, as thou art bound unto the great city, I would recommend her to thy care."

"Willingly," answered the young man, who felt perhaps more gratified that his gentle cousin had not departed from her maidenly reserve, than if she had made an exception in his favour.

"She hath enemies," added Ruth, "who wish to separate her from the infant committed to her care."

"Fear not; whilst I have life none shall harm her."

"I doubt not thy courage, Reuben," answered the maiden; "but be prudent, for the sake of thy widowed mother. Once more fare thee well."

"The blessings of the heart go wid yez," said the grateful Katty; "for your sake I'll think better of the land of the Saxon."

"Goodness is everywhere," observed the maiden. "Fare thee well; mayest thou reach thy home in peace!"

It is unnecessary to state whether the adieux to her cousin were renewed or not. If repeated, they must have been brief; for as the wagoner gave the signal to his team to proceed, Ruth directed her steps towards the dwelling of her parent.

Evidently her absence had not been suspected, for Ephraim bade her "good morning," in his usual calm tone when they met at breakfast at the hour of seven.

Hannah had been directed by her mistress to absent herself from the keeping-room, that she might not witness the anger of her master at a discovery the moment of which was rapidly drawing near.

The Quaker, who had once or twice cast inquiring glances towards the door, at last asked of his daughter if she had seen his guest.

"The woman hath departed," answered Ruth.

"With thy knowledge?" he demanded.

"Yes."

"And assistance?"

"With both," answered the maiden, firmly, yet respectfully.

Ephraim so far forgot the tenets of the sect of which he affected to be a member, as to utter a curse of disappointment.

"Thou hast robbed me," he muttered, "of the chance of repaying the heavy losses which of late have fallen upon me."

"I have saved thee from the sin of betraying those who confided in thy promise for gold," replied his child. "Will thy soul never be cleansed from this fatal leprosy?" she added; "it is eating into thy heart; the idol thou dost worship will one day turn to ashes in thy grasp—ashes that will consume thee."

The worldly-minded parent was in no humour to be lectured by his good and exemplary child. The one engrossing passion of his nature, avarice, was disappointed, and he glared upon her with looks of surprise and hate.

"Wretch!" he muttered, grasping her fair delicate arm with his long bony fingers. "Disobedient wretch! which way hath she fled? Answer me, as thou dost hope for pardon. She cannot have gone far; and it may not be too late to set those upon her track who will overtake her."

Ruth continued silent.

"Answer me," he continued. "Thou dost not know what thy folly hath lost me—two hundred pieces, at the very least. Wilt thou see thy poor old father beggared? Answer me, as thou wouldst avoid my curse. Does not that move thee, ingrate—a father's curse?"

"Heaven will not hear it," answered his daughter, solemnly. "And when the tempest excited by the evil spirit that possesseth thee hath passed, thou wilt recall it."

"Never!" shrieked Ephraim, tearing his iron-gray hair with rage, "never! Two hundred pieces! bright, yellow, shining gold! fresh as from the mines of Ophir. So easily earned, too! But I waste time with thee; it may not prove too late to coin them yet."

He would have quitted the room, but Ruth glided quickly between him and the door.

"Father," she exclaimed, "thou shalt not do this thing. Add not to thy faults one darker than all the others. Have mercy on thyself!"

In the fury her words excited, the old man struck his child, who, like an angel, was pleading to him against himself. Not a cry escaped her; but a glance, which reminded Ephraim of her dead mother, shot from her deep blue eyes, and he became suddenly calm. The demon that possessed him for an instant stood rebuked.

"Forgive me, Ruth!" he exclaimed. "I did not mean that—it was madness, madness—thou knowest how I love thee; but the loss thy folly hath occasioned angered me. Heaven help me!" he added, passing his hand athwart his brow. "I must have been sorely tempted to strike my child—my only one."

Overcome by a feeling of shame at his unmanliness, the miser quitted the room.

Ruth meanwhile had fallen upon her knees—she was praying for her father.

(To be continued.)

LITTLE CHILDREN.

O how empty of delight,
And how full of heavy care,
Many a house would be to-night,
But for little children there!

Ah, what picture is so fair
As the homeliest cabin wall,
That is garnished with a pair
Of bright shoes and stockings small?

And what pleasant vocal sound
Sings to memory half so sweet.
As the rudest floor, whereon,
Falls the patter of bare feet?

Blessings, blessings on the beds
Whose white pillows softly bear,
Rows of little shining heads
That have never known a care.

Safely to the heavenly fold,
Bring them, whoso'er they be,
Thou, who saidst of them, of old,
"Suffer them to come to me."

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

SELF-MADE MEN.

WE propose furnishing a series of biographical sketches of self-made men. The lives of the illustrious are always attractive, but more especially interesting are the lives of men who, by their own exertions, have risen from obscurity, ignorance, and poverty, to exalted station, intellectual pre-eminence, prosperity, and fortune. There is great encouragement in all such biographies; they inculcate the lesson of perseverance, and teach us to struggle manfully in the battle of life.

GEORGE STEPHENSON, THE ENGINEER.

THE founder and, to a great extent, the inventor of the present system of locomotion, was George Stephenson—a very humble person for one half of his life, but, for the rest, recognised as a benefactor of his age, and the co-equal of Watt, Fulton, Arkwright, and Brindley. George Stephenson was born on the 9th of June, 1781, in the little village of Wylam, Durham. He was the second of a family of six children, all of whom were dependent on the exertions of the father, Robert Stephenson, familiarly called "Old Bob," a hard-working and thrifty man, who was fireman to a shaft-engine, at a salary of twelve shillings a-week.

The collier folk of the north of England are pre-eminently a migratory race. They have to follow the coal, and only wait until it is all "won" before they shift their quarters to some new pit. The Stephensons removed to Dewley Burn before George had reached his eighth year; and it was in this cold and cheerless place that the boy obtained his first employment. He was too young to find work in the colliery; but too old to remain idle. A widow woman, who had some cows that needed attention, made him the offer of twopence a day to look after them, which he gladly accepted, and this was his first start in life.

Brought up among steam-engines, it was natural that young Stephenson should regard them with extreme admiration; and that he should look forward to the day when, like his father, he would enjoy the extreme happiness of making the fire blaze beneath their hissing boilers. It was some years before he could take the first step in this direction. At length, however, his father engaged him as assistant fireman at the Dewley pit. For this, he received a shilling a day; but the money was not the great charm of his engagement. This lay in the fact that the first step towards the point of his ambition was accomplished. If a man of modest abilities and ordinary perseverance sets his mind on accomplishing a scheme of life, it is generally his own fault if he does not succeed. Stephenson was aware of this fact, and became, in consequence, habitually painstaking and steady. He neglected no opportunity of making himself thoroughly familiar with the duties of the engine-room. He studied the machinery night and day, until he knew the use of every part. A kind of personal intimacy sprang up between him and the engine, which, in the end, was certainly mutually advantageous. At the age of fifteen, he became fireman, and shortly after was appointed engineman to a colliery. "I am now a made man for life," he cried, triumphantly.

George Stephenson quickly gained the reputation of being a good mechanic, and a workman of no common penetration and forethought. He was now in his eighteenth year, very steady, and possessed of excellent practical information concerning machinery, but in other respects completely uneducated. He had never attended a school, and was unable to read or write. His time was laboriously occupied in the duties of his calling for at least twelve hours of the day; after that, he was still to be found in the engine-room, taking to pieces and cleaning his pet engine. At other times he took recreation in manly sports, and improved his physical strength. He began to feel that the want of an education was a serious bar to his future progress, and determined, with that decision of character for which he was remarkable, to remedy the deficiency. Old as he was, he went to the village school, and commenced his A B C like a little child. He made great progress, and before he had reached his nineteenth birthday he had the happiness of signing his name in a bold legible hand. Subsequently he studied arithmetic, mathematics, practical and experimental philosophy, mechanics, and similar subjects, with marked success. He had a fine memory, and an understanding easily impressed. Moreover, he was simple and modest, and never ashamed of acknowledging his ignorance. When he was twenty years of age he became brakesman at the Black Callerton Colliery, and received the best wages paid to men of his class.

In 1802 Stephenson removed to Wellington Quay, near Newcastle-on-Tyne, and was married to a young and estimable woman. Here he pursued his old steady course, working, studying, and mending shoes. Owing to an accidental insight into the mysteries of clock-making, he was able to add a new profession to his other employments. After remaining three years in Wellington, he removed to Killingworth (1804), one of the scenes of his subsequent triumphs. Here he was overtaken by a severe calamity—the death of his wife. The depression which this event occasioned induced him to accept an offer to work an engine in Scotland. After nearly a year's absence he returned to Killingworth, where his only child, a little boy (Robert Stephenson, the eminent engineer, vol. ii., p. 999), was being nursed. He had saved upwards of twenty-eight pounds in Scotland, and the arrival of this little fund was most timely. He rescued his father from pecuniary difficulties brought about by a dreadful accident. The mining districts were greatly depressed at this time, and it was with difficulty that Stephenson could procure a sufficiency of work. He allowed no means to go untried. He did all that was to be done at the colliery, repaired and made boots and shoes, cleaned clocks and watches, and even, it is said, cut out clothes for the pitmen's wives. He was stimulated to unusual exertion by the determination to provide an education for his son. A man like Stephenson, who took a pride in understanding the practical construction of the machines under his control, had, of course, many opportunities for displaying his ingenuity; but the first really important case in which his skill was severely put to the test was in remedying the defects of an engine which had defied all the talent of the best engineers in the neighbourhood, and of the maker himself. Stephenson found out the difficulty and remedied it, for which he received ten pounds, but, what was more important to him, the appointment of engineman to the colliery.

In 1812 Stephenson was promoted to the rank of enginewright, which was a source of great rejoicing to him. It placed him in a better position than heretofore; all the engines in the colliery being placed under his control. He was allowed to modify them as he thought best, and in this way introduced many valuable improvements. He turned his attention to railways and locomotives, and the idiosyncrasy of his mind was such that whatever he attempted he accomplished. He soon declared that he could make an engine much better than any which had previously existed. He was warmly encouraged by the owners of the colliery, funds were advanced for the work, and, after much labour and anxiety, he completed his engine, which was placed on the Killingworth Railway, July 20, 1814. The trial of the engine was completely successful, and from that time dates the public life of George Stephenson.

Stephenson's reputation was, however, purely local; but it was of service to him. When a number of gentlemen undertook to construct a railway from Darlington to Stockton-on-Tees, it was to be worked by horse power; but, on the representation of Stephenson, it was agreed that a locomotive should be tried. Still, however, the projectors considered it so bold an idea that they were doubtful about carrying it out; and, while they appointed Stephenson as their engineer, at a salary of £300 per annum, they contented themselves with introducing a clause into their railway bill, premising that locomotives might be used at some future time.

The trial of the locomotive answered admirably, but prejudice was strong; and on the Stockton and Darlington Railway—the first railway ever opened in the world—horses continued to be used for a considerable period. But in the race of progress the steam horse beat the living horse, and from the locomotive-works of Stephenson such iron steeds were sent forth as no fabulist in his wildest dreams had ever imagined. Railways multiplied. Canal proprietors, who saw that competition was in vain, got up a strong opposition; nevertheless, they were at length compelled to give way, and broad and narrow gauge began to spread like a network over the land. Stephenson was the leader and foremost man in everything connected with railways. He, of all men, justly deserved the name of railway-king. When a prize was offered for the best engine, he carried it off triumphantly. His reputation and his fortune were made. Every projected railway company endeavoured to obtain his name in connection with their efforts; and his fame extended beyond the limits of his own country, and became illustrious throughout Europe and America.

Of all the brilliant names that add lustre to our annals, as those of self-made men, that of George Stephenson shines pre-eminently. He was absolutely and entirely the architect of his own fortune, working his way up by diligent application and steady industry, from cow-keeping, on twopence a day, to be a companion of the wise, the worthy, and the wealthy, and to be recognised as one of the brightest ornaments of his age and country.

He died on the 12th of August, 1848, aged sixty-seven.

LESSONS IN DRAWING.—No. II.

10. The pupil may now practise the drawing of lines, gradually nearer to each other, until they form an even tint without touching. In this trial, he will begin to feel the profit of his former labour; and, according to his success, can judge of his advancement in previous lessons. Two examples are given in the accompanying illustration (fig. 5). In the second example are lines slanting, upright, crossing each other, &c. A continued line or two, of each variety, is advised for practice. First, draw a set, as at A, entirely across the page; then proceed, in like manner, with B and C. Having succeeded in producing these separately with some degree of accuracy, begin again, and draw a set A; that done, proceed to cross them with a set of lines slanting in the direction of C, which will produce an effect as seen at D; and again, by crossing with the perpendicular lines B, will be produced E. In the case of F, first draw the lines as at A, and then a fainter interline between each one. In like manner, with advantage, you may proceed with B and C; only making them somewhat wider apart, to allow space for the interline.

11. Before proceeding with the examples (fig. 6), attention should be recalled to what has been said in reference to fixing points, &c. (9). It will now be of much assistance to have paper ruled in squares; and if this can be done by the pupil himself it will be all the better. If example 8 has been properly practised and understood, the following will be comparatively easy. In all, the lines form right angles, except the last, which presents, where they cross each other, what is called a lozenge.

12. In drawing example (fig. 7), first fix the points, and connect them as above; then proceed without them endeavouring to determine their position by careful observation, and then expressing each line and figure with decision, unaided by the points beyond their imaginary existence.

13. The draughtsman should always, as far as practicable, keep his work before him; as in writing, we progress from the top to the bottom of the page. Of course, in drawing the general outline of an object, this would be, in a measure, impossible and improper; but, in forming tints, especially with the pen, care should be taken to avoid working over what has been done already, and which is, in some degree, the guide to what is to be done, as the pen or pencil, partially covering the lower lines, produces

Fig. 5.

Fig. 6.

Fig. 7.

uncertainty. For example, it is easier to draw one line parallel to another, having the given line above the pen (as in fig. 8), than if it were below it (fig. 9).

Fig. 8.

Fig. 9.

The simple experiment made by the learner will at once convince him of this; and, in like manner, he will find he can draw lines to express tints or shadows with much greater facility and accuracy by keeping what he has already done before him (fig. 10), than by attempting (as in fig. 11) to overreach it. Besides, the liability of running or blotting one line into another unnecessarily is avoided.

Fig. 10.

Fig. 11.

FRENCH LESSONS;

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH

[We beg to call the attention of the students of our French Lessons to the notice in our Editorial Table, of the re-issue of "Cassell's French Dictionary."]

CHAPTER XXXIII.

"THE last addition you made to your vocabulary, Robert," observed George, "consisted of the names of servants. To-day I wish you to write down in French a tolerable quantity of kitchen utensils. Our neighbours have rather strange names for some of these things, and you must learn them in order to understand them. The direction and use of these utensils generally fall to the ladies' department with us in England, but as the gentlemen have to pay for them, both in England and in France, they may as well know their names.

"I shall have some difficulty in recollecting all these," said Robert, apparently amazed at the number of names dictated to him; "and, is it possible that all these are necessary kitchen utensils?"

"If you read that list over to your mother," replied George, "she will tell you she has almost every one of them in her kitchen."

"But a 'skillet,' in French, un poëlon; I never heard of a skillet."

"'Skillet' is only another name for a small saucepan," said the instructor.

"How is it," asked Robert, "that in the bill of fare you speak of un roti, roast meat, and yet, in this list of kitchen utensils, there is no mention made of a spit?"

"You show some discernment by that question," replied George, "and my answer will tend to show that, with all its beauties, French cannot justly be called a rich language. 'Skewer' and 'spit,' are both represented by the word broche. I can assure you that, even with the wood fires, the French contrive to roast meat and poultry remarkably well; but they have no prejudice against baking meat, and the oven for which you wrote down the word rôtissoire, is a cooking-oven. The baker's oven is called un four. However, it is in stew-pans, des casseroles, that most of their delicacies are prepared; and charcoal, du charbon de bois is the fuel employed to cook with. The French employ much more of the culinary art in preparing vegetables than we think necessary. Vegetables simply boiled, viz., ou naturel, do not suit their taste. They cook them up with cream, gravy, fish, flesh, and fowl, and succeed in concocting what we should call made-dishes out of the simple produce of the garden. Going back to the 'kettle,' I must remark to you that the French have rather an odd idiom connected with tea and the kettle. Tea, as we generally take it, they call thé à la bouilloire, and eggs simply boiled in their shells they call des œufs à la coque. Une fontaine is the word applied to a common 'fountain,' as well as to a 'filter,' and torchon is the only word for 'dish-cloth' and 'duster.' This is another proof of the poverty of the French language; but, on the other hand, observe and admire its comprehensiveness. The French can say a good deal in a few words. You have a proof of that in the beginning and at the end of the portion of the vocabulary you have written out to-day. La batterie de cuisine—why, this phrase conjures up whole sets of pots, kettles, pans, and all the members of that numerous family. Then la vaisselle is equally expressive of a long range of dishes, plates, cups, saucers, vegetable-dishes, butter-boats, and what not; and, by-the-way, I may as well tell you that for the significant expression 'what not,' in English, the best French phrase is 'que sais-je?'

"In writing the following exercise, Robert, bear in mind that the object of an adjective may be a substantive, or a verb preceded by a preposition. Some adjectives have no object because they have in themselves a complete signification, as sage, wise, brave, brave, courageux, courageous.

"Some adjectives must have an object because it is necessary to restrict them, to give them a determined signification, as disposé, willing, prêt, ready, capable, able.

"Other adjectives have sometimes an object, sometimes none. They have an object when what we wish to express requires restriction. They have none when employed in a general sense, as fâché, sorry, content, contented, sensible, sensible.

"In the use of adjectives, Robert, you must avoid giving any which are not authorised by custom.

"We must look after our travellers now, Robert," said George. "We shall find them still discussing the early history of Paris."

"And I am very much interested in this discussion," replied the pupil.

CONTINUATION OF LE VOYAGE À PARIS.

The kings of the third race added a great deal to Paris. Les rois de la troisième race ont beaucoup augmenté Paris.

It was under their rule that the town gradually assumed those proportions which have brought it to its present state of importance. C'était sous leur gouvernement que la ville commençait à prendre par degrés les accroissements qu'elle a amenés au point où nous la voyons aujourd'hui.

And when did the faubourgs begin to be united by intermediate buildings? Et quand est-ce que les faubourgs commenceront à se réunir par des constructions intermédiaires?

From the time we mentioned. A partir de cette époque même.

Then the faubourgs began to have inclosures which became more extensive from age to age. Alors les faubourgs furent renfermés dans des enceintes qui s'élargirent de siècle en siècle.

What king had the first rampart raised? Quel roi éleva la première enceinte?

Philip Augustus. This king took the greatest pains to adorn the capital, and he had part of it paved in 1184. Philippe Auguste. Ce roi apporta les plus grandes soins à l'embellissement de la capitale, et il en fit paver une partie en 1184.

Who established the university? Qui établit l'université?

Some say that the university was founded by Robert of Sorbon, confessor to Louis IX. Les uns disent que l'université fut fondée par Robert de Sorbon, confesseur de Louis Neuf.

And what do others say?
That the establishment of the university took place under Louis the Young, and mention is made of the great protection that his successor, Philip Augustus, granted to the institution.

But is not the university called the Sorbonne?

Certainly it is, and it is clear it is so called in honour of Robert of Sorbon.

But it is evident the university existed before the time of the above-mentioned confessor.
I am of your opinion.

Et que disent les autres?
Que l'établissement de l'université eut lieu sous Louis le Jeune, et on parle de la protection éclatante que son successeur, Philippe Auguste, accorda à cette institution.

Mais n'est-ce pas qu'on ap-pelle l'université la Sor-bonne?

C'est ce qu'il y a de certain, c'est que c'est en honneur de Robert de Sorbon qu'on l'appelle ainsi.

Mais c'est tout clair que l'université existait avant le temps dudit confesseur.
Je suis de votre avis.

FRENCH PRONUNCIATION—continued.

In, em, am, om, im, placed at the end of some foreign words, lose their nasality, and are pronounced as if followed by an e mute (the e prefixed to n or m having a grave accent over it), although the next word begins with a consonant, or the word itself is followed by a sign of punctuation, as,

Jérusalem, which is pronounced	4 11 1 5 0
Jé-ru-sa-lème	7 5 0
hymen, " "	hy-mé-na
Abraham, " "	1 1 1 0
A-bra-ha-me	4 7 0
Sélim, " "	Sé-li-me

In the word Chrétienté, Christianity, the syllable en, although followed by a consonant, loses its nasal sound, and this word is pronounced as if it were written Chrê-ti-en-né-té; and so in the case of all words which are formed from others ending with the nasal sounds en, ien.

6th. Whenever the letter i is followed by mm or nn, the double sound of these two letters should be heard in the pronunciation; as in immense, which is sounded im-men-se; inné, which is sounded in-né; the only exception is the word innocence, and those derived from it, which are pronounced as if written i-n-no-cen-ce.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON XXXII.

METALLOIDS.

OXYGEN.

819. What is oxygen?—Oxygen is a transparent and colourless gas, a little heavier than the atmosphere.

820. How abundant is it?—It is much the most abundant substance in nature. One fourth of the air, one ninth of the ocean, and more than one half of the solid earth, is oxygen.

821. How is it prepared?—By heating the rusts or oxides of certain metals.

822. Explain the figure?—The figure represents oxide of mercury heated in a tube to expel its oxygen.

Fig. 51.

823. What remarkable property has the oxygen thus obtained?—Metals will burn in it.

824. How is the experiment made?—By lighting a bit of match attached to iron wire, and then placing it in the phial.

825. What happens to the iron?—It takes fire and burns with brilliant scintillations.

826. What becomes of the oxygen?—It combines with the iron, forming an oxide of iron, and falls in molten globules to the bottom of the phial.

827. What happens to a newly-extinguished taper, held in a phial of oxygen?—If a little spark remains on the wick, it is re-lighted.

Fig. 52.

828. What happens to ignited phosphorus under the same circumstances?—It burns with a light so brilliant that the eye can scarcely bear it.

829. What becomes of the phosphorus and oxygen?
—They unite to form white fumes of phosphoric acid, which remain in the phial.

830. What happens to ignited charcoal in oxygen?
—It burns with extreme brilliancy.

831. What becomes of the charcoal and oxygen in this experiment?—They unite to form gaseous carbonic acid.

832. What happens to charcoal when it burns in ordinary air?—The same thing as if it were burned in pure oxygen.

833. Why is the combustion less brilliant?—Because but one fifth of the air is oxygen.

834. What happens to hard coal, wood, and all combustible substances, when they burn in the air?—
All combine with its oxygen, and pass off as invisible gases and vapours.

835. What happens to wood and leaves when they decay and disappear?—Precisely the same thing.

836. What may such decay be therefore called?—
A slow combustion.

837. What similar change occurs in the blood?—
Part of it undergoes a similar slow combustion.

838. What supports this combustion?—The oxygen taken into the lungs.

839. What becomes of the invisible gases and vapours which are formed in the combustion?—They are breathed out from the lungs.

840. What happens finally to the invisible gases and vapours which are produced in combustion and respiration?—They are converted by living plants into new wood, leaves, flowers, and fruit.

841. What office has the oxygen of the air thus served?—That of a carrier of oxygen.

CHLORINE.

842. What is chlorine?—Chlorine is a yellowishgreen gas of peculiar odour, about two and a half times as heavy as the air.

843. What common substance contains it?—Common salt.

844. Where does chlorine, then, exist in great abundance?—In salt mines and the ocean.

845. How is it most rapidly made?—
By pouring sulphuric acid on "bleaching powder."

846. What is bleaching powder?—Lime which has been made to absorb chlorine.

847. What is the use of the acid in making chlorine?—It combines with the lime, and sets the chlorine at liberty.

848. Mention some properties of chlorine.—It combines eagerly with metals, and bleaches vegetable colours.

849. Illustrate its combination with metals.—Powdered antimony sprinkled into this gas takes fire immediately.

850. What becomes of the antimony and chlorine?—They unite to form chlo-ride of antimony.

851. What occurs if the metal sodium is placed in chlorine?—The two combine to form common salt.

852. What happens when a rag moistened with camphire is immersed in a phial of chlorine?—It is immediately inflamed, with the production of dense black smoke.

853. Why?—Camphor is composed of hydrogen and carbon; the former unites with the chlorine, and produces the flame, while the latter separates as smoke.

854. How may cloth be bleached by chlorine?—
By wetting it and hanging it in the gas.

855. Why is it necessary to wet it?—Water contains oxygen, which is required in the process.

856. Why is oxygen required?—It is required to burn up the colouring matter of the cloth.

857. How can the oxygen act thus while imprisoned as part of the water?—It cannot; the chlorine sets it at liberty.

858. How does it do this?—By combining with the hydrogen, which is the other constituent of the water.

859. What does the oxygen do when set at liberty?
—It gradually burns up the colouring matter of the cloth.

860. Why is chlorine used as a disinfectant?—
It destroys noxious vapours in the air.

861. To what may its particles be likened in this case?—To birds of prey, that fly forth to seize the impurities of the atmosphere.

862. In what form is it used for this purpose?—
As chloride of lime, which allows the chlorine to escape gradually into the air.

ACTON SMEE AYRTON, ESQ., M.P.

THE hurricane which swept over the waters of political life on the great Chinese question in 1857, stranded several noble vessels that had weathered many a storm, and obliged others to put into port and refit for further service. When Lord Palmerston threw himself on the country, the result was all that he or his most devoted admirers could have desired.
Out went the men who had opposed his measures, and in came those who promised to support him in carrying on the war with the utmost vigour. The tables were soon turned, but for the time Palmerston was eminently successful. While parliament gained some valuable members, it lost others who had done good service to the state. But the public, if for awhile it was forgetful of benefits received, and turned its back on tried friends, was soon ready to acknowledge their services, and to send them back again as the champions of freedom, and to win fresh laurels in St. Stephens.

On the occasion to which we have alluded, the borough of the Tower Hamlets—one of the most extensive and important of the metropolitan constituencies—excluded one of its members. Sir William Clay, Bart., who had represented the borough for five-and-twenty years, was rejected, and Acton Smee Ayrton, Esq., whose portrait we have much pleasure in presenting, was elected in his stead. At the official declaration of the poll, Sir W. Clay expressed his strong conviction that the feeling of the voters was still friendly towards him, and assured them that his defeat would never extinguish the deep gratitude he felt for the confidence they had so long reposed in him.

The political sentiments of Sir W. Clay and Mr. Ayrton closely approximate. Sir William is a liberal—in favour of extension of the suffrage, the ballot, and triennial parliaments. Mr. Ayrton is a thorough-going reformer, more of a radical than the late member—also in favour of an extended suffrage, short parliaments, and vote by ballot. Since his return he has devoted himself indefatigably to the business of the house, in advocating those measures which, on his election, he pledged himself to support.

Mr. Ayrton is the son of Frederick Ayrton, Esq., formerly of Gray's Inn, and late of Bombay. His mother was the only child of the late Lieutenant-Colonel Nugent. He was born at Kew in 1816. He has devoted himself to the legal profession, and was called to the bar by the society of the Middle Temple. In 1852 he unsuccessfully contested the Tower Hamlets with his present colleague, Charles Salisbury Butler, Esq., also a liberal. It was in April, 1857, that Mr. Ayrton was first returned for the borough.

One of the most important measures proposed in the last session of parliament—namely, the Equalisation of Metropolitan Poor-rates—was introduced to the House by Mr. Ayrton. In the course of his remarks, he drew the attention of the house to the obvious difference which existed in this respect between town and country. The supply of labouring industry in the metropolis is kept up by importations from the country, and the fluctuations of the population render it extremely onerous on the ratepayers—strikingly different from those country parishes where families often reside for generations in one place. In our metropolitan parishes, a few yards' distance may make a difference of double or treble in the rates. In one parish, where the wealthy reside, there may be scarce any poor to support; and in another, not a stone's-throw distant, the poor may vastly preponderate. The division between parishes is purely artificial, and may be, it is generally admitted, altered without any difficulty or serious inconvenience. Mr. Ayrton's plan for remedying existing defects is founded on the original statute of Elizabeth, by which the poor-law was established. That statute provides that if there should be an over assessment for the poor in any parish, the justices of the peace shall make a rate on any other parish they think more able to contribute within the hundred: And if it shall be proved that within the hundred there is no such parish, they shall search for it within the county, and compel it to pay its quota towards the expenses. But the metropolis being in four counties, it is difficult to apply this ancient statute; and Mr. Ayrton suggested that a board might be formed of members of the magisterial bench, whose business it should be to entertain all questions that might arise in effecting a combination of the richer and poorer parishes.

Whatever opinion may be entertained of Mr. Ayrton's scheme, that some alterations are desirable will be generally admitted. A uniform basis of poor-law assessment is most important, and, in bringing the question before Parliament, Mr. Ayrton has proved himself not only mindful of his own constituents, but has acted as the representative of all London.

BRAZIL NUTS.

Most of our readers have seen a Brazil nut. They are hawked about our London streets in barrowfuls, and have their virtues advertised by strength of lungs. They are very cheap and very common, and, supposing your digestive organs to be healthy, are by no means disagreeable. But what are they? What a question! Brazil nuts, of course—the chestnut of America. Is it so? Are not both names equally erroneous? The nature of the fruit is not that of the chestnut or walnut; for it is produced by a tree entirely different from either.

The dimensions of the Brazil nut trees are truly colossal: they attain a height of nearly one hundred feet; they are found in South America, especially in Para, Brazil, and on the banks of the Orinoco, where they are said to form extensive forests. There is no doubt that the fruit called Brazil nuts is the actual production of these trees; the natives call them juiva; the Portuguese give them the name of castanas de Maranon; the Brazilians call them cupucaya; but in England and North America they are invariably named Brazil nuts, and this appellation we may as well preserve, as being the most general and most common.

The Brazil nut tree was for a long period unknown to European botanists; but it was known that this fruit was used very extensively in the southern continent of the New World. We are indebted to those eminent travellers, Humboldt and Bonpland, for the first description ever given of this interesting production.

The trunk of the tree is straight and cylindrical, measuring about three feet in diameter; the bark is of a grayish colour, and of close texture. At some distance the tree resembles a chestnut. The branches are very long, some of them reaching from the summit almost to the ground, and they are thickly covered with leaves. The flowers are of a yellowish white, the stems white, bearing clusters which are remarkable for their sweet smell. The calyx is tubular, and contains six divisions; the corolla has six petals.

THE LEAF AND FRUIT OF THE BRAZIL NUT TREE.

The fruit in its natural state, as represented in our engraving, presents the appearance of a massive sphere, about five inches in diameter. This sphere is divided into four compartments, each containing several nuts, imbedded in a soft green substance. The outer shell of the fruit is rough and hard, about a third of an inch in thickness. The interior compartments are formed of a membranous substance, and each division contains six or eight nuts, attached to the central partition by their lower extremity. Their length is from an inch and a half to two inches, their form is an unequal triangle, their shell is rugged, and of a light brown colour. The fruit which is contained within is triangular in form, white in colour, and of the same character as that of the almond, good to eat while fresh, but turning rancid very rapidly, owing to the quantity of oil which it contains.

The Brazil nut trees—Bertholletia as they are sometimes called, in honour of the illustrious Berthollet—are amongst the most interesting productions of the New World, and they are as readily cultivated in the warmer climates of America, as chestnuts and almonds are in Europe. These nuts are palatable when fresh, and contain a considerable quantity of oil. An excellent chocolate is also manufactured from them, and they are, therefore, in every respect a very valuable fruit.

THE BALANCE OF POWER AT THE FIRESIDE.

A Tale, in Three Parts.

CHAPTER X.

THE NEW STEWARD.

It is not easy, nor is it necessary, to ascertain how Mr. Barty's visitor of the day before came to know the internal arrangements of the Gascoigne family.

There is a faculty that looks like clairvoyance or second sight in these matters which cannot be denied, but which can as little be profitably discussed by the uninitiated.

Our readers will recollect many such facts in their experience or observation, where a thief has appeared to be almost miraculously endowed with very convenient intelligence, which it would have cost an honest man immense trouble and great expense to come at.

And so it turned out, that while one of Mr.

Harding's eyes had been upon the hot sausages and mashed potatoes, another eye had been taking the measure of a pane of glass, or the thickness of a shutter in the kitchen window.

For when Miss Frances Gascoigne was in the middle of her first sleep, having arrived in town at a late hour, worn out with a journey which a lady would undergo now-a-days before breakfast and think nothing of it, and when all the house was wrapped in a very satisfactory slumber, the latch of the lady's bedroom door was turned with a click, which, if it didn't open the door, opened the eyes and the ears of the occupant with most unpleasant rapidity.

"Who's there?" cried Fanny Gascoigne.

Fanny Gascoigne's only misfortune and only drawback in any respect lay in the fact that she was her brother's sister. She resembled him in nothing else but the having had the same father and mother.

The new baronet was deformed; his sister's figure, though (we should rather say because) only of the middle height, was faultless.

Lionel's face was worse than his figure; Fanny's was gentle, intelligent, fair, and pretty.

The brother's temper we have no further need to describe; the sister's may be inferred from the fact that she endured even Lionel's without a complaint, and, so far as he saw, without thinking the worse of him.

"Who's there?" said Miss Gascoigne.

"Open the door, Fanny," said a voice outside, which sounded so familiar, that she was out of bed in a moment, and, having turned the bolt, was in again as quickly.

"What can be the matter, Lionel?" she asked, in a hurried, breathless sort of voice, when she had laid herself down. "Are you ill, dear?"

"Rather," said the voice, in the same key as before.

The room was pitch-dark, and the curtains all round the bed, in the bad fashion of those times.

But there was something, either in the tread of the visitor or in the fancy of the young lady, that made her start up at the word "rather;" and she drew back the curtain, and looked out.

"Lionel!"

In a moment there was turned upon her the full light of a bull's-eye, and a man rushed up to her, and put his hand—not harshly—over her mouth.

"Speak, and you're a dead woman!" said our friend; for it was no other than he who had heard the edifying discourse, recorded in the last chapter, about the travelling habits of the family.

A smothered shriek, through the burglar's fingers, followed the warning.

A terrible blow on the head followed the shriek.

And in almost less time than it takes to write it,—the jewels of several locked cabinets found their way into the pockets of Harding, and the villain was on his way down stairs, leaving the lady stunned in her bed.

Sir Lionel had heard the cry proceeding from the direction of his sister's room, but prudently resolved to be still.

He knew that he had the keys of the most valuable of the plate, and, after listening for awhile in great agony on his own account, he heard the strange step descend the stairs, and turned himself round and went fast off to sleep—merely saying:

"Daresay it's Barty—daresay it's Barty."

Of course, the next morning saw everything valuable and portable not to be found; and Miss Gascoigne—thanks to her valiant and affectionate brother—was discovered by her maid lying sensible, but dangerously injured, at the usual hour for calling her.

An interesting little boy had been slipped through the aperture surveyed and arranged by Mr. Harding on the day before; the principal himself had then entered, and finished the business.

CHAPTER XI.

THE OLD STEWARD.

THE money loss to poor old Weston, when he was discharged from the Gascoigne service, was the least loss of all—though that was more than he could afford.

He had grown up and grown old in the family. The late baronet had done nothing without consulting Weston. Weston knew every stick and stone on the estate. Everybody liked him, for he had been everybody's friend.

"Well, bo'," said one of the labourers on the farm to another, when the old steward's dismissal became known—"well, bo', and what do ye think o' this, eh?"

"Think!" said the other; "I'm fairly stammered, that's what I am. 'It's doubled me up,' as the sayin' is, for sure."

"What's it for, Jem; do ye know what it's for?"

"For! It's his nasty temper—this new un's nasty temper, that's what it's for. Old Weston's too good for him, bo'; good for ever! we shall all cut 'fore long, see if we doesn't."

And so, in their different ways, the entire body of the Gascoigne dependents condemned and deplored the baronet's treatment of old Weston.

They came, in twos and threes, to the White House; whether to ask questions or to say "Good-bye," they hardly knew themselves.

One man, a game-keeper, with whom Weston had had more occasion to find fault than, perhaps, with any one else on the property, came one evening just as it was getting dusk, and rapped at the door.

It so happened that Aunt Susan was just coming down the stairs that ascended from the passage at the moment, so she opened the door as she passed.

"Well, Bennett," said Aunt Susan, "and how does the world use you, eh?"

The gamekeeper took off his hat, and seemed about to speak; but, instead of speaking, he began to twist his hat round with both hands, and looked down on the ground.

"Come to say 'good bye,' Bennett, eh? Well, this is a bad job for a-many of us, isn't it? You didn't expect this, I dare say?"

And the honest fellow turned half round, as if he were going away without a single word; and putting his lips very tight together, he began to push his wrist very hard into first one eye and then the other, but was evidently rather ashamed that Aunt Susan should see him do it.

"This bain't all true, for sure, Mrs. Susan?" he said at last, looking quite the other way.

"There's not a chice o' doubt about it, Bennett, that I know of; but it's stamman cruel to us all, I think."

"I came, m'm, to ask if Mr. Weston would be so good—"

And here the gamekeeper made another breakdown of it, and fairly turned his back on Aunt Susan.

At last he got out, that he came, on behalf of a good many others beside himself, to beg the favour of Mr. Weston's allowing them to give him a farewell supper before he left, as they couldn't bear to think of his going off without a word, and they didn't like to take the liberty, all of them, of coming to the house.

Just then old Weston himself chanced to be crossing the passage.

"Hallo, Aunt Susan! courtin' in the dark, eh? Oh, for shame!"

"Now, now, John, come here, come here, and see an old friend."

"Step in, Bennett, step in, and tell your story to Mr. Weston."

And so the steward welcomed the visitor very cordially, and heard the proposal; but, having heard it, he very kindly and very gratefully declined it.

"It's very good of all of ye, Bennett, I'm sure, very good. It makes it a deal easier going, when folks look at it in this light, sure enough it does. But, on thinkin' of it, it won't do—it won't do. You'd all do yourselves more harm than you'd do me good. He'd never forgive one of ye. Ye don't know him as I do, Bennett. Give my very best thanks to 'em, and say I thank 'em all the same. But it's kinder to say no; 'tis, indeed."

And from that decision Weston was not to be moved.

The gamekeeper was admitted to a hearty shake of the hand, and went his way, without mustering more than a very thick "God bless ye, sir, and all belongin' to ye!"

"And yet," said John, as he rejoined the little circle in the keeping-room, "there isn't a soul on the property that I've blown up as often as I have that self-same Sam Bennett!"

And so, like the rest of us in this world of mingled bitters and sweets, did faithful John comfort himself under the one parting with the butcher of little Biscuit, by remembering the partings with Sam Bennett and a score of men who owed him just as little.

CHAPTER XII.

WINNIE.

IT was some few weeks after the family at the White House had settled down, under this sense of cruel injury, and yet under the genuine alleviation we have described, that little Clara sat in the garden, keeping watch and ward over Winnie, who lay sprawling and kicking away on the grass.

Is it the love of children, or is it the love of authority, or is it the love of being considered above one's real age, that makes a little thing of two or three years old aspire to be the nurse and the protectress of the baby?

Whatever it is, there are few sights more amusing than that of one infant playing the adult with another—raking up all the little condescending words that have scarcely ceased to be spoken to itself, and applying them to "little sissy," or "baby boy."

Clara was just old enough to begin to show some of this curious patronage towards Winnie; and, as the younger child stretched its little plump limbs in the warm sun that day, and doubled its little fists in a very pugnacious manner for so innocent a time of life, Miss Clara would stoop from her small chair, and tickle and shake her, and make her laugh in the true nurse-maid style; assuring her, though hardly able to hush the words, that she was her "own p'essious 'tittle Winnie;" and saying a great number of other equally complimentary and favourable things, one after another.

And a very great lady and a very old woman Miss Clara felt, we can assure you.

She was in the height of her power when Aunt Susan appeared at the window, and told her it was time to come in; saying that she was herself coming down to fetch the junior mersel, either to a meal or to bed, as the case may have been.

Clara no sooner heard that than she put forth all her tiny strength, and lifted up the "p'essious 'tittle Winnie" from the ground, and began to stagger under her load towards the door whence Aunt Susan was to issue forth.

The child had managed to reach the threshold in safety, Winnie chuckling almost as much as herself—no doubt at the excellence of the joke—when Clara swayed over suddenly to one side in her tottering career, and her feet catching the scraper, the poor little things both rolled down together, the baby falling undermost, and its miniature nurse upon her.

The worst of it was, that the fall was exactly on the sharp edge of the stone step, which made the accident all the worse to the one who was least able to bear it.

At all events, Winnie's cries were the most piercing, and Clara seemed more frightened than hurt.

Tumbling about, however, is a destiny to which children are generally considered to be appointed. And no more notice was taken of this tumble, after a few minutes, than nurses commonly take.

Clara was duly rebuked for her precocious effort—poor little Winnie's eyes were wiped with Aunt Susan's clean white apron; and then her little sobbing face was buried in Aunt Susan's bosom, and she was rocked to and fro to a very familiar tune, and to the equally familiar words about the lady with rings on her fingers and bells on her toes, and in a few minutes Winnie was asleep.

How little dreamed that tiny sleeper of the work done that day within her soft and slender frame!

Did no angel whisper to her of the future, or point her, as she slept, to the black cloud that gathered then above her? None!

She slept; and when she woke, she had forgotten—so had Clara—so had every one forgotten—the tumble on the step.

"All alone, then—all alone, Winnie!" said Roland to his little one, a month or two after the accident, as he dandled the baby on his knee, and pretended to make the child stand up before him on his lap.

And the father put his hand on the baby's back, supporting it, as he thought, when, there rang through the White House a cry that went to every heart, and even little Clara came toddling up to Roland, and asking what was the matter with her little pet.

It was the first symptom of a deep abscess forming against the spine where the blow had been. Winnie was pronounced a cripple for many a long month, and was kept recumbent.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE GOOD OLD TIMES.

WHERE all this while was the meek and silly tradesman, who had left his family in the midst of their deepest distress, which leaving, however, was, in fact, the kindest thing he could do?

Where was Mr. Peter Blugman?

It is not likely that he kept any journal of every day's proceedings, at least it is not among the memoranda from which this history is compiled.

But, certain it is, that a few months before the accident occurred down in Suffolk to little Winnie, and just about the time of Old Weston's interview with Bennett, Peter came upon a very promising and a very congenial opening for obtaining a livelihood, which it is our duty to report.

He had been living, since the distraint, and since the death (the former of which events he hardly knew of, he was so drunk; and the latter of which he knew nothing of, and could only guess at, which most likely he never took the trouble to do)—he had been living by that very common London method, anyhow: one day, holding a gentleman's horse; the next, locking a wheel going down hill to save the driver the trouble of dismounting; the next, lending a turn aboard some of the lighters of the river; in fact, he lived anyhow, if living it was.

"Here's to ye, my hearty," said a very rough-looking, muscular customer, addressing Peter, one day, at the bar of a low beershop somewhere in the neighbourhood of the docks, about Tower-hill.

"Same to you, and many on 'em," said Mr. Blugman, as he took up his share of the beer they were splitting between them, for some joint job or other.

"Werry salt, this, my dear," said the other man, whose name was Tim Grady, as he drained the pewter, and put it down in another wet circle on the wet counter. "Werry salt, ye haven't pickled yer pigs in this 'ere malt, have ye, my dear?" he went on, addressing the slattern who acted barmaid; "bless'd if it doesn't make one wuss, 'stead o' quenchin', don't it, pardner?"

"Can't say as I find it," said Peter; "tell ye the truth, ain't had a blessed drop this four days, so, yer see, fresh or salt, it come rayther welcomer to me than it may to rich coves like some people."

And Peter winked at his mate.
"Lor, bless ye!" said Tim; "yer ain't ever been a greengrocer, 'av ye? I should ha' thought so, raly; yer'e so precious vardiint this mornin'. On'y wants a second go, my hinnocent. Come, miss, fill again, and I'll pay."

And so—Peter a little confused—they both laughed at the joke, which, by-the-by, may have been no joke at all, if our authorities on publichouses ever speak the truth.

"Ain't had no wet for four days! Why, where a' ye been a-mournin' and lamentin' arter that 'ere fashion?" asked Tim.

"Times werry bad," said Peter—"werry, wuss an' wuss."

"Gammon!" said the other, burying his nose in another pull at the beer.

"Wish it was—bless'd if I don't!"

And Mr. Blugman spoke in a very depressed tone.

"Now," said Tim Gradly, as they walked along towards the water side, and presently sat themselves down on a flight of wretched old steps, out of everybody's hearing; "now, if all this as yer've been a-tellin' me is gospel (an' why shouldn't it be?), I don't mind tryin' to put a thing in your way, that'll keep yer from goin' four days without liquor, at all events."

"Ay!" said Peter; "yer don't say so?"

"True as 'ere we sits; but 'tain't done in a jiffy, old feller, yer know, nor yet without a sort of judgmatical-lookin' into, in course."

"Course not," said Peter.

"No; there's one or two things as must come first. Take one on 'em: first of all, yer don't mind swearin' a little, I s'pose: by-the-by, that ain't fust, name comes fust; don't think ye've obleeged me with your name."

"Peter—Peter Blugman."

"That's the real one—gennivine, I s'pose?"

"Honour bright."

"Then we must call ye—what? S'pose we say, 'The Doctor.' They call me 'The Chancellor'—that's my name. Anythin' in the 'varsal world but P. B. and T. G. Twig it?"

"Course," said the Doctor.

"Well, now then, ye don't mind takin' an oath on double-edged knife, I s'pose, along o' three or four of our kids, to keep yer mouth shut at proper times, to share and share alike, and third (as the parsons say), to go and come as our captin' thinks fit—eh? Do yer mind that ere?"

"Not a ha'porth, if you've been and done it all."

"Each an' every, long ago," said the Chancellor.

"Then, I'm your man—leastways, I see nothin' agin it."

Let us all be very thankful, good reader, that, although London certainly contains plenty of "Chancellors" and plenty of "Doctors," like our two friends in the river steps that day, their horrid occupation's gone, and will never come back. If we put on record the following conversation, we do it that we may every one nurse gratefully the sweet reflection, how completely our wise and wholesome laws have long ago removed all temptation to the particular crimes by which Peter Blugman was promised larger allowances of London beer.

It was after the Doctor had gone through a very imposing ceremony, and been introduced to several other gentlemen with equally fanciful titles, that the two new friends were again walking together, towards evening of the next day.

"I can't do better," said the Chancellor, "than tell ye of a spree that me and three o' my pals 'ad only ast week."

"Cut along," said the Doctor.

"Snatchin's no joke, I can tell yer, though some folks thinks it so precious easy. Well, we'd got orders, ye see, for more articles in our partic'lar line han we could perduce. And so, 'av'ing heard of a opeful sort o' case—black job, yer know—as 'ad appened down in sitch a churchyard (shan't tell yer which at present), we resolves to do our duty to our customers; an' off we goes, about an hour afore midnight, down to this ere place, sitiwated say six mile rom Charin' Cross."

"What did ye go in?" asked the Doctor.

"A bit of a pony cart," said Tim; "as nice a little rap as you'd wish to see, and a hainimal little and good, that stepped out like a greyhound. But the ark on it, ye see, Doctor, was this: We dressed ourselves up, we did, as four sodgers."

And the Chancellor laughed amain, and stopped to rest his knees with both hands, to relieve his excitement.

"Four sodgers; and we tuck along with us an extra suit o' reds, in the bottom o' the cart."

"I see," said the Doctor. "Cute, werry cute!"

"Well," said Tim, "we got to the ground. I sh'd think, as near as may be, arter stoppin' on the road, at ten minutes arter twelve. Pitch dark, black as yer 'at—black, too, for your'n aint as black as some I've seen, Doctor."

Which the other allowed.

"From information we'd received, as they say at the Old Bailey, we got right up in a moment to the werry grave, all fresh and soft, yer know, for the job had been done that day, as I tell'd yer."

"Ave, ave," said Peter.

"Well, then, away we set to work. It didn't take no pick, shovels was plenty. And, on'y now and then a lookin' round and a listenin', and a coverin' the light, we had it all done and made smooth and neat again—why, I should say, in three parts of an hour, at the outside."

"An' ye got the gentleman safe out, did yer?"

"Aye, and safe into the spare jacket and trousers, my boy. That's where the joke was, yer see."

"La!" said the doctor.

"Not so sure about the law," said Tim, "but so's the fact."

"Well?"

"Well, when we'd dressed him up, cap an' all, what did we do, but we sot him up as well as we could make him look, in the bottom o' the shay-cart, all dark as pitch, yer know, and drove off like mad towards town agin, jolly pleased, but just a inch narvous like."

"I sh'd think so, jest," said the doctor.

"When we'd got, say half way, home, so 'appened there was a bit of a wayside beer-'ouse left open, someways, standin' all alone in the dark—on'y just a glimmer o' light in one room."

"Says one on us we call Snowdrop, 'cos he's as black as an Ingian, pretty nigh, 'Come now, mets, let's see if we can't get some'at to drink the parson's health with; for it's rare dree work."

"So, away we got down, ye see; and a big, gawky lad come out o' the shed or stable like, and says I to him, says I—'Jest you 'ave a eye on him a moment, will yer? He's werry quiet. We'll be out in a twink'."

"Says he, 'All right.'"

"But," says I, 'ye mustn't go near our chum that's asleep inside, for he've been werry bad all day, and is jest fallen to sleep. Let him be, old fellow, will yer?'

"Aye, sure," says the lad.

"So away we goes on, us four, and leaves that 'ere chap a-walkin' up and down, and whistlin', with his 'ands in his pockets."

And both the Doctor and the Chancellor burst out together into a loud laugh, that made all the passers-by stare and stop.

"Well?" said Peter.

"Well, some'ow or another, whether we was over thirsty (beer salt, ye know, Doctor)—"

And Tim poked his companion in the ribs.

"Or how it was, can't say, but we stayed longer than we meant to, and,—if tell the truth I must—we was jest a trifle screwed when we came out again; leastways, must ha' been so, or what follered couldn't ha' follered."

"We 'adn't left the public five minutes afore I chanced to put my 'and agen our friend's 'and as was seated in the cart, as I tell'd ye—"

And Peter opened his mouth, and looked rather pale.

"When, I jumped up, as if a rattlesnake was a coiling up me, and says I, 'Heaven and earth, Snow-drop, he's warm.'"

"The devil!" says the Doctor.

"So they all touched him; and, says they, altogether, 'Bless'd if he ain't!'

"Then there come out of 'im a low, smothered, dead, holler sort o' voice, like; 'And wouldn't you be warm, do ye think, if ye was me?'

"With that, we didn't wait for nothin' furdur!"

"Shouldn't think yer did," said Peter.

"We chucked up the reins, scampered out o' the shay, and cut, neck and heels, across the country, all different ways; and never see neither pony, nor cart, nor 'subject' ever since; nor ain't likely, neither."

"Ow was it, then?" says the Doctor.

"It come out afore the beak, I hear, only yesterday," replied Tim.

"That 'ere young hopeful of a stable lad, yer see, 'ad got a glimpse on the truth, a waitin' an' waitin' yonder; and, at last, what did he do, but he got out our friend, and carryin' 'im into the stable, put the sodger's clothes on 'imself, and came and sat down where t'other had been. Then, yer see, when we come out, p'rhaps three sheets in the wind, we never look'd for no ostler, not we, but drove off, and brought away the wrong customer! D'ye take me? And they wa' werry much astonished to find, next mornin', the late Mr. So-and-so a-lying on 'is back in the stable!"

"Gracious goodness!" said Peter.

"So I said, I can tell yer, for many a long hour afterwards. Jingo! it makes my flesh creep now, to think o' that 'ere warm touch!"

"Well, bless'd if I wouldn't change my line o' livin', if that ere 'ad ever happened to me," said the Doctor.

"Not a bit on it; better luck next time. We 'as to keep werry squat, at present, about the conveyance. But la! it'll all blow over. But, drat it, we lost the 'subject', that's the worst on it!"

"I'll thank yer, Muster Chancellor," said Peter, after thinking a minute or so, "to keep out o' Jerry-shops first time I go along with yer, on this business."

"Or else," said Tim, "take the 'ole company in with us, and not leave his Majesty's millintary out by 'emselves in the cold, eh?"

And the two body-snatchers—the master and pupil—laughed and walked on.

CHAPTER XIV.

MYRTLE COTTAGE.

MISS BIDDY RANGER, of Myrtle Cottage, would certainly object to our going into her company quite so soon as we are doing in this chapter, if she knew that we came straight from the society of Messrs. Gradly and Blugman.

She would have seen us on the step, while our hand was still upon the knocker, and, opening the parlour door, she would have put a large walking-stick, always kept for the purpose, leaning against the passage-wall, to make believe a gentleman was in the house; and then she would have called down the kitchen-stairs, in her little thin, gentle voice,—

"I'm not at home, Matilda, to anybody—no matter who it is."

More than that. If she had the least idea that we had spoken within forty-eight hours either to the Chancellor or the Doctor, she would have burnt pastiles in the hall, after our departure, for three days, at least.

Miss Ranger, whose residence was in Essex, just over the border, as "The Nunnery" was just over the border on the Suffolk side, always persisted in making herself older than she was; and when we have said that, we trust it will be unnecessary to add, that she took a pride in doing and being exactly the opposite, so far as she knew it, of what everybody else would be or do.

If an unmarried lady, considerably above five-and-forty, would persist in maintaining against all comers that she should never see fifty-five again, you are tolerably prepared for any amount of contradiction to the ordinary habits of womankind. To expect that lady to agree with common people on many questions after that, would be simply absurd.

Miss Bridget Ranger had very large property—most people would have put it either into funds, or into houses, or into a good bank, or into railways, or else have tied it up in an old stocking, and hid it in some bureau, or the ticking of her bed.

Miss Ranger did none of these things with her large property.

She looked about, and engaged her friends to look about for her, in search of deserving young men who were anxious to set up in business for themselves, but who hadn't the means for doing it; and these young men she supplied, on good security (sometimes not so good as she could wish, perhaps), with the necessary sums at very low interest, to be repaid according to agreement, or, more generally, according to the circumstances of the borrower.

Now, we are not prepared to recommend this investment generally to our readers, much as we may admire the benevolence which undoubtedly prompted it in Miss Ranger's case. We think we see considerable risks in it. Nevertheless, the fact is indisputable that this lady's losses were remarkably few; and, although funds, railways, and joint-stock banks might very probably have swelled her capital much more in the course of years than did this peculiar scheme (unless, indeed, it ruined her instead), Miss Biddy was a decidedly richer woman at forty-five than she had been at twenty-five, to say nothing of the satisfaction she enjoyed of having made many a heart happy, and of rendering early marriages possible to young tradesmen who must otherwise have lived, and perhaps died, old bachelors.

This last motive, in fact, was the motive that prompted the strange investment.

It was quite suddenly, at five-and-twenty, that she became possessed of this property, and very unexpectedly, too.

She had been a penniless, though well-educated, girl, and at nineteen had been engaged to one equally penniless with herself, but one who, in other respects, was fitted to make her an excellent husband, and supply a comfortable home.

For nearly six years did this really persevering and industrious youth (we forget his name) struggle to reach the point of success at which he could prudently marry. Every now and then he had reached it, he thought, then down he went again for want of capital.

His health had never been strong, it failed under the combined influence of toil and disappointed love, and he sank into the grave, just a few months before his faithful Bridget inherited her unlooked-for fortune.

Biddy made no stupid vows, above his grave, of perpetual celibacy—not she. She was not such a fool. She simply never married because she couldn't love again, and the monument she reared to the memory of the poor young tradesman was the singular one we have described, hoping to reduce the number of victims of honest poverty, and prevent at least a few sacrifices like that which had made her desolate.

We said that she would have had nothing to say to us, had she known the company we kept in the last chapter. Quite true, and we might have added, neither would she have entertained our application if we went with what is called a "case." She never, or rarely, gave money; where other people would give in indiscriminate charity, she never in her life was known to give a sixpence. She had her organised system of referees and so on, through whom all claims were required to reach her (and were nearly all of the one class mentioned), and without that system Miss Ranger very rarely acted.

Now, we only mention this feature in the good little spinster's character and life, because we don't believe in long descriptions. And one fact like this, whether in a book or in real life, is enough to show us, and, we hope, our readers, what manner of person Miss Bridget Ranger was.

At the time when we are introduced to her, she is seated in her handsome little drawing-room (for everything was handsome about Myrtle Cottage), in company with her niece, her brother's daughter, Margaret Cicely Ranger.

Margaret should have had some name a little less prosaic and commonplace. Indeed, she always wanted her aunt, who had brought her up, to call her Cicely; but Miss Ranger always said the name reminded her of volcanoes, and she wanted no eruptions in Myrtle Cottage.

Margaret would have compromised the matter for Meggy, but that was the name of an old family-nurse, which would have been anything but romantic; so she was obliged to be content with her first literal baptismal name.

At this time, she is a fair, sweet-looking girl (we believe that is the approved word, where you want to stop short of absolute beauty, or perfect prettiness), full eyes, that people say mean language—(whether large mouths mean good eyesight, we suppose is not determined!)—clear, rather sickly complexion; which her aunt attributed to the air of Essex, but which we are disposed to connect with bed-room novel-reading, after the keyhole had been plugged with whity-brown paper, and the towel hung up against some awkward crack to prevent the candle shining through outside.

There was less excuse for this kind of thing late at night, for Margaret had quite enough romance in the daytime.

In the nearest town (the name of which has also escaped us, and it doesn't matter), a branch bank was managed by a young man, named Gunn Launcelot, a youth who puzzled himself unspeakably with Miss Bridget's financial ideas, and yearned, if we must confess it, to try and find for her a little more profitable investment—of course, altogether for Miss Ranger's own sake.

Still, Gunn was willing to act as a sort of secretary to the little spinster, and many a good laugh he enjoyed over his functions.

There had been a very cordial attachment between Margaret and Gunn—an attachment that met no opposition from Miss Bridget. She hoped that what the one lacked of practical, sound views of common life, the other would be able to supply; Gunn, perhaps, not being any the worse for a dash of Margaret's poetry, in fair exchange.

"But now," said Margaret, on this afternoon, as they sat together, Biddy at her weekly accounts, her niece getting on very slowly at a watch-guard—"but now, how can there be, aunt, any real love in a girl's heart without jealousy, more or less? Isn't the very spaniel jealous, if his mistress pets anything near it more than she does himself?"

"Because he is a spaniel, my love," said Biddy, very archly. "I congratulate you on your comparison. I dare say we mean pretty much the same thing, only we are using jealousy in two different senses. I think by jealousy you mean nothing more than sensitive love—I mean that feeling of resentment which, in novels or silly stories, makes women poison their husbands or lovers. Now, I don't believe in that, Margaret; I've too much pride for that, and I hope you have, too."

"I'm glad you've explained, aunt, for sensitive love is just what I do mean. And I don't want any of that pride that considers itself above knowing the difference between affection and neglect. I should like to know how a girl can please herself with the tokens of love, if she doesn't care when she loses them."

"Pray, which of these emotions is my dear niece the subject of to-day? She seemed very dull till jealousy was started—now she's all ardour."

Margaret burst into tears.

"Did one of your missionaries (Aunt Biddy always called the young men she assisted, her missionaries) ever forget to pay you, aunt?"

"One did."

"Did you feel the loss of the money?"

"Certainly; but not so much as the ingratitude; for he could well afford to re-imburse."

"And you felt wounded?"

"Deeply."

"How much had you lent him?"

"Five hundred."

"And you laugh at me, because I lose that love for which I gave my own! Five hundred pounds gone—deeply wounded! The hopes of a fond heart gone—snap the finger, and who cares?"

And Margaret, poor girl! wept very sore.

How many tears were caused by naughty Gunn? how many by the sympathy, coming all at once, with a hundred Celias, and Letitias, and Arabellas, in a hundred novels, read in bed, when the keyhole was stuffed up, and the towel hanging against the crack?

There are many of Margaret's miseries in this miserable world.

The Matron.

NO. I.

A PRETTY style of cap has been recently worn, composed of net or lace, in a triangular shape, having a thin piece of steel in front, which fits the cap to the shape of the face. This spring might be used in the cap of which we give the illustration, but the hinder part should have the folds of the lace or net employed restrained behind by ribbon wire, and formed to the head shape by means of the dummy in the manner described. The trimming consists of British lace, and the bows are of blue satin ribbon. The curtain is of the same material as the cap, and is to be trimmed with lace to correspond. Observe that it is deeper behind than at the sides.

Another nice lady-like head-dress may be made of lambs' wool, and in a very simple manner. It is merely a three-cornered piece of lambs' wool crochet, a style of work in such favour with all classes, that I need hardly say anything to recommend it.

My readers must remark that the strings should be fastened on, and that they form no part of the kerchief for the head. The shell pattern, generally used for ornament, may form the edging, or be substituted by a simpler crochet edging in single wool made thus: Form a chain of sixteen stitches.

1st Row.—Make a long stitch into the 7th of the foundation, then make three more long stitches with one chain stitch between each; make 2 chain, miss 2, 1 long, 2 chain, miss 2, 1 long, 5 chain, and turn the work.

2nd Row.—1 long into first hole, 2 chain, 1 long in the next, and the same for the following; then 4 chain, 1 long, 5 chain, and turn the work.

3rd Row.—4 long (with 1 chain between each) into the large hole, 2 chain, 1 long into the next, 2 chain, 1 long into the next, 5 chain, and turn the work. You have now 2 holes left, which forms the scallop. Repeat these two last rows till you have the length required.

I have no intention to enter into all the intricacies of crochet work. I study the useful rather than the ornamental. But I consider that the crochet in its simpler operations can be turned to very great use, and the shepherds of the south of France have proved it. I daresay many of those who cover up handsome furniture with delicate and intricate fabrics of crochet work, are not aware that this work was formerly called shepherds' knitting, and that it has long been a favourite occupation of shepherds, particularly in the south of France, where, whilst tending their sheep on the mountains, they make with their crochets a number of useful and ingenious articles. And now I can fancy I hear one of my lady readers exclaim, "I shall certainly make this nice warm head-dress for myself. I wish I had an easy pattern for a comforter for my husband, something that I could make in a very short time; for it would be such a pleasure to me to think that the work of my hand protected my husband from the injurious effects of this severe weather."

I am happy in being able to anticipate your wish.

Set up a chain with double German wool—shaded purple, for instance—about three quarters in length, and work it backwards and forwards in single long stitch till it is three-eighths wide, then double crochet it all round. If any of my readers should wish to make a comforter, but prefer making a less expensive one than that I have just described, they had better proceed with knitting, and use for the purpose scarlet fleecy wool in double knitting, which is done very simply. Bring the wool forward, slip one, pass the wool back, knit one, turning the wool twice round the pin instead of once. Every succeeding row is the same. The stitch knitted in one row is the slip stitch in the next.

But it is not only necessary to keep the face and neck warm; the feet require particular attention during the winter season, and the following directions for knitting overshoes in a simple and expeditious manner is likely to prove very acceptable to some of my readers. Set up twenty-eight stitches; knit backwards and forwards as many rows as will be sufficient for the length of the foot, which can be measured by a shoe. When long enough, cast it off, sew up the ends, also half of the sides (to cover the foot and instep). Run a narrow ribbon round the part left unsewn to draw it round the ankle. This narrow ribbon should be run in about half an inch from the edge. The foot shapes the knitted shoes; and I can assure you you will find them very warm and comfortable. Of course they should be knitted with coarse pins, and the best material is three-thread fleecy. For elderly ladies who only require them when sitting in the drawing-room, or driving out in a carriage, double lambs' wool may be used.

DARNED STOCKINGS.

ONE chilly afternoon you might have seen a little girl about eleven years old sitting alone in a small parlour. The fire glowed brightly in the grate, and puss slept comfortably on the rug; the canary sang cheerily from his cage in the window, and even the stiff portrait of an old lady, which hung over the mantel-piece, seemed to smile because a ray of winter sun lay across its folded hands.

In fact everything looked cheerful except Ruth, who sat on a stool with a very long face. Her whole hand and arm were thrust into a very long white stocking, and her fingers peeped out at the toes through holes which it was her afternoon's task to darn. She held a very long darning-needle, attached to a very "long yarn," and, according to the moderation she used in passing her needle backwards and forwards, it would evidently take a very long time to mend the holes.

Ruth, indeed, looked quite miserable; and if you had used your eye-glass you might have discovered a tiny tear twinkling upon her eyelash.

After working indolently for awhile, Ruth dropped her hands into her lap and heaved a deep sigh. Puss looked up a moment, disturbed by the sudden motion, and then, with a wide gape, composed herself for another nap.

"I wish I were a cat!" sighed Ruth. She gazed vacantly at the fire.

"I wish I were a grown lady; then I could put out all my sewing. At any rate, I would never darn stockings!" Her eyes now raised themselves to the picture.

"I wonder if grandmamma ever worked. She always sits there with her hands before her. Happy picture! Oh, if I might sit with mine before me, and not feel that I must mend these horrid holes! Darning stockings is the most disagreeable work in the world!" Ruth stretched her arms, and a prick from the long needle reminded her of her duty. Immediately the corners of her mouth went down, and her stocking came up, and slowly the needle recommenced its journey.

The parlour door opened and a lady entered, carrying a deep basket, filled to the brim with unmended socks and stockings.

Ruth looked round, and groaned at the sight of them.

The lady, cheerfully coming forward, seated herself in the arm-chair, and began looking over the contents of the basket. "Have you finished mending that stocking, Ruth?" said she.

"No, ma'am," sighed Ruth, despondingly.

"I am afraid you are not industrious, my dear."

"Oh, mother! how can I be, when I have all these dreadful holes to repair? I do hate to darn!"

"Are you not willing to help me a little when I have so many in the basket, dear Ruth?"

Ruth sighed. "Yes, mamma, I wish to help you, of course; but I wish it was at anything in the world but darning stockings. Why won't you put them out to be done, or have a seamstress come to the house?"

"We cannot have all the goods and luxuries of this world, my daughter, and as I can only choose a little, I prefer to have our dresses made for us, and do the mending myself."

"How delightful it must be to have plenty of money! Oh, I do wish we were rich, and could keep a seamstress and a dress-maker, too, like Mrs. Longpurse, over the way!" exclaimed Ruth.

"Oh, Ruth, don't be envious. Poor Mrs. Longpurse is a cripple; her hands hang uselessly by her side. She would give all her riches only to be able to darn her own stockings, at this moment."

"Well, then, mother, I would be willing to mend all the stockings, if I might just sew the holes over and over, instead of travelling backwards and forwards, backwards and forwards, and only get an inch ahead in half an hour."

"Sew them up!" exclaimed her mother, laughing. "Why, Ruth, that would be almost as bad as the way Miss Betsy Bluestocking mended hers."

"How was that, mamma?"

"She pinned them up!"

"Did she really, mamma?" said Ruth, amused.

"Yes, she did, indeed. I saw her going up stairs once, and there were two pins, one in each heel, straining together two obstinate-looking holes, which promised very soon to break their bonds."

Ruth laughed heartily. "Oh, that was too bad! I would rather have gone with the holes gaping than to have pinned them together; wouldn't you?"

Her mother looked doubtful. "I suppose the holes let in the cold. I will tell you something stranger yet, for Betsy Bluestocking had no mother to teach her anything, so there was some excuse for her; but, neat and particular as Mrs. Stitchintime is, she told me once that she never had mended a hole in her stocking in all her life."

"Oh, mamma, she shouldn't tell such fibs! She has spent a week at a time with us, and I have seen her, with darning needle and yarn, at work upon stockings, and she was a long time about it too."

"Both the lady and yourself tell the truth, my dear. She always darns the thin places before they come to holes."

Ruth laughed again. "Oh, what a catch that was, mamma! Well, I suppose Mrs. Stitchintime goes upon the principle of that proverb about nine stitches—what is it, mother?"

"A stitch in time saves nine."

"Yes—that's it. Look, mamma! while we have been chatting here I have darned all the holes!" and with a cheerful face Ruth clipped off the shortened yarn.

"I am very glad, and much obliged to you," said the lady, taking the stocking. "It is nicely done, too. Now you may play with puss; but before you go, let us make a resolution always after this to follow Mrs. Stitchintime's rule, and never allow ourselves to darn a hole in our stockings again."

JAPAN AND THE JAPANESE.

MANUFACTURES.

ONE hundred and fifty years ago (1708), the prime minister of the Emperor of Japan produced a learned treatise, in which occurs the following curious passage:—

"The ancients compared the metals to the bones in the human body, and taxes to the blood, hair, and skin, that incessantly undergo the process of renewal, which is not the case with the metals. I compute the annual exportation of gold at about one hundred and fifty thousand kobars, so that in ten years the empire is drained of fifteen hundred thousand kobars (£2,500,000). With the exception of medicines, we can dispense with everything that is brought in from abroad. The stuffs and other foreign commodities are of no real benefit to us. All the gold, silver, and copper extracted from the mines during the reign of Gongin, and since his time, is gone, and—what is still more to be regretted—for things we could have done without."

That the regret of the prime minister was absurd, is evident, for the Japanese, with all their exclusiveness, have not found it to their advantage to shut out all foreign importations. We should, indeed, be inclined to admit the prime minister's exception in respect to the medicine; but with regard to our inventions and improvements, the Japanese have now ascertained their value to exceed that of gold silver, or copper.

We have already noticed that the Japanese are apt to learn. They understand the principles of the electric telegraph; they have already laid down a line of railway, and constructed locomotives. With scientific instruments they have long been familiar, and in many of the arts of civilised life they have made considerable advancement. They turn their criminals to account; and their most beautiful silks are woven by high-born prisoners confined on a rocky island. They are skilful artists—they engrave on both wood and copper; the artificers in copper, iron, and steel have a high character, and the swords of Japan rank second only to those of Khorassan. The Japanese are skilful watchmakers; some of their clocks are very curious and complicated, and reveal no ordinary ingenuity on the part of the workmen. They manufacture glass; but are said not to be acquainted with the art of glass-blowing. The art of lacquering furniture with gold, silver, and various pigments—called Japanning—is practised with great success. They produce paper from mulberry and other barks, using the fibres in the manufacture of cordage. Their industry in every department exceeds that either of the Hindoos or Chinese.

AGRICULTURE

Agriculture is followed throughout the empire in obedience to a very peremptory law which obliges all owners of land, under the penalty of confiscation, to keep their property in good productive condition, that they may be able to pay a heavy land-tax to the government. "But whatever may be the cause, the soil, though not naturally fertile, has been so much improved as to be rendered extremely productive. Few plants, except on the hills, are found in a natural state; and the face of the country, even on the mountain sides which are formed into terraces, is so diligently cultivated, that it would be difficult to find in the country a single nook of untitled land, even to the dry summits of the mountains. In the south districts rice is raised in very large quantities, as it forms a principal article of food to the inhabitants. Wheat is little grown, and held in light estimation. Barley, also buckwheat, a bean called daisson, and another the soja dolichos (from which the well known soy is made), potatoes, melons, pumpkins, and cucumbers are raised in great abundance; and the fruit trees of southern Europe, the orange, lemon, vine, peach, and mulberry, are both plentiful, and highly productive. Ginger and pepper are the chief spice plants."

But the great object of cultivation in Japan next to rice is tea. The hedges in almost every farm are made of this plant, as is the ordinary drink of every family. The finer sorts of tea are cultivated by the Japanese with extreme care. The plant is said to thrive best on a well watered hill-side, and to be manured with dried anchovies and the juice of mustard seed.

"The cup that cheers but not inebriates"

Herds and flocks are not common in Japan. This is readily accounted for by the fact that they eat scarcely any animal food except fish, and that their garments are either of cotton or silk. There are very few sheep remnants of an old Dutch stock introduced years and years ago. What few oxen there are, are used as beasts of burden. The horses, which are of inferior quality, are employed by the nobility; asses and mules are unknown. Dogs are esteemed sacred, and are exceedingly numerous.

MORAL CHARACTER OF THE PEOPLE.

There is much that is masculine and original in the character of the Japanese. Pride in their power and cruelty in their punishments, seem to be the worst features of the race. Though, when loaded with injuries, the Japanese utters no reproachful or vehement expression in return, yet his pride is deep, rancorous, and invincible; and the poniard, inseparable from his person, is the instrument of vengeance, when the offender least expects it, or is sheathed in his own bosom, in case vengeance is beyond his reach. Thus, pride runs through all classes, but rises to the highest pitch among the great, leading them to exhibit an extravagant pomp in their retinue and establishment. Forced often to bend beneath a stern, uncompromising, and powerful government, they are impelled to suicide—the last refuge of fallen and vanquished pride. Self-murder, like duelling in a former age, seeming to be with them a point of honour.

The national character is indeed strongly contrasted with that which generally prevails in Asia. Instead of a tame, quiet, orderly, servile disposition, making them the prepared and ready subjects of despotism, the people have a character marked by energy, independence, and a lofty sense of honour. Although said to make good subjects, even to the severe government under which they live, they yet retain an impatience of control, and a force of public opinion, which render it impossible for any ruler wantonly to tyrannise over them. Instead of that mean, artful, and truckling disposition so general among Asiatics, their manners are distinguished by a manly frankness, and all their proceedings by honour and good faith. The prominent feature of their character, indeed, is good sense. They are habitually kind and good-humoured, and carry their ideas of friendship to an extent that would shame many more advanced in civilisation and of a purer creed. To serve and defend a friend in every peril, to meet torture and death rather than betray him, is considered a duty from which nothing can dispense.

THE IDOL OF THE TYROLESE.

THE inn of Saint Leonard, in a Swiss village, was, one cold and stormy night in mid winter, the scene of a confusion quite unusual to a place of its quiet and humdrum ways. The wife of Theodore Hofer, the ever-cheerful and smiling host of Saint Leonard, presented her husband, after a marriage of twelve years, with a fine son; and as the storm brought a larger accession of company to the inn that night than was usual, the occasion was responded to, and the child's health drunk, in a manner that threatened to empty Hofer's wine-cellar at his own expense, since in his joy he refused payment for a single glass.

One old soldier, who had been an officer in a bloodless war and one of the principals in as bloodless a duel, insisted upon seeing the new heir of St. Leonard, and baptising him with wine into the service of his country; and Hofer, whose ecstasy at becoming a father overcame his judgment, actually produced the wee creature in the large front room, and smiled as the old lieutenant passed his sword over the face in the form of a cross, touched the infant's red brow with redder wine, and proclaimed, in a half-drunken voice, that he was a born soldier; and giving him at the same, subject however to the decision of the mother, his own name of Andreas. Madame Hofer made no objection to the name, but she did object strongly to the noise and confusion, and being too drunk to resist her commands, the parties slunk away to bed, each holding to a servant on one side and the balustrade on the other.

This little episode in the quiet monotony of the life at Saint Leonard, sometimes called "the inn on the sand," occurred in 1767. The little Andreas showed no disposition to ratify the promise of the old lieutenant at his birth, of becoming a soldier, evincing no great emotion at the sound of martial music, and disdaining to fight with his companions upon any occasion. As he grew up a young man, his business consisted chiefly of trading to Italy with wine and horses, and in these branches of trade he continued until 1796.

Andreas was now twenty-nine years of age, and as the war approached Tyrol, his dormant enthusiasm seemed to awaken, and he appeared all at once the inspired leader of a rifle company from his own country, against the French on Lake Garda. As they marched away, his eye wandered a moment to a window behind which a pale, delicate face appeared, wet with tears. The sight made him falter and change colour, but it was only for a single instant. He resumed his firm step and erect carriage, and passed on. That face haunted his visions throughout the campaign. It was that of Octavia Sheffer, to whom but a few days before he had proffered his heart and had been accepted.

The events of the campaign brought Andreas Hofer into a position where all acknowledged his superiority, and when, in 1808, the rupture between the Cabinets of St. Cloud and Vienna appeared inevitable, and the people of the Tyrol became excited, he was one of the band of private messengers sent to the Archduke John, who was then in command of the Austrian army. This was the initiatory step to the insurrection which resulted in the most triumphant success for the mountaineers, who conquered nearly the whole country, and took eight thousand Bavarians prisoners.

The bravery and courage of Andreas Hofer made him perfectly adored by the Tyrolese. A brief and hurried visit to Octavia, made in the stillness of night, through danger and peril, was the only intercourse permitted to the lovers for many months. On the 12th of April, 1809, Andreas forced a battalion of the Bavarians in the plains of Sterzing to surrender, thus earning new and lasting laurels.

Sitting at home, "meek-eyed, with her golden hair," Octavia pored over the brief details of that day, and wearied herself in imagining how looked her hero amidst the bands of excited peasantry, with their impromptu cannon of wood with iron hoops. She fancied to herself how the women and children, who actually fought, and loaded rifles for the men to fire, must have worshipped such a leader; and hard as it was to be separated, and to feel that his path was through perils sufficient to appal the bravest, still the triumphant thought came ever uppermost, stifling fear and pain, "And this man—this hero, is mine."

Meanwhile the Tyrol was again invaded, and a close blockade succeeded. Andreas hastened to join the regular troops, in order to restore its freedom of communication with the interior, when the armistice of July 12, succeeding the battle of Wagram, was announced. The terms of the armistice penetrated his soul with horror. It was demanded that the Tyrol should be given up to the fury of the enemy. The Tyrol!—and Octavia and her family in peril! Vain indeed had been the blows which he had struck for freedom, if this was to be the gloomy ending of all the bright and glorious hopes which they two had held so long!

Disabled from performing any available service where he now was, Andreas lingered only to bid the discomfited peasantry adieu, and then attempted to reach the Tyrol, which he hoped by some stratagem to succeed in entering. He was cut off on every side, and with the horror of Octavia's situation perpetually before his eyes, he was at length driven to find concealment in a cave in the valley of the Passeyr. Those were days of unmitigated anguish, in which the strength of the soldier almost gave way under the emotions of the man.

He was at the turning-point between hope and utter despair, when one morning he was roused to new emotions by hearing the voices of human beings. The mouth of the cave was effectually screened by thick brushwood, which did not, however, drown the voices. They were talking of the armistice, and, Bavarians though they were, they candidly admitted that the people of the Tyrol had bravely retaliated upon their besiegers, and had risen, armed and conquering, to avenge their wrongs. The speakers' voices died away, and Andreas darted from his concealment, and succeeded in reaching the lines unmolested. Under cover of the night, possessing himself first of the watchword, he gained access to the Austrian ranks, and, animated by the welcome sight of their beloved leader, the Tyrolese fought with such energy as to secure the victory.

The morning sun shone brightly upon a wedding group in the little hill-side sanctuary at Passeyr. Amidst doubt and danger, with the enemy lurking in detached parties about the mountains, and the dread of new terrors that might momentarily be expected, the bridal ceremony went on. It was yet so early that the sun had not drunk the dews that had wept profusely on their pathway to the church. No marriage parade, no pageantry were there; but the two, each with a single attendant, walked forth silently amid the springing flower, to pledge their faith as each other's, now and for ever.

Pale as a lily, the bride glided up the aisle beside the bronzed soldier, who seemed as if born for her protection. The wearing horrors of the siege had stolen her bloom, while his wild life had added new strength and vigour to his frame; but still there was a shade of melancholy on the fine countenance that would seem to say how painfully these troublesome times were overshadowing the bridal hour.

"To leave you again, my wife," he uttered, softly, as they retraced their steps on the green sward; "to leave you now, would unman me wholly. I am weary of this strife. Oh, that we could but retire to some unknown wilderness, where we could leave these scenes of commotion far behind, and where not even the distant hum of war could ever reach us again."

Soon after his marriage, he was called out to resist once more. The enemy had already entered the Tyrolese mountains, and the people were prepared for fresh battles. Won by specious promises, Andreas at length submitted to the terms of a new amnesty, which submission he was led, by false reports, to recall. Now, then, he was open to the severest punishment of war. He was accused of breaking the amnesty, and a price was even set upon his head.

One long, lingering farewell to Octavia, one light kiss upon the brow of his infant, and he was gone. In the lonely shelter of an Alpine hut, amidst the snow and ice of winter, Andreas lay concealed, scarcely daring to communicate with his beloved one at home. A few who knew of his retreat, took turns in conveying food to his desolate abode, and the letters of Octavia, by which she strove to console and cheer him in his imprisonment. Baraguay d'Hilliers, the commander, in vain promised golden rewards to the mountaineers to reveal his abode, but no inducement was sufficient to make them discover it, so great was their affection for their beloved leader. At length Octavia left her infant under the care of a friend, and joined him in his exile, thus making life supportable. Her presence awoke new hopes, and he dreamed of freedom and happiness once more.

"THIS is a net gain," as the spider said when he caught a fly.

WHEN are women fathers? When they are sighers (sires), which is not unfrequently the case.

WHY are the darkies of New York generally a debased class? Because they are often found living in de basement.

A MINISTER at a camp-meeting said: "If the lady with the blue hat, red hair, and cross eyes, don't stop talking, she will be pointed out to the congregation."

"I'd have you to know, Mrs. Stoker, that my uncle was a bannister of the law." "A fig for your bannister," retorted Mrs. Grumly, turning up her nose; "haven't I a brother as is a corridor in the navy?"

COMMERCIAL gent.—"Another outbreak, eh? These riots will be a terrible hindrance to all kinds of business." Fashionable gent.—"Aw, dessay! Delighted to hear it! Aw, always had the greatest aversion to all kinds of business."

A COUNTRY exchange thus affectingly appeals to his delinquent subscribers: "We wish those of our subscribers who expect to pay their subscriptions in wood, to bring it in before the roads begin to get bad and the weather much colder. Who'll bring the first load?"

If weaknesses in love are pardonable, it is principally in women.

BIG and awkward—little and graceful—these are pretty much synonymous terms in the matter of personal appearances.

Few things are impracticable in themselves, and it is for want of application rather than of means that men fail of success.

WE get at the outlines of things from what we read and hear, but the filling up must be through our own experience.

It sometimes happens that a woman hides from a man all the passion she feels for him, while on his part he feigns for her all which he does not feel.

TRUTH can hardly be expected to adapt herself to the crooked policy and wily sinuosities of worldly affairs; for truth, like light, travels only in straight lines.

A MAN is very angry with a woman who ceases to love him, and consoles himself; a woman makes less noise when she is forsaken, and remains longer inconsolable.

A GOOD thought is a great boon for which God is to be first thanked, then he who is the first to utter it, and then, in a lesser, but still in a considerable degree, the man who is the first to quote it to us.

THE virtues of women are difficult, because glory does not assist their exercise. To live at home, to regulate only one's self and family, to be simple, just and modest, are painful duties, because they are obscured. We must have great merit to be virtuous only in our own eyes.

It is adverse to talent to be consorted and trained up with inferior minds, or inferior companions, however high they may rank. The foal of the racer neither finds out his speed nor calls out his powers, if pastured out with the common herd that are destined for the collar and the yoke.

ADVICE GRATIS.—Every man ought to pay his debts, if he can; every man ought to help his neighbour, if he can; every man ought to get married, if he can; every man should do his work to suit his customers, if he can. Every wife should please her husband, if she can; every wife should sometimes hold her tongue, if she can; every lawyer should sometimes tell the truth, if he can; every man ought to mind his own business and let other people's alone, if he can.

A GOOD PLAN.—A friend of ours had a better method of sending money by post than that of registering the letter at the Post-office. When he is lucky enough to have money to send to his friends through the post, he places a large black seal upon the letter, and writes underneath "in haste!" Such letters always get to their destination in safety.

THE LIBELLERS OF THE FAIR SEX.—Men do not libel women one half as much as women do. Here is a proof of it:—Bosom Friend. "Do you mean to tell me that she never fainted?"—Intimate Acquaintance. "No—never tried even! And there never was so good an opportunity!"—Bosom Friend (triumphantly). "Then she's reserving herself. You may be sure she has some other faint in view."

NUTS FOR POOR MEN.—It costs a deal of money to be rich, and it is a question if so much is worth so little? After all, is wealth worth the cost, first in acquiring it, next in supporting it, and lastly, in bearing up under it, when you have lost it?

| 1. Q to Q 4 (ch) | 1. Kt takes Q |
| 2. R to K 5 (ch) | 2. Q takes E |
| 3. B mates | |

Q. E. F.—There is nothing to prevent a piece giving check under the circumstances to which you refer. The Black King is misplaced in the position submitted by you; he should stand on Q Kt 5 to be in check of the Bishop.

E. T. SHARP.—Black's reply to your second move in Problem No. 80, is P to Q 4.

TRANSMERE.—Black should take the Kt which stands on K B 5 in reply to your first move in Problem No. 80. Thanks for the Problem sent, but we find it too easy.

THE HERMIT OF THE MERLIN'S CAVE.—1. If you will send as your name and address on a stamped envelope, the diagrams shall be sent to you. 2. You will no doubt have perceived that your solutions of Problems Nos. 81 and 82 are wide of the mark.

CHARLTON.—We are much gratified at your communication after so long an absence.

G. T. J.—Kt to Q R 3 (ch). gives mate in Problem No. 64, if the K R play as you propose.

J. PHENIX.—Your Problem in seven moves was unaccompanied by its solution.

E. H. EDWARDS.—There is no difference in the nature of the positions to which you refer. We shall have much pleasure in examining your Enigma, if it be submitted on a diagram.

W. W. (Dudley).—The key move of the end game to which you refer is Q to Q B 2, and, play as Black may, White wins in seven moves. If Black at his second move play Kt to Q 6, White wins in five moves.

T. R. will be happy to play a game of chess by correspondence with any subscriber to the FAMILY PAPER. Address, care of the Editor.

PHILLIDOR, Sen., is ready to encounter an adversary by correspondence who will play the Evans' Gambit. "Phillidor, sen." concedes the first move to his adversary, and sends his rejoinder, P to K 4. Address, care of the Editor.

INQUIRENDO.—We do not clearly understand the purport of your communication. It is quite evident, however, that the game would be drawn, assuming that the moves were correctly played on each side. You do not indicate the precise point upon which you require information, but merely give the position which, it appears, occurred in actual play.

R. S. (Exeter).—The work to which you refer is one of the best on chess, extant.

H. WALLING.—The diagrams will be sent to you on your favouring us with your address on a stamped envelope.

Pierce (Queensborough), Nos. 80, 81, 82, 83, and 84; Eagleshall, Nos. 84 and 85, correct.

beautiful and costly mirrors, sat the great general, Baraguay d'Hilliers. He was at his desk, carefully looking over despatches, when a servant entered and requested, in the name of Eugene Donay, a confidential audience. Hastily folding away the papers, the general gave orders that he should be admitted, and while awaiting his visitor, he drew his chair nearer to the cheerful blaze that flamed in the little porcelain stove. The servant ushered in a dark, low-browed man, in the dress of a priest, who came forward with an abject, craven air, as if conscious that his errand was not one to glory in.

"Be seated, reverend sir," said the courteous general. "You have commands for my private ear?"

"Yes, my son. They relate to one from whom you wish to hear—Andreas Hofer."

The general started. "Indeed! Has his hiding place been discovered?"

"I have succeeded in finding the man who carries food to him, and have watched him long enough to make myself perfectly sure that I can find him. I await your advice as to the mode of surprising him?"

"Pardon me if I ask your motive in doing this?"

"Certainly. Hofer once made me his confidant. I was privy to all his schemes, and, to say the truth, he was my best friend. But he has offended me in a certain point, and I cannot—excuse me, my lord general; it is a painful subject."

Donay did not see the look of inexpressible disgust which Baraguay d'Hilliers cast upon him. In a moment the general had recovered his polite suave manner, and desired him to finish his statement. It was brief. A few soldiers, the priest said, were all that were necessary; Hofer and his wife lived alone, and there would be no counter force. When would the general wish the prisoner to be taken?

"I will issue orders, and when I am ready I will send for you as a guide to the place of his concealment," said the general, bowing him out. "By heavens!—but I feel it mean to enter into conspiracy with such a contemptible traitor. To betray his friend and benefactor! I loathe him; still I must, perforce, take advantage of the reptile's information." And he sat down again and wrote.

Silence was around the rocky mountain pass where stood the Alpine hut. Within, there sat the two who were all the world to each other, and whose love burned as brightly amid the glaciers as it would have done amidst the gayest scenes. They were talking of the little Theodore, who was named after his grandfather, the host of St. Leonard's Inn, who had long before this been gathered to his fathers. Suddenly a crackling sound was heard by both, as if some heavy animal had pressed the snow too heavily and broken its crisp and glittering crust. They started to their feet, and the slight door gave way before a heavy stroke, and the little room was filled with armed men, who claimed Andreas as their prisoner.

Bravely did Octavia bear up under the heavy burden. It was well that she did not realise the full penalty of that law under which Andreas was to suffer. She accompanied him unshrinking to Mantua, whither he was taken to undergo the ordeal of a court-martial. The decision was final, and then came the terrible parting. The brave heart of Andreas Hofer was pierced with the bullets of the soldiery. Before the sun had set, Octavia heard of her child's death.

In the splendid cathedral of Innsbruck, Andreas Hofer lies buried, for so willed the universal voices of his countrymen; and beside him lies the poor broken flower, whose tender heart was reached through his, by those fearful messengers of death.

"They had one grave—one lonely bridal bed;
No friend—no kinsman there a tear to shed;
His name had ceased—her heart outlived each tie,
Once more to look on that dear face—and die."

THE APPROACH OF WINTER.

The golden leaves are falling fast,
The crimson ones are turning pale
With terror at the wintry blast
That rushes by with mournful wail,
As if in sorrow thus to bring
Destruction on its rapid wing.

Leaf after leaf comes sighing down,
To join its fellow on the earth,
The golden hue soon turns to brown
Beneath the tree that gave it birth,
Whose naked branches seem to mourn
The offspring rudely from them torn.

How melancholy 'twere to see
The beauties of the earth decay;
How sad it were to think that we
Like all the rest must pass away;
Like all the flowers, forgotten die,
Like all the dead, forgotten lie;
Did faith not make the desert ring
With promise of eternal spring!

IMPORTANT NOTICE
TO THE
STUDENTS OF THE FRENCH LESSONS
IN
CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER.

IN consequence of the numerous inquiries which are being continually received, as to the best French and English, and English and French Dictionary, it has been determined to re-issue

CASSELL'S FRENCH DICTIONARY.

Containing, I. French and English; II. English and French. This work is universally admitted to be

ONE OF THE BEST DICTIONARIES OF THE AGE.

It contains all the Words in general use at the present time, including those which are technical and scientific; Vocabularies of Mythological, Historical, and Geographical Names, with accurate definitions and examples. It also comprises Rules for correct Pronunciation; the Idioms most in use; Table of Irregular Verbs, &c. &c. It is thus altogether the most compendious and useful French and English and English and French Dictionary that has ever been published, especially for purposes of private study and reference.

"Cassell's French Dictionary" is now published at 9s. 6d., but with the view of encouraging the students of the French lessons, it is proposed to issue this important and valuable work in Weekly Numbers, price Twopence. When completed the two divisions, that is to say, the French and English, and English and French, will form 960 closely printed pages, and if purchased in weekly numbers, will only involve the outlay of 5s. It must, however, be understood that subscribers will only have the privilege of completing their numbers at this price during the period of issue, or within a period, from the issue of the last number, which will be hereafter named.

Cases for the preservation of the numbers, as well as for the binding of the same when completed, will be issued with the first Number.

The First Number, containing 32 pages, demy octavo, will be ready with No. 57 of the "FAMILY PAPER," on Thursday, December 23.

M. N.—Your verses, entitled The Glade, evince taste for poetry, but we advise you not to indulge in it until you can spell more correctly. A YOUTH OF SEVENTEEN.—You will find full directions in the French Lessons. ANN T. R. P. C.—It is dangerous to endeavour, by violent remedies, to remove scurf from the head. The best method is to try and strengthen the skin of the scalp, and with this object, we advise you twice a day to comb out the hair, in such a manner that the air may pass through it freely, then with the fingers moisten the roots with soft water, at the same time gently rub the scalp. PIANALLA AND FRITZ.—The lock of hair sent us is decidedly brown. Give the laying hens fresh meat, chopped up like sausage meat, but do not give it in any great quantity, say half an ounce a day to each hen during the winter, or from the time insects disappear. JESSIE MARIA.—Tell those who torment you that your hair is auburn, not red. ADELA HONEYWOOD, J. L.—We do not recommend soda for the hair, but consult our Editorial Table, and you will find ample advice on this subject.—You are likely to injure your teeth by endeavouring to alter their position.

RORY O'MOORE.—You can procure printed forms for wills at any law stationer's. If the witnesses are only credible people, they may be of either the Roman Catholic or the Protestant faith, as no inquiry will be made into their form of worship.

A COUNTRY SUBSCRIBER may find the address of the person residing in the neighbourhood of the Regent's Park, by inquiring at the district office where the letters are sorted.

PESTAL.—There is in this country no law, human or divine, against the marriage of first cousins. In Roman Catholic countries a dispensation from the pope is necessary to enable first cousins to marry.

MARY IN TROUBLE.—You have flattered away some of the best years of your life, but though we own you have been cruelly treated, we think your conduct has not been blameless. When your lover, on parting from you, refused to enter into an engagement, you had reason to doubt the sincerity of his regard, and you should have acted accordingly. The object of your affection is evidently of an irresolute disposition. In fact, there seems little manliness about him, but as you have loved him for years, of course you are unwilling to give him up. If in his heart there is any affection for you remaining, you will discover it in the following manner: Write to him yourself (supposing you have no friend to be your interpreter in your painful and embarrassing position), and say that suspense is making you quite unhappy, and that if he cannot immediately make up his mind as to the course he means to pursue, all intercourse between him and you must cease at once and for ever.

H. STANLEY.—The lines you have quoted refer to the nine Muses, whose names and offices are thus described:—Calliope, the muse of heroic poetry; Clio, of history; Erato, of love songs; Euterpe, of music; Melpomene, of tragedy; Polyhymnia, of rhetoric; Terpsichore, of dancing; Thalia, of comedy; Urania, of astronomy.

A GROCER, A SCHOLAR, and several others.—The best preventatives of chilblains are woollen socks or gloves, brisk exercise, and friction. When they have once formed, friction with some stimulant should be applied, such as equal quantities of spirits of wine and vinegar, or an ounce of white copperas dissolved in a pint of water. When chilblains have broken, they should be dressed with a little resin cerate, or oleum ointment.

CUSTALOGA.—The Amazon, or, as it is more correctly called, the Marañon, is the greatest river in the world. It takes its rise in the Andes, in Peru, and after pursuing a circuitous course of more than 5,000 miles, and receiving the waters of more than 300 tributary streams, it flows into the Atlantic.

A TESTOTALER may entertain his friends with a capital Christmas pudding, by attending to the following directions:—Pick and stone two pounds of good Valentias; pick, wash, and dry one pound of currants; chop two pounds of beef suet; have ready half a pound of brown sugar, six ounces of candied peel cut thin; two pounds and a half of flour, six eggs, and a quart or more of milk; an ounce of mixed spice, and a table-spoonful of salt. Put the flour into a large pan, add the plums, currants, suet, sugar, peel, spice, and salt, and mix them well together while dry. Beat the eggs well up in a large basin, and add a portion of the milk, stirring it at the same time. Make a well in the middle of the flour, and pour in the milk and eggs. Keep stirring till all the ingredients are thoroughly mixed. Add more milk, if necessary, and stir up again: the batter should be rather stiff. Have a good stout cloth ready, wet and flour it well, lay it over a pan, pour in the batter, and tie it firmly up. When the water in the copper or large kettle boils, put the pudding in, and let it boil gently for five or six hours. Turn it carefully out of the cloth. Serve with or without sauce, which may be thin melted butter sweetened with coarse sugar.

A WILD IRISH GIRL.—Certainly thirty miles was not a long journey for a lover to undertake, nor is a penny heavy postage for a lover to pay; but here comes the question, is the young man in question a lover? We do not think the ring and the portrait are indisputable proofs of his being so. By this time he may have given another ring and another portrait to another lady. His neglect should make you suspect his constancy, and though we do not advise you to be precipitate, we think you would do well to wean your affections from him. The hair sent is of a remarkably pretty auburn.

A WATER LILY.—The title of the work written by Madame Ida Pfeiffer, and which gives a description of the "Voyage," mentioned in our former notice, is "A Woman's Journey Round the World." Madame Pfeiffer was also the authoress of some other interesting works, which, with the above, are published, by Messrs. Ward and Lock.

TIMOTHY PHUZZINS.—A remedy for the unsightly black-headed pimples you complain of has been given, but no application will avail unless you first press them out of every pore of the skin. This having been done, take one ounce of bitter almond paste, and one ounce of barley flour, mix these together with honey until they are smooth, and every night, with this paste, anoint the part affected.

FLORENCE BELGRAVE had better rub the gloves with a flannel dipped in spirits of hartshorn. C. C.—You may make a dangerous wound, by attempting to remove the mark you speak of. Do nothing in this case without the advice of a respectable medical man.

MARIE ALEXANDRINE.—We thank you for the praise you bestow on our French Lessons, and we are glad that you have found them so useful. You wish for a receipt to remove the stain of walnuts from your fingers. Have you tried lemon-juice? Should this not prove efficacious, mix four or five drops of oil of vitriol into a pint of water, and wash your hands with it, using no soap. A EST PERUTUS.—Scrape half a tea-spoonful of horseradish into a teacupful of new milk, and wash your face every morning with the mixture. Renew the milk and horseradish daily. You will find this wash whiten the skin.

A MECHANIC.—Such letters as that we have just received from "Mechanic," encourage us to proceed in our labours, and prove to us that the thought, time, and exertion given to promote the good of the working classes are not thrown away. With regard to "Mechanic's" question, as to what is the best proof of the goodness of a husband, we answer, the happiness of the wife. "Mechanic's" occupation seems to have prevented his keeping pace with the French Lessons. They commenced in No. 23. He had better procure the back numbers from the publishing office, and study when he can make it convenient so to do.

LOUISA.—Under the circumstances you have related, we think you would be justified in breaking off the engagement, but if your heart is really touched you should beware of hasty steps, lest, acting in haste, you repent at leisure.

SELINAS TOTTY.—The minister who confirmed you should be the last person to apply to on such a subject. He would reprove you seriously, and forgive us if we add, justly, for thinking about a young man when religious subjects claimed all your attention.

M. A. G.—All we wish you to pay is attention. Of course we cannot inform you whether our correspondent, "George," is or is not your fickle swain, for fickle he has proved himself. After carefully perusing your letter, it seems to us that his love for you is only aroused when you could most easily dispense with it, viz., when you have another admirer. A man who has more jealousy than affection in his nature, is likely to make a very harsh husband; and we should rather congratulate than pity you, were you never again to behold one through whom you have already suffered so much.

H. G. K.—Translations of difficult passages would take up too much space. Our correspondence is already so numerous, that we are obliged to adhere strictly to our rule, or we should never get through with the answers.

MARGARETTA FARSETTA can scarcely be serious in the question she has put, unless she has disposed of "her own young man" in the way Duncan would have treated his contemptuous Meggie, had she not relented, "she may go to France for me."

L. THOMAS.—Take a pound of moist sugar and two ounces of butter. Put them in a stew-pan over a moderate and a clear fire. Grate into the sugar about half a tea-spoonful of ginger. Let it simmer three-quarters of an hour, and mind you stir it all the time it is on the fire, or it will stick to the bottom. Pour it into buttered plates, and let it stand till it is cold.

ARCTURUS.—Joab was the son of Zeruah, and the nephew of David, of whose army he was commander-in-chief. See 2 Samuel ii. 13.

A. B. C.—The plural of scarf is scarves.

GOUTY JOE.—You can send three numbers of our paper by post to Bangalore, by affixing to them postage stamps to the amount of 4d.

STUBBS.—Under all the circumstances, and especially if you wish the arrangement to be final, you had better return the presents.

NORA.—It is provoking, just as one wishes to refresh oneself with lavender water or eau-de-cologne, to be unable to remove the glass stopper from the bottle. When next your patience is thus tried, we advise you to rub, with a feather, a drop or two of olive oil round the stopper, close to the mouth of the bottle or decanter, which must be then placed before the fire, at the distance of a foot or eighteen inches; in which position the heat will cause the oil to spread downward between the stopper and the neck. When the bottle has grown warm, gently strike the stopper on one side and on the other with any light wooden instrument. Then try it with the hand. If it will not yet move, place it again before the fire, adding another drop of oil. After three or four minutes, strike again as before; and, by persevering in this process, however tightly the stopper may be fastened in, you will at length succeed in loosening it.

B. T.—Gas was introduced for lighting the public streets in 1816, and it was first used in Birmingham.

FELIX.—The gun now at Windsor Castle, and which was taken from the Chinese, is an admirable piece of workmanship in brass. It weighs upwards of seven tons; it requires upwards of 30 lbs. of powder to load it, and it will carry a ball of 200 lbs. weight. It is a proof of greatly increased intelligence in the Chinese people, and shows that Lord Elgin contended with, and triumphed over, an enemy of no contemptible power.

S. E. M.—A receipt for making and using French polish will be found in No. 51, page 400.

PRECEPTOR.—Henry Ward Beecher is a son of the Venerable Dr. Lyman Beecher, and a brother of Mrs. H. Beecher Stowe, the renowned authoress of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," &c. He is a minister of the Presbyterian denomination in the United States, and is pursuing a career of great popularity and usefulness.

W. COULSON.—The word "news" is a plural form, but it is almost always united with a verb in the singular. "Good news has come across the sea," is, therefore, according to common usage.

A YOUNG MOTHER.—The only advice we can give you is to apply to the nearest magistrate. If you can make good your claim, he will give you an order.

A SUBSCRIBER FROM THE BEGINNING.—We do not undertake bookbinding. We decline to become empires on the "vexed question" of Mesmerism. Professor Faraday's plan of producing oxygen gas is given thus:—Coarsely powdered chlorate of potash, three parts; powdered biniodide of manganese, one part (both by measure); mix; put them into a flask or retort, and place it over the flame of a spirit lamp, when, in a few minutes, oxygen will be evolved with a rapidity entirely at the command of the operator, by either increasing or lessening the heat. "Fudge" is, to say the best of it, a very contemptuous expression, and you were decidedly wrong in using it on the occasion in question.

AN APPRENTICE.—An apprentice is not obliged to work on Sundays, but the profession of practising surgeon requires things to be done, such as making up prescriptions, &c., which are works of necessity and mercy, from which you cannot claim exemption. As to the menial employments to which you are put, they appear to be only such as most apprentices are required to perform, especially at the beginning of their course. Many a lad who began by cleaning up a surgery, has become an eminent practitioner.

SCOTLAND.—You run a great risk in selling any article of plate without a license.

A DISTRESSED PARENT.—You cannot "free your daughter from the thralldom of a jealous husband," unless you can prove acts of brutal violence or of infidelity. Your daughter's case is one of those sad instances of the evils arising from want of a thorough mutual knowledge of temper before marriage.

A SAILOR'S SISTER.—We have heard nothing of a presentation of portraits of the late Captain Peel to the sailors who served with him in the Crimea.

J. N. B.—You can procure a piece of loadstone at almost any philosophical instrument maker's or optician's.

A POOR YOUTH.—Pegasus is the name given to the fabled winged horse, belonging to Apollo and the Muses, said to have sprung from the blood of Medusa, when Perseus cut off her head. In some ancient sculptures, Pegasus is represented as flying through the air with Bellerophon on his back. The name is given also to one of the old constellations of the northern hemisphere, figured on the celestial globe in the form of a flying horse.

Respectfully declined.—To Milton; Church Bells; Hope; The Broken Heart; A Sister's Love; Wealth; The Consins; The Little Hand; A Farewell Lay to the Comet; A Storm at Sea; Beauties of Nature; Noon; Unrequited Love; Reflections on Reading some Verses, &c.; The Lovers; We Shall be Happy Yet; The Cloud before the Sun; Address to Greece; Lines written on a Spring Morning, &c.; The Glorious Heavens, &c.; The Sun was Sinking, &c.; An Adieu to Friends; Address to the Comet; The Comet's Farewell Advice; The Serenade; Death of a Miser; The Bereaved Emigrant; To my Love; Childhood; Reply to Nina; The Ball, by a Bachelor; Love thy Neighbour as Thyself; To a Maiden about to become a Bride; Twenty Years Ago, &c.; In Memoriam; Cawnpore; Long Ago; Hall, Blessed Sabbath; Sympathy; To the Comet; Dreams and Visions; Alas! Delicia Ruris; Lines addressed to my Sister; Loch Lomond; Havelock; Noon; To a Dear Friend; The Last Interview, &c.

THE SUBSTANCE AND THE SHADOW.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "SMILES AND TEARS," "DICK TARLETON,"
"PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE,"
"THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER VII.

Most wretched wight, whom nothing might suffice,
Whose greedy lust did lack in greatest store,
Whose need had end, but no end covetise,
Whose wealth was want, whose plenty made him poor,
Who had enough, yet wished evermore.

SPENSER.

WHEN Ephraim Sleek rushed from the presence of his child, the storm of passion that degraded him to the unmanly outrage of a blow was lulled, but not calmed; and at the sight of Hannah it broke forth with redoubled violence. She must have assisted Ruth in her disobedience; at least he suspected that she had, and the effect upon his temper was as great as though the irrefragable proofs of her complicity were before him.

"Whither hath the woman fled?" he demanded.

The little Quakeress fixed her large dark eyes upon him with a mingled expression of surprise and terror. "Answer me," he continued, seizing her shoulder with a grasp of iron.

"What meanest thou, master?" faltered the hand-maiden.

"The woman! the woman and the child!" he repeated, his features convulsed with rage. "I am robbed! plundered! and by my own child, too! Speak, or I will have thee dragged to a prison. Is this the reward of my charity in sheltering thee?"

Although greatly terrified by his threats, and still more so by the furious looks that accompanied them, the word charity roused the pride of Hannah, and enabled her to repress her tears.

"The bread that I have eaten has been the bread of labour, master," she made answer, "not of charity; bread hardly earned, as thou well knowest—and grudgingly bestowed. I will eat no more of it," she added, "but quit thy service."

"Thou, too?" screamed Ephraim, with a frantic laugh, that caused the rich blood to quit the cheeks of the speaker.

"Tell me the name of my father," she exclaimed; "and let me depart. I will be a burden unto no man's means."

The request appeared a very simple one; but it increased the rage of the old man till he absolutely foamed with passion. The spirit of evil that possessed him was unchained, and he no longer remained master of himself.

"The name of thy father!" he repeated, savagely; "the beggar snaps at the hand that fed her—the name of thy father! He had no name but Poverty; that is thy heritage. Yes, thou shalt go. I will thrust thee from my dwelling, to starve and howl for food. But first thou shalt confess unto me what hath become of the woman and the child!"

The grasp of the speaker tightened upon the shoulder of his servant, till the long, bony fingers became half buried in her fair and delicate flesh. He shook her violently, demanding, at the same time, with threats of violence, an answer to his question.

"I know not, master," gasped Hannah—"indeed, I know not."

"The spirit of lying is within thee! Thou wouldst know the name, too, of thy father? It is written on his coffin; thou shalt read it there!"

The screams of the terrified girl became appalling; but, instead of calming the madness of Ephraim Slek, they seemed rather to increase its fury. It really was insanity that now mastered alike both reason and prudence, as he clutched desperately at her throat, in order to stifle her cries.

Fortunately, his daughter heard them, and hastened into the room. It was not the first time she had beheld her wretched parent in a similar paroxysm, and her presence of mind did not desert her. Without the slightest sign of fear, she seized him by the arm, and tried to unloose his grasp.

"No! no!" she screamed; "she knows too much; let go your hold; I shall lose my gold—my gold—and thou wilt be left a beggar, Ruth!"

"Wouldst thou murder the orphan thou hast plundered?" exclaimed his indignant child. "Beware the hangman's hand!"

With her forefinger she rapidly drew a circle round the neck of the infuriated miser, scarcely touching the skin. The effect proved electrical. A convulsive shudder ran through his frame; every nerve seemed paralysed, his hold relaxed, and he sank into a chair subdued and helpless as an infant.

Ruth raised the terrified Hannah in her arms, kissed her, wept over her, and sought by endearing words to calm her agitation.

"He is mad," she whispered; "he must have been mad ere avarice could have driven him to this."

"Take me from him," murmured the child, for she was little more than one in years, although the unkindness of the world had made her prematurely a woman. "I cannot bear to look upon him again; he will kill me, I feel assured he will."

"Yes, yes," replied her mistress, confusedly. "Thou shalt leave this abode of misery; it is no longer a home for thee—alas! has it ever been a home for either of us? I know not where to find thee one, or provide the means; but quit this roof thou shalt."

"Thou, too, Ruth, thou wilt leave it?" exclaimed the girl.

The Quakeress regarded her father, as he still sat haggard, speechless, overwhelmed with shame and remorse.

"I am his child," she answered seriously, "and must not abandon him to the devices of his own evil heart. Come with me," she added, "and let us take counsel together."

Both the speakers quitted the room without the old man making the slightest effort to detain them.

For nearly an hour after their departure he remained motionless in his chair, his eyes intently fixed upon the sanded floor, as if the demon of avarice had whispered in his ear that the grains were of gold, and set him the hopeless task of counting them.

A loud knocking at the back of the house restored his power of volition, and Ephraim Slek passed his long bony hand once or twice athwart his clammy brow.

"She knows all," he muttered to himself—"all! I have often suspected that it was so, when I found her blue eyes fixed with such piteous earnestness upon my face. Indeed," he added, "it is a fearful thing to stand a guilt-convicted man before my own child; to feel that contempt is struggling with duty, abhorrence with affection; that she must despise even if she pities me."

"And yet," he added, after a pause, "it was for her sake that I toiled and signed to heap up wealth—it was all for her; who else should inherit it when I am dead?"

How many have saved their conscience with the same specious sophistry till they succeeded in persuading themselves that the motive sanctified the crime! A doctrine as monstrous in ethics as it is repugnant to reason.

The knocking at the door communicating with the yard was repeated.

"I had forgotten," he exclaimed, sighing like one just awakened from a dream; "I had forgotten."

As if a machine had been set in action, the features of the old man resumed their usual set expression; no trace of his recent agitation remained, unless it were a darker shade under his cold gray eye, and the slight dampness upon his forehead, which he wiped once or twice before admitting Jorrocks.

"The captain thinks you have forgotten him," observed the smuggler.

"I follow thee," replied Ephraim.

"There is no time to lose; the boat must start in a couple of hours, or we shall lose the tide. The money is all ready."

At this allusion to the price of his intended treachery—a price he now looked upon as lost—the miser winced.

"Why, what ails you?" demanded the speaker, eyeing him curiously.

"Nothing," answered the Quaker calmly; "we have all need of patience in this world, and mine has been sorely tried."

"Bah! if Mistress Ruth is tired of her cage, the fault is in yourself. Why don't you find her a husband?"

A grim smile rested for an instant on the lips of her father. He had not been so unobservant of the aims and hopes of the speaker as he imagined. Not that they gave him any great uneasiness; he knew his child too well to suspect for an instant she would ever fix her affections upon a man like his associate in fraud.

On proceeding to the counting-house, where Redmond O'Neil had passed the night, his host found him gloomy and impatient. The danger that menaced the outlawed rebel was not lightly to be sported with, his life hung in the balance, and he began to suspect something like treachery.

"Is this your promise?" he demanded. "I have waited, gnawing my heart with impatience. Are Katty and the infant on board?"

"No," answered his host; "they have fled from my dwelling."

"Villain!" exclaimed the fugitive, maddened by a second disappointment; "you have lied to me like a cur—betrayed—sold me."

The hand of the speaker clutched the hilt of the sword Jorrocks had supplied him with.

"Be calm, sir," said the latter, "and do not permit passion to blind your judgment; as for Ephraim's lying to you,—I have nothing to say to that; but his betraying you is quite out of the question, and for this simple reason:—It would not pay him. You know too much of our affairs, for either of us to run the risk of your disclosing them."

The reason appeared plausible enough; still Redmond did not feel satisfied.

"How was it?" continued the speaker, turning to the Quaker.

"My daughter," answered the old man, "suspected my intentions, and by her assistance the woman fled. It is not the first time," he added bitterly, "that her felly hath crossed me."

"If Ruth knew of it," observed Jorrocks, "I can understand it all. Although so meek and gentle, she would risk her life rather than abandon a dove that had nestled in her bosom for protection; but not even Ruth, with all her cleverness, could have managed it alone."

"No; that viper Hannah, whom I have fed from charity, aided her."

"And that sprigall, her cousin, no doubt," exclaimed the smuggler, his jealousy divining a clue which had escaped the penetration of her father.

"Thou art in error," replied the Quaker; "Reuben Geldart hath quitted my service, and is on his way to London."

"I'd rather have heard that news," observed the former in an exulting tone, "than that the Wren had foundered, or the Dolphin (the name of his own boat) made a successful run. When did he start?"

"At daybreak, by Kiplin's wagon."

"And you can't see it," exclaimed Jorrocks, in a tone of contempt; "I can. There is nothing lost yet. The woman and the brat are under his protection. Kiplin can't have got far. Not farther than Harble Downs," he added, after consulting a heavy silver watch which he drew from his pocket. "We shall overtake them."

A hurried consultation was held, in which it was decided that the speaker, Redmond, and Joe Kerl, should follow the wagon in a post-chaise, whose owner and driver were both members of the great smuggling confederacy.

The orders were given at once, and in a few minutes they were ready to start in pursuit of the fugitives.

Just as they were about to enter the vehicle, Ephraim Slek placed his hand upon the arm of O'Neil.

"Thou art a man of courage," he said, "and a soldier; but I bid thee beware of my thriftless nephew, Reuben; from the foreign captains who frequent the port, he hath acquired a cunning knowledge of defence, and handleth the sword better than the pen."

Redmond listened with a quiet smile.

"Slight not my warning," added the old man; "it is not to be trifled with; ask thy companion, who hath tempted and proved him."

Jorrocks, who was carefully examining the priming of his pistols, coloured deeply at the words.

"Thou wilt do well, therefore, to deal roundly with him, and let no consideration for me restrain thy hand."

Having uttered this last recommendation, the Quaker withdrew his hand from the arm of Redmond, and stood watching the post-chaise as it drove off.

"There is one upon his track that hateth him," he muttered, "and hath the tiger's true scent for blood; the other, if I read him rightly, albeit of a nobler nature, never yet spared man that crossed his path. Umph! the chances are that Reuben had better have remained in my service; the place in the counting-house of his mother's relatives may still remain unfilled. The fault is not mine," he added. "I did not drive him forth."

Retracing his steps, the old man walked towards the house. As he approached it, a feeling of remorse or shame at the violence he had so lately displayed restrained him. And yet he was one of those men who scorn to yield to the reproaches of conscience. When they became too loud, he had but to calculate the amount of his wealth, and its voice was silenced. It was the glance of his daughter that he feared to meet—his child, the only being he had ever loved, knew him, and the consciousness that she did so was the commencement of his punishment.

"I will walk to the beach," he said, "and see that the boat is ready."

No sooner did Ruth, who had been watching him from the window of her chamber, witness his departure, than, taking Hannah with her, she set forth to visit the mother of Reuben.

The cottage inhabited by the aged Quakeress stood in a little garden on the outskirts of the town. Although exceedingly prim, there was nothing cold or cheerless in its aspect. The windows, with their half-drawn muslin curtains, were scrupulously clean, and the door and shutters, of a dark chocolate colour, looked as if they had been freshly painted.

The widow recognised her niece as she walked up the pathway of the garden, and opened the door to receive her.

No wonder that Reuben dearly loved his mother; for never were benevolence, goodness of heart, and simple, unaffected piety more legibly written than on the features of Sarah Geldart. Her face had once been beautiful, nay, was so still, although sorrow and time had long since conspired to rob her cheeks of their freshness, and trace the lines of care on her once smooth forehead, whose breadth was partially concealed by the formal white muslin cap she wore, and the silvery hair parted on either side of it.

Like most of the sect of which she was a rigid but conscientious member, sister Geldart rarely yielded to any outward display of feeling; indulgent as charity itself in her judgment of others, she would have considered any such weakness sinful in herself; and though still secretly grieving for the departure of her son, she welcomed Ruth with her usual quiet, affectionate smile.

What the violence of her father, his brutal manner, and blow had failed to effect, the first words of kindness her aged relative pronounced succeeded in doing—they unsealed the fountains of her heart; and, throwing her arms around her neck, Ruth wept like a child upon her breast.

"Nay, nay, this is unwise," said her aunt, leading her into the parlour, which, though scantily furnished, contained a few memorials of her more prosperous days; "the grief that afflicts us becometh lighter when borne with patience. Retire to the keeping-room, Hannah," she added, addressing the companion of her niece; "peradventure, thy mistress would speak with me alone."

The little handmaiden, who stood greatly in awe of sister Geldart, not from her severity, but her goodness, at once obeyed, and the relatives were left together.

"This is wrong, Ruth," observed the aged woman, seeing that her tears still continued to flow; "this trial should be borne with patience."

"Few have known a sorrow like mine," replied the weeping girl; an observation to which her aunt made no reply, unless an involuntary glance at the portrait of her son, suspended over the chimney-piece, might be considered one.

Ruth proceeded to describe the fit of madness which had seized her father, the violent aversion he had conceived against the servant, his threat of thrusting her from his house, and her own fears for the poor girl's safety; but not a hint of the old man's motives, or of the outrage offered to herself—they remained fast locked in her own pure, gentle, and forgiving heart. She judged, and rightly so, that it was not for the child to unveil the sin of the father. Her aunt suspected this, and loved her the better for her silence.

"Ephraim Sleek is a strange man," she observed; "but, as thou sayest, it must have been insanity that led him to such violence. Thou knowest that I am poor," she added, in a tone which betrayed regret rather than resentment, "yet what I can I will do to save the husband of my dead sister and the father of her child from himself and from disgrace, perchance. Let sister Hannah abide with me. Mine is the widow's mite, but she shall share it."

"I knew thou wouldst not refuse me!" exclaimed her niece, whose mind felt greatly relieved by the result of her visit. "Thou art too good—too—"

"Tut, tut," interrupted the aunt, somewhat impatiently, "thou knowest that our people delight not in flattery."

"It is no flattery to speak the truth," replied Ruth, kissing the cheek of her aged relative, "and I repeat it, thou art good, for are not patience and forgiveness virtues?"

The mother of Reuben regarded her long and earnestly; possibly an idea crossed her that the speaker knew something of the means by which, on the death of her husband, his partner had so confused the accounts, that, of the large capital brought into the firm, a scanty pittance alone remained for the widow and her son. And yet it was scarcely probable, so many years had elapsed, the circumstance having occurred before Ephraim, tempted by his insatiate thirst of gain, had leagued himself with the smugglers.

If such were her suspicions, she dismissed them at once from her mind as useless. Her principles were opposed to any attempt at leading the daughter to betray the father.

Hannah was called into the room: when informed that she was to remain with sister Geldart, she burst into tears.

"I will return with thee, Ruth!" she exclaimed; "perhaps thy father's anger hath abated, and in truth I know not how I caused it; terrible as it is, I will bear it, rather than separate from thee."

The widow regarded her kindly.

"I cannot rest," continued the girl, "and know that thou art in that fearful house alone with him—no one to cheer thee, to give thee courage, or speak a word of kindness when the dark fit comes on him."

"This is childish," observed her mistress; "my father would not harm me."

"Not harm thee!" said the handmaiden; "did I not hear the blow?"

Ruth pressed her in her arms to prevent the disclosure; but it was too late; the word had escaped her.

"A blow!" repeated her aunt, her pale face flushed with indignation; "Ruth! Ruth! why hast thou concealed this from me? Would that my son were here. Peradventure," she continued, after a few moments' reflection, "it is better as it is; he hath an impetuous nature. I will see thy father."

"Believe me, it was the first time, and struck in madness," said her niece; "why seek a meeting that can only pain thee?"

"Because it is my duty," was the simple, unaffected answer. "But few words of late years have passed between Ephraim Sleek and myself; had it been otherwise, it might have been better."

However considerate of the feelings of others, when Sarah Geldart once pronounced a thing to be her duty, it was perfectly useless to make any attempt to turn her from her purpose—a peculiarity her niece had long been aware of; she resigned herself, therefore, patiently, though not without terrible misgivings, to the interview between her aunt and her father, which had now become unavoidable.

Before describing this, it may be as well to follow the stage wagon, which had been dragging its "slow length along" since daybreak.

There is nothing more tedious when the mind is greatly excited than confinement of any kind: we pant to breathe the open air, to exercise our limbs, to escape, as it were, from ourselves. The walls of a palace under such circumstances change to those of a prison; we require space, wide as our thoughts, and action unbounded as their range, to calm the fever of the brain.

It was not to be wondered at, after all she had endured, that Katty felt this nervous restlessness, and declined the repeated invitation of Kiplin the wagoner, and her young protector, to mount and ride. She preferred walking by their side, carrying little Redmond on her arm, carefully protected from the bleak easterly wind that swept the downs, beneath her ample shawl.

Reuben offered more than once to relieve her of her burden.

"Burthin," repeated the nurse, "sure he is no burthin. The critch (cripple), when God has made her a mother, does not feel the weight of her child; how, then, should I?"

"Is the infant yours?" inquired the young man. "My foster-sister's, sir," answered the faithful creature, her eyes filling with tears, "and the same as my own gosssoon now."

"Gos what?" said the driver, with a broad grin. "Does 'ee understand her, Maister Geldart? It be my belief she be a furriner—her words don't sound English loike; but she be a decentish sort o' body, I should say, for all that. I wonder what brought her to this part o' the country?"

"Sorrow," said the woman.

There was something so sad in the tone in which she pronounced the word, that even the wagoner felt touched by it, and he muttered to himself several times, "poor thing! poor thing!"

"Don't 'ee be uneasy," he added, "bout the fare; the horses be mine, and the wagon be mine—and dang it, I won't be hard on 'ee."

Although convinced that the offer was made in kindness, his passenger hastily assured him that she had means to pay every reasonable demand. Katty had a full share of her country's pride.

"It's the arm of a thrue friend I require," she observed, "and not charity."

"A friend!" repeated Kiplin. "Don't 'ee be afraid. Maister Reuben be no chicken. He has gotten his hanger w' him—I wonder what th' old lady would say to it!—and I ha' gotten a pair of arms, w' a couple of fists at th' end on 'em."

The young Quaker looked slightly confused at the allusion to his mother, whose strict notions would have disapproved of her son carrying arms, even in self-defence.

"It be all right," whispered the rustic. "I'll not tell un."

The roads, no unusual thing in those days, were exceedingly heavy, and the huge, lumbering machine advanced but slowly, the driver being frequently obliged to urge his horses to violent effort to extricate the broad wheels from the deep ruts, in which the rain and mud had settled.

It was whilst the wagoner was in one of these predicaments, that the post-chaise containing Redmond and his companions overtook them.

As the blinds of the chaise were down, Katty, who supposed the inmates to be lawful travellers, did not recognise her pursuers till they leaped from the vehicle. Before she could utter a cry for assistance, or think even of flight—although such an attempt must have been useless—the fierce hand of Jorrocks had snatched the infant from her arms.

He would have passed it to his employer, but the latter shudderingly rejected it.

"Give it to your companion," he muttered, hoarsely.

Joe Kerl received the helpless innocent, and retreated with it into the chaise.

"Madman!" shrieked the distracted foster-sister of the wronged and martyred Ellen; "would yez have the blood of your own child upon your soul?"

"I have already told you that I no longer seek its life."

"It will be murder, I tell yez," said the woman, falling on her knees and clinging to him; "murder, as if yez dashed the head of him against the ground. He must die widout me! Redmond," she added, "is the nature of yez changed? Remember her that has gone before—whose thrue heart yez have broken is looken down upon yez, grieving for her child!"

Although the purpose of the deceived and unhappy man remained unchanged, he at once recognised the necessity of not separating the infant from its nurse; and, raising the speaker in his arms, he placed her in the chaise.

Joe Kerl, who felt somewhat embarrassed by his charge, willingly resigned it to her; and Katty once more clasped the child of her foster-sister to her breast.

"Wisht! then, darlin'! wisht!" she murmured, as her tears fell fast upon his innocent face. "This is the sorest strait of all!"

Meanwhile, Reuben Geldart had not been idle. The action had passed so rapidly, that before he could recover from his surprise the woman and the infant were already in the vehicle. He attacked the smuggler, however, whom he recognised, vigorously—determined that he should not escape.

"Hold on!" shouted the driver, "I ha' gotten a blunderbus in th' waggon. I'll pepper un! It be somewhere here. I'll find un."

Before the speaker could execute his praiseworthy intention, the report of a pistol rang in the air, and the young Quaker lay stretched upon the down, bathed in his blood.

Jorrocks indulged in one of his quiet chuckles as he mounted the box. Snatching the reins from the hands of the driver, he wheeled the horses round and drove off.

"Dang thee! I know thee!" shouted the wagoner after him; "and I'll hang thee for this day's work, if I sell the best horse i' the team to pay lawyers."

Raising the body of Reuben, who still breathed, from the ground, he placed it gently in the wagon, and pursued his way towards the nearest house in search of assistance.

Meanwhile, the assassin and his companions, dashing along the road at a fearful rate, retraced the route to Dover.

"A bad day's work," said the post-boy, who felt anything but comfortable at the scene he had witnessed. "That's not the way," he added, seeing that Jorrocks had taken a direction leading to the beach instead of the town.

"It's my way," replied the ruffian, coolly.

In less than a couple of hours from the carrying off of Katty and the child the party were embarked on board the Dolphin; the sails were set, and the smugglers' skiff, light as a sea bird on the water, ploughing through the waves towards the coast of France.

CHAPTER VIII.

A great man struggling with the storms of fate,
And greatly falling in a falling state.

ADDISON.

WHILST the events described in our last chapter were taking place, things had not gone exactly smooth at Plaxted. Lieutenant Elvey was about to start on a cruise in the Wren, and breakfast had been ordered an hour earlier than usual at the parsonage.

Dr. Tidlow and his guest had not been long seated at table, before Pike and Bryce, the police officers, whom the worthy magistrate had sent for from Dover, arrived to take charge of the prisoner.

They were both resolute, experienced men, accustomed to deal with far more serious cases than those which came under the cognisance of the village constable, Jacob Bumps.

"The gentleman whom it has been my painful duty to commit," observed the magistrate, "is no ordinary criminal."

"Murder, sir?" demanded Pike, in a most business-like tone.

"No, no," exclaimed the gentleman, hastily, "thank heaven, not so bad as that—he is charged with treason. I thought it better to send for you. The Plaxted constable," he added, "is a very excellent, trustworthy person, no doubt; but a little nervous. In fact, I considered that the prisoner was less likely to escape from your custody than his."

"We know Mr. Bumps, your worship," drily observed Bryce.

The warrant, which had been made out the preceding evening, was placed in their hands, and the officers proceeded at once to the lock-up, to take charge of Redmond.

"I cannot help feeling something like regret at the share I have taken in the capture of this unfortunate gentleman," said the lieutenant. "He certainly is a gallant fellow, and defended himself bravely. I trust no very serious consequences will result."

"As far as life is concerned, I think not," replied the doctor; "the government is too merciful for that."

"And yet they hang a man for stealing a sheep," observed Elvey.

When the constables arrived at the lock-up, they discovered, to their surprise, the outer door unfastened but closed. Pushing it open, they entered the room where the unfortunate Bumps, only a few hours previously, had been seated in conscious dignity, indulging in dreams that—well, well, we can feel for a noble ambition blighted in the bud.

That theme really is too painful a one to pursue it any further.

The broken table, the venerable insignia of parochial and civil authority lying on the ground, gave the officers the first intimation of what had taken place.

"Whew!" said Pike, drawing a long breath, "the bird has flown."

"Not so—there are two birds instead of one in the cage," observed his companion, peering through the grated door of the inner cell.

"Bring them out, then."

The bolts were withdrawn, and the crest-fallen Bumps, whose scratched face bore mute witness to his having passed a most uncomfortable night with his termagant wife, crept with a sheepish air into the light.

His stronger-minded better-half followed.

On recognising their rustic colleague, the Dover constables yielded to a hearty fit of laughter. Every note of their heartless cachinnation inflicted an additional pang upon the wounded spirit of Jacob.

As Burke observed, only a few years later, "The age of chivalry has passed away; there really is no sympathy with fallen greatness."

"What have you done with your prisoner?" demanded Mr. Pike, as soon as he could recover his gravity.

"Escaped."

The groan of mental anguish that accompanied the word, proved how humiliated the speaker felt by the admission.

"Escaped?" repeated the officer.

"Yes," exclaimed Mrs. B., in a spiteful tone; "and all because that drivelling, insignificant little wretch had not the courage of a man to prevent it."

"If you had not insisted on bringing Joe Kerl into the lock-up, my love—"

A look from his wife reminded him of his promise not to betray her share in the transaction.

"Joe Kerl," said Bryce, "I have heard of that fellow; the excise have long been on the look out to trap him."

Bumps devoutly wished that they had succeeded a week ago.

"And so you brought him with you?" added the officer.

"I am not answerable to you for whom I brought with me!" replied the woman, tartly; "the prisoner was not in my keeping."

"But you are to the magistrates," suggested the officer.

"Yes; perhaps so," muttered the lady, who prudently meditated a retreat. "I will just step down to the parsonage, and explain it all to the rector."

Drawing her shawl around her, she would have quitted the roundhouse, had not the constables prevented her.

"We will walk with you," said Pike. "Can't let you go alone."

"But I insist upon going. I won't be detained. I—there! there!"

Long immunity frequently leads to danger. Mrs. B. had for so many years been accustomed to tyrannise over her meek, uncomplaining little husband, that she looked upon all men with a kind of Amazonian contempt. To her astonishment she discovered there were persons not quite so easy to deal with. Her frantic attempts to scratch the face of the officer were met by a very decided measure; he most ungallantly slipped a pair of handcuffs on her wrists.

"Jacob!" she screamed, stamping with rage; "will you see me treated thus? Knock them down, take them into custody. I insist upon it."

"It's the law, my love," observed the fallen dignitary, in a tone of sublime resignation; "you never would respect it."

"Respect it," repeated his wife, eyeing him with contempt. "Well!"

A volume, perhaps never to be written, was implied in that monosyllable "well."

"Sorry to be hard upon you, but the affair looks serious; the prisoner was charged with treason. I must do my duty."

As he concluded his observation, the redoubtable Mr. Pike drew a second pair of handcuffs from his capacious pocket.

"I know you must," said Jacob, meekly, and at the same time holding out his hands with the air of a martyr. "I suppose I shall be sent to the Tower."

Fallen as he was, there was some consolation in the idea of being considered a state prisoner.

If anything could have added to the bitter humiliation of Bumps, it was his meeting the village children on their way to school, as he quitted the Roundhouse. At first, they could not comprehend that the object of their terror was in custody; but, as the suspicion that such was the case became a certainty, a loud shout expressed their satisfaction; and, instead of proceeding to the school, the greater number of them turned and followed the procession.

A few, more hardy still, penetrated into the lock-up, and discovered the beadle's staff and hat.

Despite his entreaties, indignant remonstrances, and utterly regardless of the dignity of their colleague, the officers marched him and his wife prisoners through the straggling street of Plaxted.

Bumps never forgot the agony of that hour; he felt that his moral authority over the inhabitants was at an end, the constitution of the village gone—annihilated, by the outrage on his person.

One sturdy little fellow, not more than ten, had seized upon his hat—his gold-laced hat, that had a corner of which had been sufficient to frighten a whole troop of them from the churchyard—and carried it in triumph before him.

Mrs. B. followed, in a state of concentrated rage no words can describe.

From every door and window curious heads were thrust to watch the procession. An earthquake could scarcely have occasioned more excitement.

A crowd followed; some laughing, others pointing at the prisoners.

There was something sublime in the solemn, majestic grief of Bumps contrasted with the fury of his wife. His dignity in his present degraded position did not abandon him till a ragged little rascal, the one who had first discovered the beadle's staff in the roundhouse, overtook him, trailing it between his legs, as children will do when they pretend to ride cockhorse upon their grandfather's cane.

Then the mighty soul of the prisoner gave way, his fortitude abandoned him, and he wept bitterly.

Great was the astonishment of the worthy rector and his guest, who had not yet quitted the breakfast-table, when they beheld the procession winding along the trim gravel walks of the garden, on its way to the parsonage-house.

"Bless me!" he exclaimed; "what can have occurred?"

He rang to ascertain the cause of such an unusual assembly.

"The prisoner has escaped, sir," said Fitch, the butler, who answered the bell, "and they are bringing Bumps and his wife before you."

Dr. Titlow and the lieutenant hastened to the justice-room. The former not greatly displeased, perhaps, at the turn the affair had taken; not but that the clergyman was an exceedingly loyal man. He would have condemned every rebel, past, present, and future, to the last penalty of the law in theory, and have pardoned them every one in practice.

In other words, his heart governed his head; and we confess a liking for such characters: strength is not the only thing to be admired in this world; there is a beauty in weakness, especially when it inclines on the side of humanity.

It was some time before anything like a distinct account could be obtained from the unfortunate beadle, whose wife contradicted him at every word.

"Really, I scarcely know what to do with him," observed the rector. "Bumps appears to have acted more like a fool than a knave: I can't comprehend his conduct."

"Your reverence forgets that I am married," suggested the fallen dignitary, in a very humble tone.

"And that noisy, tergiversant woman—"

"Is my wife," please your worship.

Despair must have armed the speaker with desperate courage, or he never could have endured the look his better half darted at him.

The gentlemen saw it, and the affair appeared much more intelligible to both of them.

"I suppose," said Dr. Titlow, "you had better take them both to Dover. I will ride over during the morning, and consult with my brother magistrates."

"It's not my fault!" screamed the virago, "and I won't go to Dover. The man was not in my care. You have no right to send me to Dover."

"Do keep your wife silent!" said the gentleman.

Jacob regarded the speaker with an air of such profound astonishment, that it was impossible to repress a smile—it was positively eloquent, and demanded how he was to accomplish such a miracle, as plainly as if he had asked it in so many words.

"Is it necessary to keep him handcuffed?" demanded the lieutenant, who had frequently been amused by the pompous strut and ludicrous importance of the prisoner.

"No, sir," answered Pike, "he is as peaceable as a child; an infant might frighten him. I only put them on for form's sake."

The magistrate directed that they should be removed.

"As for his wife," added the officer, "I don't mind her tongue—I have a wife of my own—but I can't stand her claws. So, with your worship's permission," he said, "I'll just leave hers on."

"Certainly," said the rector, "if you think it advisable for your safety."

Dr. Titlow was naturally a kind-hearted man, and felt for the misfortunes of his beadle. To spare him the mortification of being again marched through the village, he offered the constables the use of a light spring cart.

As the prisoners were removed from the parsonage, Jacob enjoyed one spark of consolation. The boy—the desperate little ruffian—who had trailed the ensign of office between his legs, proved to demonstration that the gilded staff was a thing of common wood, and might be handled with impunity—ventured within his reach. It was not in human nature to resist. Springing from the side of Bryce, who had him in charge, Bumps seized the luckless rebel by the collar, wrenched the emblem of parochial government from his hands, and then cuffed him soundly.

The crowd of noisy urchins drew back; their former terror of him returned, and for an instant as he gazed sternly around him, Bumps felt himself once more a beadle and a constable.

Having achieved this triumph, Regulus himself could not have returned to captivity with greater dignity.

Even the gravity of the rector yielded to the sense of the ridiculous the outbreak suggested.

"I must ride over at once," he said, turning to the lieutenant; "can't suffer this poor, hen-pecked simpleton to pay too dearly for his weakness. Good-bye, Charles; a prosperous sail."

The commander of the "Wren" shook hands with him, and they parted—the former to Dover, the latter to Folkestone.

It must be a glorious feeling to hold the command of a noble vessel that seems almost endowed with intelligence as it answers to the helm, and gallantly dashes through the water "like a thing of life." Elvey felt this, and trod the deck of his little cutter with a feeling of independence a prince might have envied.

No wonder sailors are proud of their ships, and describe them in terms of affection. What can be more graceful than the tall, stately masts, the slender spars, the ropes drawn with the mathematical precision of a spider's web?

It was evident from the proceedings on board that the Wren was about to start upon a voyage. The anchor was already raised, when a boat pushed off from the shore and came alongside.

"Ship a-hoy!" shouted a voice from the stern.

The lieutenant looked over the side, and, to his great surprise, recognised Pike, holding up a letter.

A rope was thrown to him, and in a few seconds the Dover constable stood on board.

"What has occurred?" anxiously inquired the young commander. "Nothing, I trust, to my worthy friend?"

"The rector is quite well, sir," replied the officer, "but a murder has been attempted upon a young Quaker, Reuben Geldart, who is badly wounded, and a woman and child carried off, by the person who escaped from the roundhouse at Plaxted."

Elvey hastily perused the letter.

"The ruffians left Dover more than an hour since in the Dolphin."

"The Dolphin!" repeated the lieutenant; "I have long been on the look out for her. An hour's start, did you say? If the wind holds fair, we shall catch her before making Calais harbour."

The orders were rapidly given, and as promptly executed. Before ten minutes had elapsed, the Wren was ploughing through the water with every stitch of canvas set.

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

SELF-MADE MEN.

DR. ALEXANDER MURRAY.

It is not only as successful inventors that examples are afforded of self-made men. There are instances of those who, without money or means, surrounded by every circumstance calculated to dishearten the most ambitious of students, have, nevertheless, persevered in their pursuits of knowledge, and have at length risen to positions of eminence as profound linguists and accomplished scholars. Of this, a remarkable instance is furnished in the case of Dr. Alexander Murray.

This eminent man was born in a little parish called Minnigaff, Scotland, on the 22nd of October, 1775. His father at the time of Alexander's birth was nearly seventy years of age; a mature but hale and hearty parent. To his father Alexander was indebted for the rudiments of his education. A Catechism, with an alphabet in it was the text-book used, and esteemed as a treasure of such price that it was never delivered into the hands of the pupil. "As it was too good a book for me to handle at all times," says the doctor, "it was generally locked up, and he, throughout the winter, drew the figures of the letters to me, in his written hand, on the board of an old wool-card, with the black end of an extinguished heather stem, or root snatched from the fire. I soon learned all the alphabet in this form, and became a writer as well as reader."

Among the lowly it is at all times difficult to step beyond the narrow limits of their occupation. All Mr. Murray's sons were shepherds, and at the age of seven or eight, Alexander became one as a matter of course. He was not destined to succeed in this calling, and was often blamed by his father as lazy and useless. He was too much given to books and writing on boards with charcoal, to pay attention to the flocks. He became a remarkable peasant boy and a very bad shepherd.

His prospects in life were considered decidedly gloomy by his parents and brothers. But in May, 1784, an uncle came to the cottage, and, struck with the remarkable brightness of the youth, offered to take him to New Galloway for a short time and put him to school. The advantages which might have accrued from this act of kindness were unimproved through the ill health of Alexander. He was in the school but two months, when it became necessary that he should return home. Here he resumed his old employment as a shepherd, with a literary turn for boards and charcoal pencils. Whenever by good fortune he obtained a sixpence, he disbursed it instantly on ballads and penny histories: these established his reputation as a prodigy in the neighbourhood.

In 1787, Alexander was able to extend considerably his course of reading: a friend lent him a translation of "Josephus" and "Salmon's Geographical Grammar," works that he perused with such avidity that he remembered their contents to the end of his life. He was now twelve years of age, very clever at everything except taking care of sheep. It was necessary that he should maintain himself; and, with this object in view, he became private teacher in the families of two neighbouring farmers, from whom he received sixteen shillings for an entire winter. With this money he procured an edition of Cocker, and studied arithmetic up to the rule of three: he likewise obtained other books and read them with considerable profit.

Much to the delight of Alexander, circumstances permitted him once more to become a student at the school at Minnigaff to the extent of three days' attendance per week. He made the most of his opportunity; but it was a brief one, for in six weeks he had to look after his own living again—that is to say, to teach what he knew to the children of the neighbouring farmers.

In 1790, he again attended school for about three months, and it was during this term that he conceived the idea of becoming a scholar. His first impulse he attributes to the curiosity awakened by perusing in Salmon's Geography a transcript of the Lord's Prayer translated into a variety of living and dead languages. About the same time he resolved to fit himself, if possible, for the duties of a clerk. During the few weeks he remained at school, he obtained a grammatical knowledge of the English language, and commenced the study of French and Latin. After leaving school he purchased an old copy of Ainsworth's Latin Dictionary, and "literally read it through." His method of studying was remarkable. He read the dictionary backwards and forwards, and took recreation in the grammar, in Caesar, or (by way of dissipation) in Ovid. In something less than eighteen months, he mastered the principal difficulties of four languages, the French, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and read several of the best authors in each, all this, too, in spite of innumerable and discouraging interruptions.

The winter of 1791 was passed in teaching, and he earned thirty-five or forty shillings; so that he was able to return to school for the last time in the summer of 1792, remaining three months and a half. The different periods of school attendance, added together, make about thirteen months, scattered over a period of nearly eight years. From November, 1792, till the March of the following spring, he was once more employed in teaching, at a salary of 30s. During this time he prosecuted his studies vigorously, and by reading the classic poets, and Milton; and he believed himself capable of writing an epic poem. After perpetrating several thousand lines, he had the good sense to feel and acknowledge that he was not yet fitted for the task, and the firmness—remarkable in a young poet—to commit his crude verses to the flames. Far more practical was his next literary effort, which consisted of a translation from the Latin of a series of lectures by a German professor. With this work under his arm, he repaired to Dumfries, in 1794; but neither of the two publishers in the place would undertake the risk of publication. He then prepared a small volume of poems, in the Scottish dialect; but Burns, to whom he showed them, advised him not to publish them. The object that laughed. The degree of D.D. was now conferred upon him, and he entered on the discharge of his functions with an ardour which led to the most untimely result. The preparation of his lectures, supervision of philological works, the rendering of new translations, the prosecution of fresh studies, were undertaken and accomplished at the price of health. Dr. Murray could not be persuaded that he was sick and failing, nor indeed did he know it until it was too late. He kept his bed for one day only, and died in the thirty-eighth year of his age, at a time when all that could gratify a scholar was within his grasp. He left behind him a reputation and an example worthy of the imitation of all who are struggling against "low birth and iron fortune."

young Murray had in view was to raise the means, in some way or other, of defraying his expenses at college. It was natural that he should feel downhearted and dispirited at these reverses.

To a very humble admirer Murray was indebted for his first step in advance. This was a pedlar, of the name of M'Harg, who knew Murray well, and who was in the habit of sounding his praise as a genius wherever he went. Among others to whom he spoke on the subject, was Mr. James Kinneir, of Edinburgh, then a journeyman printer in the King's printing-office. Mr. Kinneir—with a zeal in behalf of unfriended merit which does him infinite honour—immediately suggested that Murray should transmit LESSONS IN DRAWING.—No. III.

14. The importance of acquiring method in forming lines and tints will be felt in practising the examples in figure 12. The pupil will also begin to appreciate the power of lines, in expressing tints, and in giving detail of form to simple outlines. In all of these there is one common outline, varied by divisions and tints.

15. Figure 13, formed of straight lines and right angles, will show the importance of a clear and accurate outline, which, when once obtained, may be with ease worked into endless variations. The pupil should first draw the simple outline of A, upon the an account of himself, and some evidences of his attainments, to Edinburgh; which he undertook to lay before some of the literary characters of that city. Murray was, of course, too happy to act on this suggestion; and the result exceeded his most sanguine expectations. The professors of the University were astonished at his attainments, and at once threw open their classes, and provided for his maintenance while attending them. Assistance he did not long need. In the city he found plenty of employment for his pen, and good remuneration for the exercise of his acquirements.

The struggles of this remarkable youth were now at an end. He remained in Edinburgh until 1806, having in the interval passed through the course of principles laid down in former examples (11). Having accomplished that, let him next draw the interline, as shown at B; after which, he can express the tint or shadow on C. Next, let him draw the faint line, near the inner edge of the outline (A) he has already done, as D: then proceed with E, always observing to draw the outline of the tint or shadow first.

16. The examples in figure 14 present forms of less simplicity, yet forms which are equally regular and balanced in the relation of the parts to each other. They are given, not only for practice, but to show the motive or method of their construction. If the pupil were to attempt to draw the fourth or fifth figure, for instance, by a mere outline, he would encounter great difficulty, and fail of success; but let him study well made the acquaintance of an Anglo-Saxon alphabet, which was his introduction to the northern languages. He obtained also a treatise in Welsh, and, without dictionary or grammar, set about making it out. "I mused a good deal on the quotations of Scripture that abound in it," he says, "and got acquainted with many Welsh words and sentences. If I had a copy of the Bible in any language of which I knew the alphabet, I could make considerable progress in learning it, without grammar or dictionary. This is done by minute observation, and comparison of words, terminations, and phrases."

In the autumn of 1792, Murray's ambition took a new direction. His imagination had become inflamed studies necessary to qualify him for the Scottish Church. His fondness for languages remained unabated; one by one he mastered the Oriental and Northern languages and of the Ethiopic and Abyssinian dialects he had a more critical knowledge than any European of his day. This circumstance led him to undertake a new edition of Bruce's Travels, a work which at once placed him in the foremost rank of Oriental scholars.

In 1806 he left Edinburgh to assume the duties of a minister, and for six years officiated as a clergyman of the parish of Urr, in Dumfriesshire. From this honoured field of labour he was recalled to the university, to fill the professor's chair of Oriental the principle upon which that outline is produced, and he will not only be able to draw it correctly, but systematically. This principle of Design deserves important consideration; and will, hereafter, be often reverted to, when its true meaning and application will be better understood and appreciated by the learner.

17. One more example of objects formed of straight lines is given in fig. 15, to show, in some degree, the application of what has, thus far, occupied the attention of the pupil, and should be copied as carefully as possible, first on the ruled paper; observing well the parts or forms the lines present as they cross the dotted or faint lines; recalling to memory all that has been before said, especially with regard to the importance of ascertaining the point of beginning and ending, as well as direction of each line. When some degree of precision is acquired on the ruled paper, try it without—on the slate—the blackboard—every way; and then try your memory, and see if it will serve you as it ought. See if you can draw a gate, a table, or a box, without the object before you. He who can draw nothing but what he has before him, loses the best half of the art. Begin at once in the right way—the surest to success. Unless the mind add the riches of its resources to the efforts of the hand and eye, and you call them forth as you are progressively capable of using them to advantage, you can never expect to reap the full harvest of your present labours.

Fig. 16.

Fig. 17.

18. Thus far, attention has been directed only to the drawing of straight lines; and, if proper care and study have been bestowed upon the principles laid down, and the hand has been taught to keep pace with the understanding of these principles, the few examples to be given in the drawing of curves will be all that is required before the student is introduced to the great school of Art—the imitation of nature. Let him be advised not to hurry forward too rapidly—to gain strength as he goes—to confine his efforts to what he can accomplish, rather than run the risk of failure in attempts beyond his power.

19. Again (2) let the importance of a clear, firm, and well-defined line be urged. "Think before you draw," is as important a maxim as "Think before you speak." Determine well the point of beginning and termination, the direction and form of every line, before you touch your paper. Now is the time to school your hand to this habit; which, when once acquired, will render progressive studies comparatively easy, and hereafter serve you well in your attempts, however far you may pursue the art of drawing. A manner of dashing off random lines or touches, as if in search of the true line (fig. 16), betrays weakness and indecision—besides, it produces a painful display of the labour the work has cost. The ease apparent in the sketch of a master hand, that is so captivating (fig. 17), is the result of absence of any appearance of hesitation or doubt. If any were felt in its execution, it is a secret known only to the artist himself, who should always possess the judgment to look rather to results, than the ostentatious display of the labour of their accomplishment. The examples given will enable the student, by comparison, better to understand what is to be avoided.

20. In the directions hitherto given, with regard to the drawing of straight lines, the ruled paper afforded a more certain guide than it will be found to be in curves and irregular forms. The straight, or right line, must be the basis, however, upon which to form the true observation and delineation of them. A right line is certain and arbitrary; and the eye must be well accustomed to measure the deviation of irregular lines and curves from a right line, in order to express that deviation by the hand. The faculty of ascertaining and expressing the degree and character of these variations, is a most important acquirement in drawing. Hereafter, in its proper place, more will be said in reference to circles, ovals, &c., as presenting the motive of lines and forms; but, it is important that the pupil should go step by step, and, as far as possible, master one difficulty before he encounters another.

21. Let him attempt to draw the curved lines represented in the accompanying diagram (fig. 18), the most simple curve (1) or eccentric line (2), and he will find it, probably, no easy task to perform with accuracy; and even if measurably successful, at first, to repeat it would be more difficult. But, if he has a right line from which to mark the variations (3 and 4), it becomes comparatively easy. To the beginner, a difficulty naturally will arise as to the existence of these right lines in objects in nature. The eye, by practice and proper education, learns to supply this, and soon becomes accustomed to measure irregular forms by this unerring standard. At present, it is out of place to enter, as fully as may be hereafter necessary, into the explanation of this principle in drawing; which must be gradually developed to the understanding of the pupil, as he acquires progressive strength in the training of his eye and hand.

FRENCH LESSONS;

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

"I EXPECTED, Robert," said George, when next the friends met, "that I should have had to carry on my instructions by letter, as the time had come for my return to my scholastic duties; but this morning's post has brought me a letter from my father, directing me to remain in London to look after some important business of his. Thus I shall prolong my stay."

"A good thing for me," said Robert, with a smile. "For some time past I have been dreading the announcement of the end of your vacation."

"Make the most of me while you have me," said George; "and about the expression you have just used—the end of the vacation. The French have an excellent phrase for the return of the pupils to school; they call it la rentrée des classes. The French do not give such long holidays as we do. They know nothing of the mid-summer vacation and the Christmas vacation. They give a month's vacation during the autumn, at the time of the vintage. Les vacances is the name they give the holidays; and they speak of those who are having their holidays as of des écoliers en vacances. Of young ladies, they say des écolières en vacances. But remark this, the word écolier, with its feminine écolière, and its plural écoliers and écolières, is only applied to daily pupils. The term pensionnaires is used for boarders.

"I did not translate the phrase la rentrée des classes, but I suppose you understood it?"

"I am not quite sure that I did," said the pupil.

"Well, then, I will explain it. L'entrée would be the entry; la rentrée is the re-entry, or return of the classes, des classes, in French. In true French style, this phrase says a great deal in a few words.

"To-day I wish you to enrich your vocabulary with words relating to dress, for you know we poor mortals must be clothed as well as fed.

"Before we speak of the articles of wear, I should like you to write down the names of the stuffs that these articles are made of.

Stuffs.	Les étoffes.
Cloth.	Du drap.
Flannel.	De la flanelle.
Cotton.	Du coton.
Linen.	De la toile.
Calico.	Du calicot.
Cambric.	De la batiste.
Canvas.	Du canevas.
Tickling.	Du contil.
Crape.	Du crêpe.
Damask.	De damas.
Lace.	De la dentelle.
Thread.	Du fil.
Fustian.	De la futaine.
Gauze.	De la gaze.
Printed calico.	Du l'indienne.
Wool.	De la laine.
Merinos.	Du mérinos.
Mohair.	De la moire.
Muslin.	De la mousseline.
Woolen muslin.	De la mousseline-de-laine.
Nankin.	Du nankin.
Plush.	De la peluche.
Goatshair cloth.	Du poil de chèvre.
Satin.	Du satin.
Serge.	De la serge.
Silk.	De la soie.
Sarsenet or taffeta.	Du taffetas.
Stocking net.	Du tricot.
Net.	Du tulle.
Velvet.	Du velours.

"You may observe, Robert," said George, "that many of these names of stuffs are almost the same in French as in English. As they do not suggest any great difficulty, we will pass on to the rules for the exercise.

"We were still speaking of the peculiarities of the adjective.

"To use the article a, un, correctly with the adjective, requires attention to rule. This adjective is repeated before two adjectives united by a conjunction, when, on account of their meaning, they cannot possibly give a quality to the same noun; but the article is not repeated if the two adjectives give quality to the same person or thing.

"The next rule is simple enough. When two adjectives, divided by the disjunctive conjunction, or ou, go before the noun, the article un is repeated before each; but if they come after it, un is used but once.

"When a noun, preceded by the article a, is used in English as the attribute or quality of the verb to be, you must, in translating the sentence, omit the article; but if the nominative case of the verb is the pronoun ce (it), the article must be used. I will presently make this clear to you by means of an illustration. In the first case the article would not be used. 'My father was a physician—' Mon père était médecin. But when in reply to the question 'Who is there?' you must give the answer, 'It is a physician,' then you must translate the sentence thus—'C'est un médecin.'

"When the adjective grand (great) is used with the following noun to designate a certain situation in the government of a country, the two words should then be united by a hyphen, as forming but one word, and the article a, which we should use in English, is suppressed, as also the a that we use after the pronoun what, before a noun or an adjective.

"At the end of a sentence we use a before a noun expressing any period of time, but this a is rendered in French by the preposition par.

"When a question is put with a negation, though an affirmative is supposed, the a is rendered in French by un; but if the question is put really to ascertain the fact, the a is rendered by de.

"When we speak of Mr. or Mrs. So-and-So, we use no article, but the French use an article, and translate this phrase thus — 'Monsieur un tel,' 'Madame une telle.'"

"One, used as a pronoun in English, is not expressed in French. I also wish you to observe that in some cases our article a is rendered in French by the definite article le. I will give you a very familiar example of this — 'I wish you a good day' — 'Je vous souhaite le bon jour.'"

"The reason why I have said so much about a is that this article is often used — as you may have observed — adjectively."

EXERCISE.

1. It is consoling for me to think that my children are all well situated. 2. Your brother is known by every body for not being constant in love. 3. Louis the Eleventh was cruel to his nobility. 4. America is not so fruitful in corn, wine, and fruit, as France and Italy. 5. The French, till their revolution, had always been faithful to their kings. 6. I am fatigued with running. 7. Why are you so impatient to see her? 8. Mistress C — is inconsolable for the loss of her husband, although he was very inferior to her in talents, virtue, and courage. 9. She is very uneasy about this affair. 10. We are very uneasy at not receiving (any news from her). 11. Vice is most ingenious in disguising itself. 12. Your friend has been ungrateful to your father. 13. He has been ungrateful to his benefactor. 14. Be quick to reward, slow to punish, and compassionate to the poor. 15. A well-educated son is grateful to his parents for the education which they have given him. 16. We are all accountable to God for our bad actions. 17. That gentleman is worth two hundred thousand francs. 18. You are not sufficiently severe to your children. 19. All my estates are barren in corn. 20. (Never was) a woman more useful and dear to her family, and at the same time more respected and beloved by everybody.

LE CORRIGE.

1. Il est consolant pour moi de savoir que mes enfants ont tous bien placé. 2. Mon frère est connu de tout le monde pour n'être pas constant en amour. 3. Louis Onze fut cruel à (or envers) sa noblesse. 4. L'Amérique n'est pas aussi fertile en blé, en vin, et en fruits que la France. 5. Les Français, jusqu'à leur révolution, avaient été fidèles à leurs rois. 6. Je suis fatigué de courir. 7. Pourquoi êtes-vous si impatient de la voir? 8. Madame C est inconsolable de la perte de son mari, quoiqu'il lui ait été inférieure en talents, en vertu, et en courage. 9. Elle est très inquiète sur cette affaire. 10. Nous sommes inquiets de ne pas recevoir de ses nouvelles. 11. Le vice est très ingénieux à se déguiser. 12. Mon ami a été ingrat envers son père. 13. Il a été ingrat envers son aïeul, ingrat à vos bontés et à votre amour; mais sur à lui s'il est ingrat à son pays. 14. Soyez prompt à récompenser, lent à punir, et miséricordieux envers les pauvres. 15. Un fils bien élevé est reconnaissant envers ses parents pour l'éducation qu'ils lui ont donnée. 16. Nous sommes tous responsables à Dieu de nos mauvaises actions. 17. Ce monsieur est riche de deux cents mille francs. 18. Vous n'êtes pas assez sévère pour (or envers) vos enfants. 19. Toutes mes terres sont stériles. 20. Il n'y eut jamais de femme plus utile et plus chère à sa famille, et en même temps plus respectée et plus aimée de tout le monde.

"Do you mean to return to our travellers," replied George, "and that immediately."

CONTINUATION OF

LE VOYAGE À PARIS.

ENGLISH. FRENCH.
We speaking of the protection granted by Philip Augustus to the university. Nous parlions de la protection que Philippe Auguste accorda à l'université.
Exact. The marked distinction which the Parisian school famous. C'est vrai. L'estime singulière que ce grand roi faisait des savans, et les distinctions flatteuses dont il les honorait, rendent les écoles de Paris très célèbres.

Even in England?

I have no doubt of it.

History tells us that to that part of Paris, since called the university, people thronged from foreign countries, as well as from the provinces.

But where did all these people lodge, and what did they find to eat?

Oh! learned people are satisfied with little.

Were strangers well received by the inhabitants?

It seems they were, for the number of students in the quarters we were speaking of equalled at length the number of citizens.

Who caused Paris to be surrounded with walls?

This same Philip Augustus, and within them was inclosed land, on which he encouraged them to build.

Même en Angleterre?

N'en doutez pas.

L'histoire nous dit que des pays étrangers aussi bien que des provinces on accourut au quartier appelé depuis l'université.

Mais où logeait tout ce monde, et où trouvait-on à manger?

Ah! les savans se contentent de peu.

Ces étrangers, étaient-ils bien reçus des habitans?

Il parait que oui, et la multitude des étudiants égalait (dans le quartier de l'université) celle des citoyens.

Qui fit entourer Paris de murs?

Philippe Auguste même, et dans cette clôture il renferma des terres sur lesquelles il encouragea ses sujets à bâtir.

7th. When the adjective un, one, or a, is followed by a noun beginning with a vowel or h mute, the pupil must take care not to give it the feminine sound un, thus un ornament should be pronounced un 11 0 18, 11 9 0 16 norment, and not u-nor-ne-ment, which would make this noun feminine; and un homme should be pronounced 19 9 0 11 9 0 nounced un-homme, and not u-nhom-me, for the same reason.

8th. Foreigners find great difficulty in determining when the nasal sound should end with an m or with an n. The two following rules will settle the question.

1. Whenever the nasal syllable is followed by either of the three consonants b, p, m, that syllable must be terminated by m; as in ambassade, empire, emmené.

2. When the nasal syllable is followed by any other consonant than m, b, p, or is placed at the end of a word, that syllable should generally end with the letter n, for there are some exceptions, as faim, parfum, &c.; as in quand, sang, ban, écran, chant, commun, quelqu'un, son, &c.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON XXXIII.

METALLOIDS (continued).

IODINE, BROMINE, AND FLUORINE.

863. What is iodine?—Iodine is a bluish-black solid, made from the ashes of sea-weeds.

864. To what is it analogous?—It is quite analogous in its properties to chlorine.

865. What beautiful experiment may be made with it?—A single grain of iodine heated in a phial, will fill its interior with beautiful violet vapours.

866. What are its uses?—It is used as a medicine, and in the preparation of daguerreotypic plates.

867. What is bromine?—Bromine is a dense reddish-brown fluid, made from the waters of certain mineral springs.

868. To what is it analogous?—To chlorine and iodine.

869. What is fluorine?—Fluorine is a yellowish-brown gas, of odour somewhat similar to that of chlorine.

870. From what is it made?—From the beautiful mineral called "fluor spar."

871. To what is it analogous?—Fluorine, also, is analogous to chlorine.

872. What may the above group of four elements be called?—The chlorine family.

SULPHUR.

873. Where is sulphur found?—Principally in volcanic regions. In Sicily it is found in beautiful crystals.

874. What minerals contain it?—Sulphurets and sulphates.

875. Mention one of the sulphurets.—Sulphuret of iron, or "fool's gold."

876. Mention a sulphate.—Gypsum, or "plaster of Paris."

877. How may sulphur be made to burn with great brilliancy?—By kindling it in oxygen.

878. How may sulphur be made soft and waxy?—By high heating and sudden cooling in water. As it falls into the water, it takes the form of elastic threads, which may afterwards be moulded together.

879. For what is such sulphur used?—For taking impressions of seals and medallions. It gradually resumes its original hardness.

880. What colours may be bleached by sulphur?—Vapours of burning sulphur bleach many vegetable colours.

881. What are these vapours?—They are sulphurous acid.

882. What is the principal application made of this property?—To bleach straw.

883. May the colours thus bleached be restored?—They may be restored by driving out the sulphurous acid.

884. How may this be done?—By dipping in dilute oil of vitriol.

885. Can the colour bleached by chlorine be thus restored?—It cannot.

886. For what reason?—The colouring matter is destroyed and removed by chlorine, while it is only changed by sulphurous acid.

SULPHURIC ACID.

887. What is sulphuric acid?—Sulphuric acid is a colourless oily fluid, of intensely acid taste, known in commerce as oil of vitriol.

888. Of what is it composed?—Of sulphur, oxygen, and water.

889. How is it prepared?—From fumes of burning sulphur, which consist of sulphurous acid.

890. How?—By giving the latter more oxygen.

891. What is used for this purpose?—Vapour of nitric acid.

892. Where are the materials brought together?—In large leaden chambers.

893. Why is steam admitted into the chambers?—Because a certain portion of water is essential in the process.

894. Why are leaden chambers employed?—Because most other metals would be corroded by the acids.

895. How is the acid of the chambers concentrated?—By boiling it down in vessels of platinum.

896. Why is platinum employed?—Because lead and all other metals, excepting gold, would be dissolved by the strong acid.

897. Is sulphuric acid an important product?—Millions of pounds are annually employed in the arts.

898. How does sulphuric acid compare in strength with the other acids?—It is the strongest of all acids.

899. How is this proved?—By the fact that it will drive out other acids from their compounds, as vinegar drives out carbonic acid from chalk.

900. Are not other acids superior in some cases?—They are.

901. Give an example.—Nitric acid will dissolve silver and copper while cold; sulphuric acid will not.

902. How does diluted sulphuric acid act on metals?—It dissolves most metals.

903. Does it, strictly speaking, dissolve the metals, or the oxides?—Their oxides.

904. How are the metals converted into oxides before they dissolve?—By seizing oxygen from the water which is present.

EVENING IN THE FIELDS.

As ere she wandered through the fresh-mown grass,
Along the hedgerow bordering waving corn,

The turf was spiced with young sassafras,
And all along the silent fields were born:

The distant stroke and softened melody
Of oars, and boat-songs from the twilight-sea.

Sweet vespers rang from woods and meadows far,
Where the wild song-birds bid the sun good-bye;

The day had faded, but one soft, large star
Grew into glory from the shadowy sky,

While o'er the dim horizon's dreamy glow
A shimmering mist crept ghostly, cold, and slow.

And "thus," she sighed, "thus o'er my aëroscope,
While Love's own planet burns before my eyes,

All trembling with the beams of holy hope;
Thus to the heavy mists of doubt arise,

And dreary twilight dusks the living light,
And all things chill and shiver to the night."

Her soul grew sick with vague, uncertain fear,
When from its home, amid the perfumed hay,

A little meadow lark, that caroled near,
In words articulate seemed sweet to say,

"Listen, sad heart, from far across the sea
I breathe the song the breezes brought to me.

"Oh! let no mists of portent gather o'er thee,
All dim and vast,

Nor ghosts of dead affections rise before thee
From out the past.

"Before Love's dewy dawn dark shadows fleeing Set sunlight free;

Trust is Love's sun, its very vital being—
Oh, trust in me.

"Then welcome Hope! Adieu to weary grieving,
For all life through;
The feelings purest, sweetest, are believing
And proving true."

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF ROSSE, K.P., D.C.L., ETC. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAULL AND POLYBLANK.

THE EARL OF ROSSE, D.C.L., K.P.

THE illustrious nobleman whose portrait we publish is the third earl of that title in the Irish peerage. The earldom of Rosse was created in the year 1806, and is connected with the barony of Oxmantown. The present earl is the eldest son of the late earl, formerly M.P. for King's County, and Alice, daughter of the late John Lloyd, Esq. He was born in the year 1800, in the city of York. His inclination for scientific pursuits was early developed, and he particularly distinguished himself in these departments of study as a gentleman commoner of Magdalen College, Oxford. In 1821 he took the degree of B.A.; his name was placed in the first-class list in mathematical honours. He was subsequently elected as one of the members for King's County, and represented that constituency down to the close of the first reformed parliament. In 1836 he married the daughter of J. W. Field, Esq., of Heaton Hale, Yorkshire. On the death of his father in 1841, he succeeded to the earldom, and in 1845 was elected one of the representative peers of Ireland. In the same year he was appointed one of the visitors of Maynooth College. Honours of state and office have been conferred upon him. He is a Knight of the Order of St. Patrick, Colonel of the County Militia, and Lord Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum of King's County.

But it is as a scientific man that the Earl of Rosse is best known, and from his zeal and success in the study of optics and astronomy that his name has become most illustrious. He has achieved for himself a world-wide reputation, and won that celebrity which no coronet can bestow. It is not as an illustrious member of the peerage, it is not as a great statesman or eminent debater, it is not for any part which he has sustained in political life, that the Earl of Rosse is indebted for his fame. To understand and to appreciate his merits, and the important results of his energetic and devoted labour, we must look neither to the senate nor the cabinet; we must seek him in the midst of some scientific circle: we must not look for his work in any blue book or state paper, but in the Philosophical Transactions; and at Birr Castle, Ireland, we may gaze with admiration at the gigantic telescope which he has there erected, and to the researches for which science is so deeply indebted to him.

Who is there that has not heard of Lord Rosse's telescope? Who has not admired the determination with which the scientific peer overcame every difficulty which beset him in its erection? It is the great work of his life. It is the largest telescope extant, one by which the astronomer is able to resolve into single stars nebulae which were not thus resolvable by the telescopes of the Herschels.

The Earl of Rosse erected his first telescope in 1831. It was furnished with a concave speculum three feet in diameter, about which the following particulars will be read with interest:—

The success of this instrument, every portion of the construction of which Lord Rosse superintended, and a considerable part of which he had worked upon with his own hand, encouraged him to further effort. He had proved the best admixture for speculum metal to be tin 126·4, copper 58·9. The castings were commonly made in moulds of sand, through which, on pouring the metal, the heated air readily escaped; but in the use of sand Lord Rosse found a main cause of the failure of large speculums. The sand, as a slow conductor of heat, allowed the metal to cool with comparative slowness, but more rapidly upon the surface than at the centre, while the after cooling tended to crack and warp the face. His first effort to conquer this difficulty was to make the casting on an iron mould. The iron being a rapid heat-conductor, the heat, he argued, would pass from the top downwards, and the whole cool equally so as to prevent the warpage arising from contraction of the centre in cooling, when surfaces were already cool. Experiments proved the correctness of the supposition; but the having no escape, rose through the metal, and a great speculum so cast was useless. A step, however, had been gained, and Lord Rosse set himself to overcome the remaining difficulty. Iron was of the proper mould; the problem to be solved was how to construct the speculum so that the air should pass as freely from it as from a mould of sand. To this end he made a mould of iron hoops joined together, placed edgewise. The spaces proved large enough to allow the escape of air, but not of the metal. This make of mould was ready for use on the 18th of April, 1842. Minor difficulties to crucibles had been overcome; three, holding a ton, glowed in the furnaces. The crane heaved them from their bed of fire, and poured the metal, bright in a liquid state upon the mould. It was then no giant statue, no great gates of bronze, but a eye that should look out upon the heavens, and their secrets into the view of men. The speculum cast was placed for sixteen weeks in an annealing oven, so regulated that it should cool slowly and uniformly. At the end of the period there was no shrinkage, no flaw, no warp throughout its circumference of eighteen feet; in its rough state it was perfect. The ingenious adjustments of motion were devised by Lord Rosse to grind the surface to the parabolic form. The operation required six weeks; many hours were sufficient to give the polish; at length the little watch-dial on the top of the shaft on the tower of the workshop was seen mirrored with the most minute distinctness in the finished speculum, the first of such a diameter that ever been produced.

THE BAOBAB, CENTRAL AFRICA.

So vast are the proportions of this telescope, that the Dean of Ely walked through it with an umbrella spread above him, as it is no less than seven feet in width in the middle, and fifty-two feet in length. The tube is suspended between two lofty walls of about sixty feet in height, and one of them carries an iron semicircle, against which the tube bears when in the meridian. By means of a windlass, and a very skilful adjustment of chains and counterpoising weights, it can be brought into a variety of positions, or turned fairly round from south to north. Enormous as are its proportions, and though weighing altogether not less than twelve tons, it is managed with great ease and exactness. The immense distance at which stars are visible by the Rosse telescope surpasses the comprehension of the human mind. Sir John Herschel declares that the sublimity of the spectacle afforded by some of the larger globular clusters of the nebulae, is such as no words can express. The telescope will render visible a single star six thousand times more remote than the average star of the first magnitude; as though it were separated from us by an interval so tremendous that were a star to be now created at a similar distance, its light would be more than 60,000 years travelling through the intervening space before it reaches our globe.

The accomplishment of so valuable and important a work as this great telescope has rendered the name of the Earl of Rosse familiar to us all, and has won for him a deserved eminence among the scientific men of the age. In 1842 the University of Cambridge conferred upon him the honorary degree of LL.D. In 1849 he was elected President of the Royal Society. In 1853 he was nominated a member of the Imperial Academy of Science at St. Petersburg in ; and 1855 his scientific attainments were still further recognised by the bestowal of the insignia of the Legion of Honour by the Emperor of the French.

THE BAOBAB (Adansonia Digitata).

ALTHOUGH the baobab, after having been regarded as the most gigantic of trees, must now yield that dignity to the mammoths of California, it does not the less deserve our notice, on account of its old reputation, and the character it imparts to the vegetation of Central Africa.

The baobab, remarkable for its enormous proportions, is found in the Cape de Verd Islands, throughout the district extending from Barquoy to Rufisk, as well as in the neighbourhood of Joal, where its fruits are of considerable commercial importance. It is also found from Senegal to Bissagos; also in the locality of Sierra Leone; and, if we may judge from the statement of the natives, it exists, in more or less abundance, all over the continent. We are unacquainted with the baobab in the south, and in the north it does not extend beyond the tropic of Cancer. The fruits, described in the sixteenth century by Prosper Alpin, and observed at Méroé by Cailland, belong to a species distinct from that of Senegambia. The latter is identical with the baobab of Madagascar, and with that which exists in the north-west confines of New Holland, the vegetation of which bears a striking resemblance to that of the African continent.

The baobab, or el-omarch of Soudan, rivals in size that of Senegambia, measuring from sixty to seventy feet in circumference. The wood is very soft when in perfection, and is subject to a disease, a sort of softening of all the hard parts, so that the least storm is sufficient to overthrow and dismember its enormous bulk.

Many of the trunks are hollow, and capable of containing several men. These cavities are frequently produced by the practice which the negroes have of lighting their fires close against the trees, and so gradually turning the wood to charcoal. Between Senegal and Gambia, the trunks of the baobab frequently exceed eighty or ninety feet in circumference, but they never attain a proportionate height. The negroes of Kaye generally employ the hollows in their trunks as sepulchres for those persons to whom other rites of burial are denied. The trunks of the baobabs are crowned with an immense number of branches, no less remarkable for their size than for the horizontal position which they usually take. Some of the arms descend to the ground, and give to the tree the appearance of a regular hemisphere ninety feet in height, and two hundred feet in circuit. When covered with leaves, the baobab resembles a huge green parasol—a parasol set up by Madame Earth to shade her from an African sun.

The baobabs bear some analogy to the cactus of Mexico. The great heat of the climate has the same effect upon them as that of a severe winter on our vegetation. Their leaves fall off, their branches are stripped, and it is only after the heavy rains have set in that the baobab resumes its beautiful appearance.

The leaves are deep green, divided into five unequal parts, each of which is of a narrow lance-like figure, and radiates from a common centre, the outermost divisions being the smallest. The flowers grow singly from the centre of the leaves, and are very large and white. The first is an oblong, dull green, downy body, eight or nine inches long, containing several cells, in each of which there is a number of hard shining seeds immersed in a soft pulp, which is scarcely juicy. From this pulp the negroes prepare an acidulous drink, much used in the fevers of the country. The bruised leaves in a dry state are also employed for medical purposes with much success, and they have saved the life of many a European resident in Senegal.

The baobabs are supposed to afford examples of the oldest living organised matter on our globe; some specimens, by counting the number of their concentric circles, being estimated at between five and six thousand years old. The tree is known to naturalists as the Adansonia, so called in honour of Michael Adanson, its original discoverer.

CHAPTER XV.

CAT AND MOUSE.

WHEN Gunn went to the Bank on the next morning but one after the short conversation reported in the last chapter, he turned over the letters very impatiently, as usual, to find one that was not unlikely to be there—one that was expected to be much smaller in almost every way than the rest—smaller in size, smaller in the handwriting of the direction, smaller in the seal—shall we say smaller in talk? (no, we won't!)—smaller in every respect, except the length of its contents.

That was what he expected.

"Jones and Company;" "Tallow and Bees-wax Patent Association;" that's not it! "Double Action Threshing Machine Company;" that's not it! "Garrett and Yoare;" "Kurney's"—no, that's not it!" And Gunn tossed some score of valuable letters aside, one after the other, till he found a little, oblong letter sealed with—what? Black wax!

This was what he didn't expect.

He looked at the impression. It bore simply the word "Margaret."

Gunn tore it open.

"Was Aunt Bridget dead? Could it be possible? He must be off directly if that was the case."

We hope Gunn was deeply grieved at the very thought of the possibility.

He read as follows:—

Myrtle Cottage, June —, 18—.

"MY DEAR GUNN,—Forgive this old word 'dear,'—it will presently read very much too familiar. But I couldn't all at once pass from the terms of the happy past to the distant relations we must now stand in to each other without a medium word.

"You will ever be 'dear Gunn' to me, though I must never own it any more.

"They have all long since retired to rest, and I am sitting, writing at the little table in my own room, whence I have so often sent you warmer words than 'dear Gunn.' Oh! that it should have come to this!—that I should think even them unduly strong!

"I have fancied there was a cloud coming over me for many months; but I never thought it would have burst in this dreadful storm over your wretched Cicely.

"Why did you never speak before as you spoke last night? If you wanted to be free, did you imagine I could ever bind you to the promise of only half a heart?

"She is worthier of you, Gunn, than I can ever hope to be. And I did not need to hear her virtues from your lips, and in such ardent tones, to put you at full liberty to admire and enjoy them.

"She is rich. Your word was not needed to tell me so.

"She is beautiful. But why tell me of it, unless to acknowledge how you felt the contrast?

"I never claimed either wealth or beauty. I never wish to be loved for the sake of either. It seems you thought I did, or else to what purpose were those cruel praises of another, with which you filled our interview last night?

"Oh, Gunn! you may justly claim ten times her beauty—ten times her riches. There is One who knows how unworthy I have ever been of you. And it is because I will not—no, I will not, rob you of one atom that is your due, that I now ask you to forget the past—the dear past—and leave your Cicely—or what was once your Cicely—and tell this worthier heart that you are free.

"I think I could have loved you, dear Gunn, who ever had brought his charms, and spread them out, one by one, to tempt me. But let that pass. I could sooner die than feel that I robbed Gunn Launcelot of one moment's happiness!

"Be happy, then, be happy, my own, beloved one! If she loves you one half as fondly as I have done, there is a future for you, over which no heart will rejoice more truly, even though it break, than that of, dearest, dearest Gunn,

"Your M. C. R."

Now we should be sorry to detract at all from the effect of this letter upon the sensitive reader's sympathy—very sorry. Nothing is further from our wish.

But truth compels us to say that Gunn Launcelot had received a document, quite of this order, on the average every fortnight since his engagement commenced with Margaret Ranger.

The consequence was, that although it was just such an epistle as might otherwise make him add up his figures with perhaps a trifle less of accuracy than usual, and sign his name with somewhat less of a dash or scratch at the end, yet Gunn recollected how very often he had read that same sort of thing from the same dear little fingers before, and therefore, there was a good deal of vexation coming into his mind, that kept down his love to a very convenient extent.

Now, one word on this, and a somewhat similar matter.

We have read some hundreds of novels, and scarcely one of them was without a good share of Love in it.

But we, nevertheless, are decidedly of opinion that there's room for another novel, which, perhaps, we shall write ourselves one day, on what we might call The Responsibilities of Courtship.

That looks to be a very hard and dry expression.

But we are quite prepared to defend it, "the responsibilities of courtship."

If you were to write us a private letter, be your name Gunn or Margaret, and ask us what is the cause of so many unhappy and so many cold and heartless married lives, we should have the answer for you in no time.

It isn't want of money; it isn't that young folks marry before they can afford it—many wait too long, if many don't wait long enough; it isn't mothers-in-law; it isn't clubs; it isn't milliners' bills. No; it's the silly, thoughtless, thoroughly bad way in which young folks pass the period of courtship.

And as to the division of blame between lady and gentleman—begging everybody's pardon—there is not much to choose between the two.

Now, we have no doubt whatever that if our friend Margaret Cicely Ranger had become Mrs. Gunn Launcelot—which she didn't, though this letter was recalled and kissed away, and all that, and half a dozen others, like it, that followed it—we have no doubt that if she had become Mrs. Launcelot, she would have made herself very miserable indeed, and cried her eyes out, as some ladies express it, because, six months or so after marriage, Gunn behaved less lovingly than he used to do.

A word, first, then, to all Gunns.

You ought to remember, young gentlemen, that marriage makes a great change in the relation of the parties to each other—a very great change, indeed.

According to the common understanding of these matters, it is the part of the gentleman to woo. There are exceptions; but the exceptions excite remark, and prove the rule.

Well, when the prize is gained, there's infinite danger, young Mr. Gunn, of its being, what all prizes are when gained, cheaper.

But that's very severe upon the prize, when it happens to be a woman's heart.

You aroused heaven and earth to get that heart, and then to get that hand. Now is the time when Margaret's love is only beginning. It is not for woman to love till she is loved; she often doesn't love till she has been loved a long while. (N.B. Exceptions again.)

It is very hard, then, Mr. Gunn, if, just as Mrs. Gunn's affection begins to set in, yours begins to set off.

We venture to say that marriage-love in woman is ten times stronger than courtship-love.

Is the same true of man?

Look round on the families of your friends, and compare young Mr. Smith when he was courting with Mr. Smith now that he is married.

And then we hope you can say "Yes," to the above question.

We are happy in being, and in knowing exceptions. But what's the rule?

Our lecture, therefore, to you, friend Gunn, is this—What is worth your while to get, it should be considered worth your while to keep.

It isn't kind, it isn't right or holy, it isn't manly, because Mrs. Gunn is now tied to you "as long as ye both shall live," to snatch away by degrees all those ten thousand little things, in word and deed, that made her love you; and force her love to survive them, as it very likely will.

That's for you.

Now, Mrs. Gunn—

(And this comes most to the point, after the excellent and affecting letters above referred to, one of which we inserted as a specimen—)

Is all the blame on one side, if Mr. Gunn's regard for you, madam, begins to grow cool, after a twelve-month or so of married life?

We shall suppose that, as far as that twelvemonth is concerned, it is.

We shall suppose that you have not committed the blunder against which we have cautioned Mr. G., and, after marriage, have not dropped all those little arts of manner and conversation which engaged young ladies, and those who want to be, are equal to assuming, and quite right, too.

We will grant you, that the dress is quite as neat as it used to be, when somebody's rap was expected at papa's door; especially, that the morning gown (which Mr. Gunn never saw, perhaps, till now) is worn for not too long a time without a change.

We will give you the benefit of hoping, that you take as much pains to keep the love betwixt you, as Mr. G. himself does. (You should take more, if you see it in danger, from his side.)

But, now, Mrs. Gunn—

Has a man no memory?

How about those worrying letters you used to write to him, whenever he happened to mention a human being who chanced to be a woman, but not you—a being about whom, perhaps, he cared less than he did about your cat?

Talk about cat—that's the very word.

You used to play with him, just as a cat does with a mouse, before she eats it. Off and on; catch and let go; smiles and frowns, till the poor fellow was almost demented.

What wonder that the mouse didn't leave you the pleasure of killing him; but died of its own accord?

We beg to assure you, madam, that Mr. G. has a memory, and recollects his courtship remarkably well; and you will have to be a prodigious treasure, to make it worth his while to keep you at the same cost as that at which he got you.

Why, you were as near as a toucher losing him twenty times a month, when he had all the excitement of the chase to hold him to you. Do you think it will answer for you to be careless now, when the bloom of novelty is off the peach?

But, we are wasting words, perhaps, on you, except that you really should put on all the steam you can to overtake your husband's flying love—for you made it fly.

We could prefer a conversation with Miss M. C. Ranger. The mischief is being done now, dear girl.

You are gravely occupied when writing these black-sealed letters; you are busy making Mr. Gunn Launcelot a tyrannical husband, and Mrs. L. a wretched, thrice wretched woman.

We quizzed your sex just now, for sometimes being the wooer. It is better to be the wooer, than to take so much wooing as to be thought worth nothing when you're won.

There, ma'am!

If we were to send that last sentence round London for signature, we would get as many signatures to it as there are husbands to sign; or make you a present of the wedding breakfast.

But you will never be Mrs. Launcelot. So much the better for you.

CHAPTER XVI.

HUE AND CRY.

"Then, do you mean to say?" demanded Sir Lionel Gascoigne, of Barty, on the morning after the robbery, "Do you mean to say that nobody, not a soul, has been calling at the house, whom you can suspect—whom you can suspect, Barty? Eh?"

"Not one, I assure you, sir," said Barty, in a very great fright, for it had devolved upon him to announce the extent of the loss in the plate department.

"Stop," said the baronet, "you told me, last night Harding was here?"

"Yes, sir."

"And coming again to-day, didn't you say?"

"Yes, sir."

"What sort of a looking fellow was he—what sort, I say?"

"Well, sir, you wouldn't notice him for anything very particular."

"Not! Why, he was very stout, wasn't he?"

"No, Sir Lionel, no. I should ha' said, if anything, the contrary of stout, if anything."

"You would, you would! Why, Harding's a fellow of twenty stone, I should think."

"Have you seen him, Sir Lionel?"

"Seen him! of course I have. Do you think I should engage a man without seeing him? You're a greater fool than I thought you were, Barty—much greater fool."

Mr. Barty puffed out his cheeks, and moved his head ominously up and down.

"What now, you scoundrel? Speak, and don't wag your head like a mandarin at me."

"He's the thief, sir! He vowed he'd never seen ye, Sir Lionel; but you'd engaged him, half, thro' a third party."

In a moment, constables were sent for, and the physiognomy and raiment of the pseudo Mr. Harding were fully enrolled in all particulars, and sent throughout London.

But nothing was heard, either of him or his spoil.

And amidst varieties of malediction, which the reader must be good enough to take for granted, Sir Lionel pocketed the loss.

From the company of his head footman the baronet proceeded to the room of his sister.

"Well, Fan!" he said, as he stood like a little satyr at the foot of her bed, "this is a pretty piece o' business, this is—a pretty piece o' business."

"I hope," said Fanny, who lay there very feverish and weak; "I hope not much is gone besides my jewels."

"Gone!" said Sir Lionel; "we haven't an ounce of silver left in the house!"

"The old plate isn't gone, Li, is it?"

"Every mustard- spoon," said her brother; "and the villain who took it all was here in this house, for hours yesterday; and that Barty, who ought to go to gaol for his trouble, thought it was Harding, who is to come into Weston's shoes. Couldn't you see, Fan, what sort of a chap he was, before he struck you?"

"I should never know him again; for till the last moment, I thought it was you; and directly I saw it was a stranger, I suppose I called out, and I was struck."

"Struck!" said the baronet; "yes, and I'm struck, with the notion—Harding must be no better than he should be; how, on earth, could this villain know Harding, or me, or what's between us—how could he know?"

"To be sure," said Fanny.

But she said it very low; she had talked too much, but daren't tell her brother so; and he was not the gentleman to see when a girl was overtaking her strength.

In a few days Fanny was moved, by gentle journeys, down into Suffolk, and the baronet remained in town.

CHAPTER XVII.

FANNY'S NURSE.

For some time after Miss Gascoigne's arrival at "The Nunnery," she seemed to improve by degrees, and the shock to the nervous system appeared to be passing away.

Every one in the establishment vied with the rest in paying her attention: for besides that they hated her brother, and so had few opportunities of showing any care for the family, they knew how much more Fanny must have to bear with than they had, and lavished on her the most respectful but industrious sympathy.

Even Aunt Susan, making sure that Lionel was not at the house, went up and offered her services in the sick-room itself.

She was thanked, but Fanny knew her brother too well, to be nursed by a relation of Weston's.

Fanny, however, had one nurse in that sick-room, who made up for a good many deficiencies elsewhere, and had done so for a long time now.

Dot saw how it was, directly they carried her into the chamber.

Dot was an exquisite little Belgian canary, who—(you will not find us writing "which" about Dot, not you!)—who sat in his cage that was hung up before the bedroom window.

We don't mean to say he knew anything about Mr. Harding, and the robbery, and the blow; although, to tell the truth, we would believe even that, before we would believe that birds can't feel love and sorrow much more acutely than thousands of human bipeds.

We only mean, at present, that Dot saw at one glance with one of his little bright eyes, as he held his head on one side, that there was something wrong, and very wrong too, with his mistress.

There wasn't one in the house who knew it so well.

You may laugh at us, good reader, and we dare say you will; for laughing is a most useful argument. But we are of opinion, that the world has yet a great deal to learn, that will astonish it, about the tribe of birds, and their sympathies with mankind.

Don't say to us, in order to cool our enthusiasm, "You should see my little dog Dash," or "You should see my horse Larkspur."

We've no objection to see them, for we include them in the remark. But for genuine, delicate love, and extraordinary sagacity, wrapped up in a very small compass, commend us to a well-bred canary, and especially to Dot.

We've read all that Mr. Jesse has to say about dogs, and we are as much astonished as you are at the power of kindness and skill in the training of horses.

But for warm, gushing, clever, unvarying attachment, we are prepared to back Dot against any quadruped you can name.

Many and many a time, when Lionel had been tyrannising over Fanny, when she was a little girl, and since, when she became a young lady, and when the keenest-eyed servant in the house never detected there was anything the matter; many a time would she go into her room, and put her pretty little lips to the wires of the cage, unable to speak for heaviness of heart; and little Dot would cling to the sides, and kiss her so tenderly, and murmur his little low whistle so sweetly, that it often seemed to say to her—

"Dot's all the same, Fanny; Dot's fond of you, never mind him."

She would offer Dot a choice morsel of chickweed, perhaps, at those times.

And he would just touch it, and pick a bud or two, to show he thanked her; but then, fall to kissing her again, to prove that his was not cupboard love, but love for her own sake.

And then she would understand him, and open the cage door, and out he would fly, and settle on her neck; whistling his low whistle all the while, and putting his little head on one side, as much as to ask her, whether she doubted Dot for a moment.

How could she?

For when the tears began to trickle down the poor girl's face, Dot was at them in a moment; and he seemed to wipe them off her cheek with his soft yellow feathers in a way that asked whether she wanted him to cry too; it made him so sad to see his mistress weep.

Dot had been her only comfort many a time; and she wouldn't be ashamed of it, if she knew we told you so.

Why should she?

On this day when they bore her into the room, he sat for awhile very thoughtful on his perch, all the time they were undressing her and laying her down.

Then, when they had nearly finished, and Fanny had told them she was quite comfortable, he began to pipe his little note without her observing him at first.

Presently he began to sing, but very softly; knowing (we believe) that loud, shrill music wouldn't suit her head. Then, just as the last attendant was leaving the room, he began to fly from side to side of his cage; a movement that always meant, "Let me out!"

So Fanny said to the woman, when her task was quite finished, "Let Dot out, will you, Griffiths?"

And in an instant he was on the edge of the cage, then on to the counterpane, and, hopping up the bed-clothes, was on his mistress's finger in a trice, as she held it out to him.

And then they whispered together; and the bird saw how weak and pale she looked, and nestled down into her neck, and was happy there.

Fanny was happy too.

Happier than if the best nurses in the land stood around her to do her bidding.

It was a bird who came to tell the patriarch that the earth was not ready for him yet; a bird it was who fed the prophet by the side of the brook; and the heavy hearts are not so few as you may think, that have been made lighter by these little comforters, who "neither sow, nor reap, nor gather into barns."

And they were only birds, remember, whose faithfulness and truth were brought by inspiration as examples to a great people; when the prophet said, "Yea, the stork in the heaven knoweth her appointed times; and the turtle, and the crane, and the swallow observe the time of their coming."

And we have often thought, good reader, that it is only as men behave themselves—indeed, the above text proves it—that the words of the Great Teacher can become quite true of proud men and women—"Ye are of more value than many sparrows."

CHAPTER XVIII.

SICKENING.

AMONG the many very stupid things in this world; the questions people ask in parlours and drawing-rooms when they don't know what to say are often the most stupid.

"Are you fond of children?" says a lady to you, as, one after another, she shows you a large family.

The lady might just as well ask, "Are you fond of men?"

In the latter case you would answer, in the words of a refrain to an old song, "But pray let me know what sort of a man!"

"Fond of children?" Why, yes, of some children—very fond indeed. Well-trained children, amiable children, clean children, children who are not made shows and mountebanks of—very fond.

But children who can't be spoken to without crying, children who ask twenty times for a thing without getting an answer or after being refused, children with whom it never seems to have been Saturday night or "tub-time"—we are not fond of these at all.

But the lady shouldn't ask such questions when her own are in the room; for it tempts us either to tell a story very often, or to wound her feelings in the very tenderest part.

Why, this difference in children extends to infants, beyond all question.

Whether it is hereditary or not, sweetness in a babe is anything but universal. Perhaps it's the gums, but whatever it is, we have seen some infants in arms which we never had the least wish to take out. There they would have remained, in arms till now, with no interference from us.

Others you love at first sight, and love more and more every minute.

Winnie was one of these.

Her mother (as perhaps you would expect to hear from what little you now know of old John) was one of the softest, gentlest of women.

Roland knew that.

And it made the big tears well up more and more, every time he recollected it.

But Winnie's sweetness never came out so beautifully as it did after that accident with Clara in the garden; and especially when the injury began to wax worse and worse.

She had one particular corner of the room set apart for her little crib, and there she was obliged to lie for hours and hours together, without any change of posture, and, very often, with no one sitting beside her to amuse her with pictures or toys.

It was very sad to see little Clara, when it came to be her turn to be nurse, for the child never appeared to forget who had been, though so innocently, the cause of the mischief. And you would really almost have fancied that Winnie feared her sister was blaming herself, and was all the more loving, when Clara sat in watch and ward at her side.

It was evident that severe injury had been done to the joint of the little limb. And the only chance, they said, of its ever coming right again, was to let the disease come, if it would, more to the surface, and keep the patient perfectly at rest.

Roland was, next to Clara, Winnie's favourite nurse. But the evenings were the only times he could give; for though he had now quite left the farm, he had got some temporary employment in the neighbourhood which took up all the day.

Aunt Susan, of course, did also the active part of a nurse's duty, and very tenderly she did it; rough though her nature was in many things, as we have seen already. But, we dare say you have noticed again and again, that the gentleness of rough people, when you do get it, is sure to be very gentle indeed. Whether they make a special effort, or whether we are deceived by the contrast, such is the fact—that soldiers are known to be often the softest in their manners to women and children, sailors to be the best friends to the poor, and hard-grained amazon-sort of women to watch by a sick baby's bed with more care and kindness than one of her honey-toned sisters.

As to poor old John Weston, as we are to see very little more of the family till a few years have passed over their heads, it may be convenient if we say at once of John, that he never sought another service in room of that he had lost on the "Nunnery" estate. He felt that he was unequal to the forming of new connections at his time of life; and, in fact, he had lost heart as well as health under Lionel's cruelty. So that, as he was not quite without means from the savings of his hard life, and as he was not disturbed (thanks, as he always believed, to Winnie's accident and Fanny's sympathy) in his old familiar White House, he lived on there, and took his turn beside Winnie's cot, as welcome perhaps to the little sufferer as any of the rest.

When we return to the "White House" by-and-bye, John Weston will not be there.

And we think it due to the very pleasant memory we have of him (and that memory is quite as fragrant in every cottage and bye-way of Gascoigne) just to mention to the reader how calm and contented his latter days were, and to say that he went to join his faithful wife in the old church full of years, and forgiving the wrongs he had endured at the hands of a house he had served so long and well.

Winnie was old enough when he died (we are now, as we have said, considerably anticipating events) to feel her own share in the loss; and she was very carefully carried into his room, on the last day of his life, to say farewell.

"I wish I left you better, Winnie, dear," said the old man.

"I shall be better, dear grandpa, when you see me again."

"Yes, yes, Winnie, thank God. 'There shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain'—no more pain, dear Winnie."

"Nor sorrow, grandpa. No more cruel masters," for she had often heard the story.

"Aye, Winnie," he said, catching at the hope; it'll be, 'Well done, good and faithful servant, enter into the—'"

And the old man stopped, and Winnie hoped that he entered.

Winnie stayed and suffered, as we shall see by-and-bye.

But we must go back to the time when Winnie was in her little crib.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE NEW FIRM.

ON the night after the conversation between Peter and his new friend, there was a convivial party, numbering only four or five persons, in a low back room of a low back house in a low back street, a good distance from the scene where the Chancellor and the Doctor had conferred together.

The apartment was so full of very bad tobacco smoke, that we could scarcely have vouched for the accuracy of our mere observation in counting or identifying the persons engaged; but we have other means of knowing that there were present at least two other men beside Snowdrop and the enterprising individuals above mentioned.

The supper had been a very substantial one, considering the rank of the guests; and now the beer was in full force, and the short pipes in ample requisition.

It would have puzzled anybody to have gained access to this choice little company, unless he had either the pass-word or a small piece of ordnance to blow in the door, so efficient were the precautions to ensure a strict secrecy for their deliberations and festivities.

"Well," said the Chancellor, "we can do without the conveyance to-night; that's one good thing."

"Don't want the livery, either," said Snowdrop.

"Nor yet the stable-boy," added Peter, with something very much like a chattering of the teeth, as he remembered the story.

"No," said one of the others; "but that makes it all the wuss to keep ourselves to ourselves. It's nothin' nigh so safe, when ye've sich a little way to go."

"Then let's give 'em time," said the Chancellor, "to get all safe to bed afore we starts. It's a case o' cats and mice to-night, my hearties."

"Don't see why there sh'd be sich a bue and cry agen us poor mortals, do you, Pop?" said another to one of the party who, like Peter, was rather new at the profession.

"We're among the best friends as science has, I take it, in this 'ere country. I sh'd like to know what the doctors 'd do without the like o' us; rayther, what sh'd we do, when we're bad and sends for the doctors, if they didn't know their bus'ness, eh?"

"Course," said Snowdrop; "beside, don't they keep on tellin' us, in the churches, every day, that the body don't go for nothin', and it's all 'ashes to ashes, and dust to dust;' and why shouldn't the dust turn a honest penny, I sh'd like to know? 'tain't as if we took 'em alive, as they say they do in furrin parts, and put an end to 'em ourselves."

"True for you," said the Chancellor; "we're as good as the worms, I hope an' trust; and if we didn't have 'em, who would?"

"Brayvo!" said Peter.

But he felt anything but "brayvo" when he said it.

And so, those men—not unlike others who would call them, and rightly, among the lowest of their species—sat and reasoned away the murmurs of conscience, and presently got up at the dead of the night, concealing their implements of horrid guilt, almost persuaded that they deserved the thanks, instead of the execrations, of mankind.

"In twenty minutes!" they said, one to another.

And each took his way in a different direction from the rest; and while the world went to sleep, and thought with comfort, or with less sorrow, of the soft, safe sleep of their dead, those five men, at short intervals, arrived at the churchyard-walls.

One of them had been marked out as the leader.

They let him go first, and watched his movements, while they awaited in concealment the appointed signal.

They saw him take the entire circle of the ground, examining every spot that looked a likely hiding-place for any disturber.

And then they saw him creep towards one spot, at the outer and lower extremity of the enclosure, till at last he stopped at one grave, where was just a long mound of rough clay; and then they heard the click with the tongue coming along very plainly in the silent night; then, save one, they all scaled the low wall, and, half doubled together, each man crouched in the darkness to join the captain.

Not a word was spoken—for this was no country place. The yard was thickly surrounded with houses.

One—it was Snowdrop's turn—kept watch for the rest, by going round outside very softly, and listening and peering into the night every step he took.

Away went the spades, all four of them; and sadly they would have struck upon the ears of the mourners, if those ears could have heard the sound.

"Here we are," said the Chancellor, who stood at the bottom of the grave, with his feet close against the sides, that his weight might do no mischief.

"Here we are; now fling that hemp down."

And so they tossed him down a piece of strong rope, which he made firm to one handle of the coffin, and then, by the help of his partners, scrambled up to the surface.

Just then, the moon peeped out from behind a cloud, as if detecting the villains in their disturbance of the dead.

They little cared whether that coffin contained the broken heart of some heir of sorrow, or the weary head of some victim of overmuch study; heads and hearts were worth only their money's price to them.

"Haul away!" said the Chancellor.

But in a moment there was a low, sharp whistle from the scout outside the ground.

Every muscle stopped as it began to strain; each ear was on the stretch.

"Bother!" said the captain; "false alarm. At it, my boys! now or never."

And Peter, shaking from head to foot, seized the rope, and began to drag up the coffin, just as it might chance, head first or feet first, from its narrow home.

There was no more warning.

From behind a headstone there sprang some one into the very midst of the group, and planted a most fearful blow full into Peter's face.

"Hound! Fiend! Die! die! I say!"

And again, and again, went the blow upon Peter's face.

1 Blow was all they thought it, at first, who looked on.

But Bugman felt, at the first stroke, the wet, warm trickling over his mouth and chin, that showed something sharper than knuckles had struck him.

All fled in a trice, who could fly.

Peter fell back; and back, too, fell the coffin, all awry, again into the grave.

Ben (for it was no other) caught up the dark lantern that lay there, and turned the bull's-eye, not on the wounded man, but on the coffin that had so nearly been rifled of the only object on earth that had made him care to live.

"Thank God, she's safe!" he cried.

And the lad knelt down beside the pit for a moment, and then began very gently to try to ease the rough pauper's coffin into its right place again, which he presently managed to do.

He then cut the rope, not presuming to slip down to untie it, and dropped the attached end softly upon the body.

He then covered his face with both his hands, and offered up together a short prayer and a very bitter grief.

"Earth to earth, ashes to ashes!" he said—

And sprinkled a little soil once more on the lid, as if to repeat the formality of burial.

How cruelly it repeated his own anguish, who shall tell?

You must forgive him; but before he caught up the spade to fill in that grave, Ben dealt one fearful kick against the side of the wounded man, and groaned out something as he did it that was not a prayer.

It was only after he had very carefully shovelled in the earth, and had patted the round hillock over it, as he had watched the sexton do so recently—it was only then that the lad descended to turn the lantern on the face of the snatcher who lay beside him.

You should have heard the shriek, aye, a very woman's shriek, that Ben sent ringing through the night air, as he caught the features of his father, through the blood and dirt on that man's face!

That was, he felt, the filling to the brim of his cup of wretchedness. He had had no dream of it when he struck those blows.

He struck at the robber of his mother's grave; that was all, and that was enough.

We do not say that he would have held his hand if he had known, but we think he would.

As it was, the mingled misery of that moment, Ben never forgot.

That his mother's slumbers, after such a life, should be violated by any one; that that one should be her own husband, and his father; and then, that the spoiler should be lying there, for aught he knew (and, till now, for aught he cared), dead at his son's feet, and by his son's hand—these things made Ben a miserable wretch that night in the Westminster churchyard.

One watchman had, by this time, arrived on the spot, and another and another soon followed.

Ben told the simple truth at once, and if they had not believed his own earnest tones, and the anguish that breathed in them, they would have been convinced by the tokens that lay round about; the spades, and ropes, and lantern, that the snatchers had left.

"Who's this feller, then?" said one of the constables.

"I s'pose he's one on 'em," said Ben.

Nothing would have made him tell who Peter was.

"Why, goodness mercy!" said one of the watch, "it's Silly Peter, jiggered if it ain't. And,—why, of course, you're young Mister Bugman, and no mistake. Don't ye know him?"

And thus the man found out, and let out, the fact. Just then Peter groaned, and seemed to be coming round.

One of the men stooped down and raised his head against the grave, and propped him up.

"What's the matter? what are yer a doin' of?" said Bugman.

"What have you been a doin' of? I should think's your question, master Cabbages," said a constable.

"Eh! what?" said Peter. "Ben! Ben! is that you, Ben?"

"Yes, father, it is me. I wish to heaven and earth it warn't me."

And Ben fairly blubbered aloud.

"You've given him a little mark or two, though, young chap," said the watchman.

"Did Ben do this?" asked Peter, as he wiped the blood away.

"Did you do this, father?" asked his son, pointing, in fresh woe, to the grave.

JAPANESE ARCHERS.

"What's that to do with it, you precious unnatural young scamp? There's a difference between strangers and one's own flesh and blood, I should think. If I did make too free here, it wasn't with my own father, you young ruffian."

"No, no, not father, but it's your own wife's grave I caught ye maulin' at; and your own wife's coffin ye was a dragging out, with that identical bit o' rope!"

"You lie!" shouted Peter, as he lifted himself on his hand, and tried to stand up.

"I wish I did," sobbed the boy; "I wish I did."

Peter never knew when or how they removed him. He had fallen back insensible on learning whose dust he had dishonoured. Even he was not prepared for that.

But all night, and far on into the next day, sat Ben beside the grave.

And for many a day after that, Ben was so regular in his visits to that yard, night and morning, that the sexton used to say:

"My clock up there never went so capital since there it's bin. It used to stop constant once a week; but now it dussn't for shame. That young pocket-handkercher never misses—never!"

(To be continued.)

JAPAN AND THE JAPANESE.

JAPANESE ARCHERS.

The most ancient offensive weapons of the Japanese consisted of bows and arrows, javelins, and lances. The bows, as we have before remarked, are larger than those used by the inhabitants of the opposite continent. They are not composed of a single piece of wood, as is the case with those of most other nations, but of three or even more pieces, which are very skilfully placed, layerwise, over one another, glued together, and covered with a thin veneer of bamboo. The middle piece is thicker than the other two, and is generally made of candleberry, myrtle, or willow. After it has been scraped smooth, the bow is carefully bound round with the fibres of the hemp plant, and rotang bands two or three inches broad, at certain regular intervals. Lastly, it is very artistically lacquered white and red. Bows thus formed assume a peculiar and most pleasing form when they are bent. This seems to arise from the fact of the rotang bands being placed at certain intervals from each other; for the greater the intervening spaces, the greater, also, will be the elasticity of those parts of the bow not so bound round with the rotang bands.

JAPANESE WRESTLERS.

The arrows of the Japanese are composed of bamboo, with feathers at the lower extremity, taken either from the wings or tail of the hawk and other birds. Among both the Chinese and the Japanese, the bow-makers and arrow-makers constitute two separate professions. The reason is obvious: countless arrows are shot away and lost, as powder and bullets are with us; while, on the contrary, a single bow, which a man often inherits from his forefathers, lasts for years.

The arrows which are used for amusement or exercise have wooden, horn, or iron heads, which are blunt, and sometimes quite flat. They are of every imaginable shape, according to the fancy of the owner, and are mostly attached to the shaft by a long prong running into the wood, or else fit it exactly, as a percussion cap does the nipple of a gun. The last method is the one adopted for arrows used for exercise or amusement. Before leaving this part of the subject, we may mention that the Japanese believe in charmed arrows, as the Germans of the present day, and the Scotch of former times, in charmed bullets.

JAPANESE WRESTLERS.

The people of Japan are particularly fond of amusements, and are said to be of a very cheerful and agreeable disposition.

Physical exercises are exceedingly popular; and wrestling, the favourite pastime of all war-like and semi-barbarous nations, is the delight of high and low. The combatants usually engage within a ring or prescribed limit, such as that described in the accompanying illustration; but at other times—that is to say, on less formal occasions—they wrestle wherever they can find a convenient place. The rings are formed by bundles of manilla tied up in lengths of about two feet each and laid upon the ground so as to inclose a circle. Japanese wrestling is a very serious affair; they are anything but tender or careful in their mode of struggling, and the play often ends in a tragedy. The object is in some cases to drag the adversary out of the ring; in others, to tie his hands and thus render him helpless. In those who offer themselves for these conflicts, great muscular power and suppleness of limb are required, and no pains or trouble are spared in their attainment. It is common for those who desire to become very expert to get their companions to bend back their limbs in constrained attitudes, and thus leave them for hours together; and, indeed, even in some instances to dislocate and reset any particular limb, in order to procure the greatest laxity and suppleness in the conflict. The judge who decides points in dispute in wrestling matches steps into the ring previous to the encounter. The wrestlers stand back to back, and the judge fastens a cord to the elbow of one and the knee of the other. Sundry evolutions are then gone through, calculated to bring the greatest strain on the limbs of the wrestlers. If either one of them falters, or exhibits any sign of pain, under the preparatory exercise, he is at once excluded from the ring, his opponent is declared victor, and a new combatant steps forward.

It is not unusual for a wrestling match to assume the nature of a mortal combat. The struggle, after some time, becomes fierce and intense; every nerve is strung to the highest pitch, every muscle strained to its utmost tension; the eyes protrude, the breath grows short, the veins and muscles stand out like knotted cords—the efforts of each wrestler to hurl his adversary from the ring become frantic; but all are watchful and wary, and as they pursue each other round the ring, or struggle together, until it seems as if, not two men, but one double man was writhing in the sandy arena, the excitement amongst the spectators is intense, and odds on both wrestlers are rapidly taken by the betters.

The best contested wrestling matches are those which take place before the high officials and court grandees. These are usually contests between the best wrestlers of the empire, and are conducted in a tent in the palace gardens. The prizes are munificent, and the attainment of one confers high dignity upon the winner, besides a life pension from government. There is, in this instance, an outer inclosure besides the inner ring, and disgrace does not finally attach until the defeated one is ejected from the outer inclosure. But, when thrown out from the inner ring, the victor has the privilege, if he can do so quickly enough, to lift the fallen wrestler bodily, and eject him. When the fall takes place within the ring, this privilege is denied. Upon one side of the ring the outer inclosure is omitted. This is the side towards the raised seats of the dignitaries; and upon this side neither of the combatants is allowed to step over without forfeiture to both of the right to continue the contest. Upon each part of the inclosure surrounding the ring is tied a blanket, for the purpose of shielding the wrestlers if pitched with force against it. A species of vinegar, mixed with water, is kept in two pails close by the ring, with which the nostrils and mouths of the wrestlers are occasionally washed.

The Matron.

NO. LI.

I HOPE my readers will like the patterns of chemisettes accompanying this chapter. They are neat and simple, and not very difficult to make; but before I enter into details about them, I mean to give a receipt for two articles particularly useful during this cold weather. These articles can be made by those who have only a moderate degree of skill in knitting. The first I shall mention are knitted night socks. And all you among my readers who can knit, I ad-

63rd Row.—Repeat the last.

Knit 3 rows the same as 2nd, then break off the wool, leaving sufficient to thread a coarse needle; take off the stitches, draw it up and fasten off tight, sew up the back and front.

Use for this sock No. 4 knitting needles, and No. 4 thread, fleecy.

In the illustration (plate 1) my readers may observe that the lace is of a rich, handsome pattern. Where this is the case, much fullness should be avoided, as it would conceal the beauty of the pattern.

Such lace as we are speaking of should be what is technically called eased, that is, put on almost straight. Of course, in turning the corners of the lace trimming on the ends of this pelerine, more fullness must be allowed. The plain piece of net which is the foundation of this pelerine should be carefully fitted on the person for whom it is intended, before the trimming is undertaken. Observe that it opens in a heart shape towards the waist, vise not only to make a pair of them, but to wear them in bed, and thus avoid the evils resulting from cold feet.

Before you begin the sock, I must beg you to observe that in every row the first stitch should be slipped, and the last knitted plain.

Cast on 88 stitches, and knit a plain row.

2nd Row.—Knit 1, pass the wool forward, slip 1, pass the wool back, and repeat; repeat this row 28 times.

31st Row.—Knit 62 stitches in the same way as 2nd row; then knit 2 together to the end.

32nd Row.—Cast off 25 stitches, knit 38 same as 2nd row, cast off the remaining 25 stitches.

Knit 20 rows the same as 2nd row.

52nd Row.—Slip 1, knit 2 together, knit 14 stitches the same as 2nd row, knit 2 together, knit the remaining stitches the same as 2nd row.

No. 2.

53rd Row.—Repeat the last.

54th Row.—Slip 1, knit 2 together; knit the remaining stitches the same as second row. Repeat the last row seven times.

62nd Row.—Slip 1, knit 2 together; knit 8 stitches the same as 2nd row, knit 2 together, knit the remaining stitches the same as second row.

Should you prefer making it with less expensive materials, you might make the foundation of muslin, and trim it with muslin borders finished off with a neat, cheap edging. But observe that in this material the trimmings, instead of being merely eased, should be half as wide again as the muslin to which they are sewn. This pelerine is worn with a stomacher, over a dress that fastens in front.

Plate 2 should be worn with a three-quarter dress, and, to do credit to the wearer, it should be very neatly made. The habitshirt offers no great difficulty, but it should fit exactly to the figure. The ornamental collar is not inserted into the habitshirt; it falls over it. The material composing it is muslin embroidered in rows, and the edging is of muslin vandyked. It fastens in front, and on either side it is sloped over the shoulder, and halfway toward the front. It is in the joining after these slopings that so much care is necessary. The colour of the bow should match that of the dress.

For the future our readers must not expect very minute details respecting the trimmings, for which we have given full directions. They should place beside them all the numbers of "The Matron" that treat of needlework, and they will do well often to refer to them. Before I close this chapter, I should like to give you a few directions about puffing. I do not mean puffing yourself or your work, but puffing as applied to setting on frills. First, gather the material in the usual way, then, having stroked down the gathers, gather again under the first gathering, and of such a depth as you wish the puffing to be. Then sew on the first gathering on the article you mean to trim at a distance from the edge corresponding with the width of the puffing, and let the second gathering be sewed to the edge, so as to form a full hem. If you fancy it, you may make a double hem by gathering three times instead of twice. You may have yet another variety in puffing by putting one of the hems straight whilst the other is drawn a little to one side; but, although this gives a pleasing variety to the work, it requires so much exactness, and, consequently, so much time in the execution, that we do not recommend it to those who have already plenty to do.

Small Change.

THERE was never a more beautiful reply than that of a good man in affliction, who was asked how he bore his sorrows so well: "It lightens the stroke to draw near to Him who handles the rod."

FAME has a trumpet, and a scroll, and a pair of wings, but we could never hear that she had such a thing as a bank account that was not pretty generally overdrawn.

MANY a woman who continually abuses her husband won't let anybody else do it. She thinks it such a luxury that she must needs monopolise it.

WHAT we call patriotism is often a blind and mischievous prejudice against other nations, rather than an enlightened preference of our own.

SOME judges commit a great many crimes, yet very seldom diversify the employment by committing criminals.

"I HAVE branded you, sir," said one individual fiercely to another. "You rather seem to have branded yourself."

TRUE friendship is like sound health; its value is seldom known until it is lost.

A CONTEMPORARY says he lately met with one of his jokes thirty years old. We suspect he has met with a good many of them much older than himself.

CESAR made a crown of laurel to cover the defects of a bald head. Most crowns of gold cover greater defects of the head.

JOHN BULL recently accomplished in the Celestial Empire what common bulls would in a china-shop—a great smashing of China.

A LADY had just swallowed a small glass of wine, as a gentleman in company asked her for a taste. "It is all gone," said she, laughing, "unless you will take some from my lips." "I should be most happy," he replied, "but I never take sugar in my wine."

To a man of poetical thought, a glorious scene in nature once beheld is a portion of eternity inclosed within a frame—a landscape withdrawn from the grand gallery of heaven, and hung up for ever in one of the chambers of the brain. Neither age nor mildew, nor heat, nor cold, can crack its varnish, or dim the lustre of its tints.

CHOBERT, the fire-king, who used to sit in hot ovens with legs of mutton till the latter were roasted, has just received from the French Emperor the St. Helena medal for having served twenty-six years in Napoleon's Grand Army. No doubt it was in that service he learned to stand fire.

A SPIRITED woman of our acquaintance caught her husband the other day in the act of breaking up her hoops. The exertion, or something else, had a singular effect upon him. His hair came out at an astonishing rate.

"You would be very pretty, indeed," said a gentleman, patronisingly, to a young lady, "if your eyes were only a little larger." "My eyes may be very small, sir, but such people as you don't fill them."

THE powerful are more deaf to the voice of experience than their inferiors. Power multiplies flatterers, and flatterers multiply our delusions by hiding us from ourselves.

IT is better to have wisdom without learning than learning without wisdom, just as it is better to be rich without owning a mine than to own a mine without being rich.

Chess.

Problem No. 91. By Mr. W. GREENWOOD, Sutton Mill.

WHITE.

White to move, and checkmate in four moves.

THE CHESS TOURNEY.

Game between Messrs. F. G. RAINGER, Esq. (Norwich), and EDWARD JOHNSON, Esq. (Newport, Isle of Wight).

WHITE.

1. P to K4

2. Kt to B3

3. B to Q Kt 5

4. P to Q B3

5. Castles

(Kt to K2 is the correct move for Black.)

6. K B takes Kt

7. Kt takes K P

8. P to Q4

(Black should have played Q to K2, and if Black took P with E, Z. P to K5.)

16. Kt to K B6

17. R to K R3

18. Kt to K Kt4

19. P takes P

20. B to K B4

21. K P to K6

(Well conceived. If Black take P with P or B, White replies with Kt to K5, and then Q to Q2 with an irresistible attack.)

22. Q to Q2

23. B takes Q B P

This seems feeble compared with White's previous vigorous "play." R to K square seems more to the purpose, e.g.:

23. R to K sq

24. Q to B3, threatening to take the K R P, &c., against which Black seems to have no resource.

White might also play:

24. B takes K R P

25. B takes Q (dis ch)

26. B to Q B3, with an excellent game

24. Q to Q B2

25. Kt to K3

(Imprudent play.)

26. Q to Q sq

(Q to K2 would have been a better move for Black, and White's reply seems to be R to K Kt3. If, however, White played Q takes Kt, Black's reply must be Q takes B and not B takes R. In the latter case the following variations might arise:—

WHITE.

27. Q takes Kt

28. B to Q3

29. P takes B

30. R to Q sq, and should win

27. R to K R5

28. K to K R sq

(An ingenious combination on the part of Black, which should have given him the game.)

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

CHRISTMAS NUMBER
OF
CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER.
PRICE ONE PENNY.

We have the gratification of informing our Subscribers that our next Number will be characteristic of the season. It will be beautifully illustrated with engravings of occasional subjects, and the whole of its contents will be of an entertaining character. We purpose giving our students a week's vacation, and shall substitute for "Lessons in French," "Natural Philosophy," "Drawing," and "The Matron," the Christmas engravings of "THE YULE LOG" (by Alfred Crowquill), of "CHRISTMAS IN THE WORKHOUSE," and "CHRISTMAS IN THE OLDEN TIME;" together with two additional Christmas Stories, Christmas Poetry, Charades, Games, and Christmas Receipts.

R. PEARSON.—We agree with you, the death of Admiral Lyons is a national calamity. Our navy is our principal protection; and the death of a great admiral is a serious loss. Admiral Lord Lyons achieved greatness—he did not inherit it. He was born at Burton, in Hampshire, and he was the second son of John Lyons, Esq. (of Lymington), a major in the Chesham volunteers. Admiral Lyons entered the navy at the early age of eleven years. While but a youth he displayed that skill and boldness which stamped him as a British sailor. Scarcely had our hero reached his twentieth year when Admiral Drury appointed him as his flag-lieutenant, on board the Minden. Soon after this he sailed for the coast of Java (one of the East Indian Islands), to await the arrival of an expedition for the reduction of the island. Some prisoners received on board informed Lieutenant Lyons that the Dutch, who then occupied Java, expected no attack during the monsoon, or rainy season. Young Lyons immediately seized the opportunity for action, and, with a boldness which excited astonishment and admiration, he put off two boats, at midnight, with a crew of thirty-five officers and men, to attack Fort Marrack, of 54 guns. But it seems just as he was about to land the moon peeped out, and revealed the sentinels ready to challenge. This was not a moment for deliberation. Our intrepid sailor pushed on in the face of the enemy. There was a heavy surf at the time; but he landed his little force, and carried the lower battery; and though on reaching the hill he found 400 soldiers facing him, the fort was captured, and the dawn of day beheld the British flag floating on the walls. We cannot follow him through his glorious career, nor mention all the honours heaped upon his name. In 1812 we find him commander of the Renaldo. In this vessel he escorted Louis XVIII. to France, and the allied sovereigns to England. And now for achievements yet fresh in our memory. The fall of Sebastopol was in a great degree owing to the skill and enterprise of Admiral Lyons and of his ever-to-be-lamented son, Captain Mowbray Lyons. A series of victories followed the glorious Admiral everywhere. Kinburn fell, the passage to the sea of Azov was opened, and the fortress of Kertch captured. If you look to your map you will see that this was the exploit that cut off the last hope of the Russians, by hemming them in on all sides. English and French generals may contend for the honour of effecting the success of the Crimean campaign, we attribute it to Admiral Lyons and his gallant son. It was on the 23rd of November last the gallant admiral expired. He had been staying at Arundel Castle with his daughter, the present Duchess of Norfolk. General debility, rather than any particular disease, is stated as the cause of the death of this truly great man.

ELIZA has been reading about the incursions of the French in Cochinchina. She wishes us to tell her how Cochinchina is situated. "Eliza" will find it in the map of Asia. It is bounded on the west by Siam and Cambodia, on the north by Quang-si and Laos, on the east by the Eastern ocean, and on the west and south-west by Ciampa and Cambodia. Cochinchina abounds in gold, raw silk, drugs, saffron, pepper, indigo, tea, ivory, and various kinds of trees and animals. It is upwards of three hundred miles in length, and about ninety in breadth, and it contains fifty seaport towns. The inhabitants are of a light brown complexion, and in manners resemble the Chinese.

T. Y.—Macbeth is a historic personage of the eleventh century. He usurped the throne of Scotland to the prejudice of Malcolm, son of Duncan, who, with his younger brother, Donaldbaine, took refuge in England. Macbeth's reign was as short as it was cruel. He was killed in a war with the English, who armed in favour of Duncan's children.

OSORIO.—To tell the honest truth, we have as little faith in omens as in ghosts and hobgoblins. We know very well that a blazing fire may be made a whole casket of omens; and why is this? Because coal while burning readily cakes into all kinds of forms. Gay, who cared as little for omens as we do, has written some lines in ridicule of them:

"Alas! you knew the cause too well,
The salt is split; to me it fell.
Then to contribute to my loss,
My knife and fork were laid across.
On Friday, too—the day I dread—
Would I were safe at home in bed.
Last night, and I declare 'tis true,
Bounce from the fire a coffin flew!
Next post some fatal news shall tell—
I hope my Cornish friends are well."

We earnestly recommend "Onoria" to resist her tendencies to a superstitious belief. It is a weakness that may lead her far astray.

HENRI.—The art of engraving on copper appears to be much more ancient than that of engraving on wood. In the peninsula of India, long before the Christian era, it was customary to ratify grants of land by deeds of transfer actually engraven on plates of copper, as we now write them on skins of parchment.

MISS J. B.—Supposing your chilblains are not broken, the following lotion is likely to relieve them. Mix distilled vinegar and spirit of mindererus, of each four ounces, with half an ounce of borax. In common cases of chilblains, apply pieces of soft linen moistened with spirits of camphor. Should the swellings break, apply emollient ointment for a few days. Equal quantities of sweet oil, lime-water, and spirits of wine are an excellent remedy for chilblains before they are broken.

ISA.—"Isa" wants to know how to pronounce "Rio," in the old Italian song, "Sul margine d'un rio," on the banks of a river. The word rio—river—should be pronounced as if written reco. "Isa" may have all the points of beauty she mentions without being beautiful, supposing the charm of expression be wanting. As to accepting or refusing the attentions of a fellow traveller, all must depend on the manner of offering these attentions, and on the apparent object of the offerer. If tendered merely with the view to assist, and to avert danger and inconvenience, it would be ungrateful to refuse them; but those attentions that are shown merely as an excuse for forming an acquaintance in an irregular manner should be repulsed.

R. SMITH.—To discover the contents of a will made in London, you must consult the records kept at the Prerogative Office, Doctor's Commons. But if the will in which you are interested was made by a person who died abroad, and has not been proved in England, your only chance is to go to the spot where you believe the will to have been made, and to act according to the information you are there able to collect. Our avocations prevent our undertaking any private correspondence with our readers, and we beg they will cease sending stamped envelopes. A LASS FROM MILTOWN PASS.—In the dried state in which the flower reached us, it is difficult to tell its name; but it looks to us more like a fuchsia than any other flower. We are disposed to call the hair auburn. AGNES MILNETON.—The nose you describe renders it impossible that you should ever be a regular beauty; but you may be none the less pleasing on this account. A CONSTANT READER.—The best thing you can do is to advertise, stating your qualifications, and specifying what situation you desire.

BERVIE.—On the death of Queen Elizabeth, James VI. of Scotland was the next male heir to the English crown, and, consequently, became king of England. Since that period (1603), the two countries have been under one sovereign, but they were not so clearly identified as to be called Great Britain until the reign of Queen Anne.

A LANCASHIRE LAD.—You must mean an express, not a special train. Had it been the latter, no one but yourself and your party would have had a right to enter; and thus you would not have been exposed to the dangerous fascination of your fickle "first love." In spite of her assurances, we deduce from the contents of your letter that she cares not a whit more for you than for any one else. With this view of the subject we cannot advise you to propose to her.

E. R. D.—You beg of us to insert the following in our Notices to Correspondents: "A young lady exclaims to one to whom she is tenderly attached . . . that she has been engaged to another for some time past, and thus blighting the poor fellow's feelings." Now, this is far from being intelligible. If the lady is tenderly attached to your friend, yet engaged to another, it is her feelings that are blighted. You say nothing about the lady's attachment to "the poor fellow." But if he does love one by whom he has been deceived, he is sincerely to be pitied; and nothing can excuse the "young lady" if, while her heart was your friend's, she engaged her hand to another.

ALICE.—It was more dignified in you to pass over your lover's neglect without a comment than to overwhelm him with reproaches.

HOPE EVERMORE.—All advances on your side would be exceedingly indelicate; and were you to succeed in the object you have in view by making such advances, the probabilities are, that the man for whom you broke through the rules of etiquette, would be the first to reproach you for having done so.

E. A. M. D.—Modern etiquette does not render it necessary for a lady to take off her glove to shake hands with either lady or gentleman.

SILVANUS.—The value of silk, as of other things, varies according to the plenty or scarcity of the article. Silk is cheap when mulberry-leaves are plentiful in the south of France and in Italy. You are more likely to procure a good price for your home-spun silk from some lady who would purchase it as a curiosity, than from a silk merchant, who, accustomed to large dealings, would naturally dislike purchasing in small quantities.

A WIDOW.—We will bear your request in mind, and endeavour to comply with it.

A. M. A.—You will find the advice you seek in the Editorial Table of our last number. PETERKIN.—It is not only a breach of etiquette, but an unwarrantable liberty to call at the house of any lady without having first obtained her leave so to do.

A YOUNG SPORTSMAN.—You cannot shoot in the places you name, with out a game certificate, even rabbits, which are not game, since any stranger may challenge you and may ask to see your certificate, &c.

JUNIAS.—The act to which you refer has become obsolete; you will require a licence.

RICHARD TYRELL.—Your conduct towards ladies you meet in the street must be regulated by circumstances.

A CONSTANT READER.—If a man die without a will leaving a wife and son, a sister has no claim to any share of the property. The money you have lent, you must not endeavour to recover by force, but proceed for it as for a debt. In the case you mention—viz., that of a young woman without father or mother—the proposal of marriage for her, if she is herself under age, should be made to her brother (if she has one), supposing him to have arrived at years of discretion.

AMBITION.—Apply to the secretary of the Oriental Steam Navigation Company.

NELLY.—It is not for us to dictate in so important a matter, but we certainly cannot recommend a man with a bad temper, even though he may have "black hair and black eyes."

E. LAFLUTE.—The task you assign us would occupy too much of our time and space, and would be uninteresting to the majority of our readers.

S. B.—The cash-takers at railway stations are not obliged to find you change, but they have no right to charge more than the actual fare.

DICK MAJOR.—The cleaning of old oil paintings is a work of much delicacy, and a person not experienced in it is more likely to spoil than to improve a good picture.

A CONSTANT SUBSCRIBER.—Mails for Australia are made up every week at the General Post Office, St. Martin's Lane, Grand.

J. STEVENSON.—Polishing plaster figures is a delicate, though not difficult process. Dissolve an ounce of pure curd soap in three pints of clear water placed in a glazed earthen pinkin, then add an ounce of white wax cut into very thin slices. When these are thoroughly incorporated, lay a coat of it on the figure with a soft hog's hair brush. When this coat is completely absorbed, lay on a second coat, which generally succeeds. Cover it carefully from the dust for about a week, and with a soft muslin or silken rag rub it gently, when a good gloss will be produced.

RICHARD MARKHAM.—As your account is partly for work done and partly for things bought, it would be better to say, Mr. —, Dr. to R. Markham, &c.

FIDDLER DICK.—The price of the first volume of our old series is 7s. 6d. bound in cloth. We do not recommend binding two volumes in one.

ETUDIANT.—Study the French Lessons in all their parts, and for some time to come you will require no other books.

E. W. T.—Black Japan varnish for leather is made thus:—Take half a pound of burnt umber, and half an ounce of asphaltum, each finely powdered, and stir them well into a pint of boiled linseed oil. Boil, and add as much oil of turpentine as will make it sufficiently thin for use. Boil in an earthen pinkin, and be careful it does not take fire.

A. V.—To prepare paper for tracing, lay open as much fine tissue paper as is needed, and apply with a clean hog's hair brush, not too stiff, a coat of varnish, made of equal parts of Canada balsam and oil of turpentine, to the upper surface of the first sheet, then hang it on a line to dry, and repeat the operation on fresh sheets until the whole quantity is finished. If washed over with ox gall and dried, the sheets may be written upon with ink or water colours.

AN UNHAPPY WIFE.—Your marriage cannot be dissolved for informality, though solemnised under a false name.

TO OUR POETICAL CORRESPONDENTS.—We could fill a volume with all the poetical effusions sent for our perusal. Many of these effusions, though not sufficiently artistic for publication, evince thought, taste, and good feeling. To this class belong "Dunellen's" little poem, entitled "Love," and "A Regular Subscriber's" lines called "The 'Lover's Parting,'" but in the compositions of "Gruaf," though she is only fourteen years' old, there is considerable purpose and play of fancy. However, her faults in spelling induce us seriously to advise her not to give much more of her time to poetry, until she has mastered the essential parts of education; and no one will deny that spelling is one of these essential parts.

TO THE
IN
CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER.

In consequence of the numerous inquiries which are being continually received, as to the best French and English, and English and French Dictionary, it has been determined to re-issue

CASSELL'S FRENCH DICTIONARY.

Containing, I. French and English; II. English and French. This work is universally admitted to be

ONE OF THE BEST DICTIONARIES OF THE AGE.

It contains all the Words in general use at the present time, including those which are technical and scientific; Vocabularies of Mythological, Historical, and Geographical Names, with accurate definitions and examples. It also comprises Rules for correct Pronunciation; the Idioms most in use; Table of Irregular Verbs, &c. &c. It is thus altogether the most compendious and useful French and English and English and French Dictionary that has ever been published, especially for purposes of private study and reference.

"Casell's French Dictionary" is now published at 9s. 6d., but with the view of encouraging the students of the French lessons, it is purposed to issue this important and valuable work in Weekly Numbers, price Twopence. When completed the two divisions, that is to say, the French and English, and English and French, will form 960 closely printed pages, and if purchased in weekly numbers, will only involve the outlay of 5s. It must, however, be understood that subscribers will only have the privilege of completing their numbers at this price during the period of issue, or within a period, from the issue of the last number, which will be hereafter named.

Cases for the preservation of the numbers, as well as for the binding of the same when completed, will be issued with the first Number.

The First number, containing 32 pages, demy octavo, will be ready with No. 57 of the "FAMILY PAPER," on Thursday, December 23.

 We cannot undertake to return rejected manuscripts.
